[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

THE centenary of Gladstone's birth was honored on Wednesday, not merely in London, where a Bulgarian deputation laid a costly silver wreath on his grave in Westminster Abbey, but in the many countries, great and small, which rank him as one of their greatest citizens. These celebrations took place in Athens, where the Director of the Museum referred to him as "the Aristides of Christianity," in Philippopolis, in Belgrade, in Rome, in New York, and in Cape Town. Probably the best description of Gladstone's career is that addressed to him by members of his own University: "You have so lived and wrought that you have kept the soul alive in England."

* * *

MR. CHAMBERLAIN has issued a manifesto from his retirement at Highbury, which, though in style a pale shadow of the old Chamberlain vigor, puts the tactical case for Unionism with some skill. It passes over the Revolution of the Lords with the evasive sentence that the Budget was still dependent on the people's vote, and that therefore their action lay within the duty of a Second Chamber. It says no word on the structure of the Protectionist Budget or on the gross inconsistencies of the earlier and the later forms, but it states without disguise that the Lords have been used as a mere instrument for replacing a Free Trade by a Protectionist Government, and adds that this is Tariff Reform's last chance. "If," says Mr. Chamberlain, "we throw away this opportunity I do not think that any other will come to us and we shall have lost altogether the chance that is now ours." As minor reasons for turning out the Government he enumerates Home Rule, naval defence, and the question of Single Chamber or Double Chamber government.

* * *

MR. BALFOUR has made one or two meagre contributions to the campaign. In a letter to Mr. H. S. Foster he disavows Mr. Chamberlain's second Protectionist Budget, and harks back to the first with the remark that the "proportionate contribution" of the working classes is not to be increased by Tariff Reform. This, of course, is as meaningless a pledge as Lord Rothschild's private guarantee of the Buckinghamshire pensions for which, in his public capacity, he refuses to find the money; but it is in point-blank contradiction to Mr. Chamberlain's inclusion of bacon and maize, and the dropping in the "Birmingham Post" Budget of all suggestion as to the remission of breakfast table duties. At Haddington, Mr. Balfour, in a brief and toneless speech, declared Socialism to be a leading point of the campaign, said that in the maintenance of the Navy the Government had not redeemed their pledges by their policy, repeated his somnambulist talk as to the obsolescence of Cobdenism, but was, as usual, honest enough to declare that the "whole difficulty" of unemployment—which had now become chronic—could not be solved by "Tariff Reform." It could only be "diminished." As to the issue of the election, said Mr. Balfour, "we mean to win—sooner or later."

* * *

MR. CHURCHILL's election address, which was issued on Wednesday, states the points of the election with electric vigor, singular breadth of thought, and much suggestiveness of phrasing. If the claims of the Lords were allowed, that body must become master of the State, exercising an authority transmitted from generation to generation. Thus England would have a Constitution less broad and free than France, or the United States, or any of our self-governing Colonies. British democracy had done nothing to deserve such a loss of power, involving, as it did, the draining of all virtue from the people's vote. The people could be trusted to pursue the gradual processes of democratic development already begun. The alternatives were a violent backward movement or a harmonious forward evolution. Protection meant the instant organisation of trusts, with its correlative of public corruption, the prostration of Parliament before the power of wealth, and the disappearance of the hope of "a free and balanced society" kept "clean and healthy by recurrence to simple truths and first principles." Mr. Churchill outlined the Government's remedy for unemployment, which he defined as trade-organisation and insurance, while on international policy he thought that peace would ensue so long as nations were being "woven together by the silent and tireless forces of civilisation."

* * *

SIR EDWARD GREY, speaking at Salisbury on Tuesday, charged the Tories with being interested in the maintenance of the merely "one-sided veto" of the Lords, a veto exercised by men absolutely without credit or historic or personal responsibility for what they did. Sir Edward inclined to an elective Second Chamber, which could do no worse than produce the deadlock that existed to-day. But the present House, like a bad umpire at cricket, never gave a decision against its own side or for its opponents. A proposal to "reform" the House of Lords by self-election was worthless, for it could only create a "body of superior persons." Reform of the House of Lords, according to Lord Curzon, was to appear on every Tory election address, "but so," added Sir Edward caustically, "did Old Age Pensions." The issue of the election was a vote of confidence either in the House of Commons or in the House of Lords.

* * *

SIR FREDERICK POLLOCK, one of the most moderate and also the most learned of English public men, contributed to the "Times" of Tuesday a powerful and caustic survey of the action of the Lords. He warned them that, in "putting the British Constitution in the melting-pot," they had invited Australia, Canada, and South Africa to call for fresh changes in it, and said that in their claim of a legal right to throw out a Money Bill they were no more justified than the King would be if, without reference to Parliament, he were to cede the Isle of Wight to the Republic of San Marino, or if the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council declared that in future it would pay no regard to the decisions of any English Court. "Once," he added, "in a fit of folly the rulers of this nation did act on their strict rights and taxed the American colonies. The answer was a strictly illegal proceeding called the Declaration of Independence. It was ultimately justified by success." He insisted that the spirit of the debate in the Lords showed ignorance and even levity. "Many of the Lords," he said, "discussed the Budget as if they were on the second reading of it in the House of Commons. Some said they disliked it on this or that point, and cheerfully overlooked the existence of any constitutional question at all. Indeed, the average attitude of the majority might be summed up after this fashion: It's a bad Budget, very bad—yes, a d—d bad Budget, and why shouldn't we throw it out? and, by George, we will, and be d—d to Lloyd George into the bargain! and who dares to say we can't?"

* * *

RECURRING to the vital case of the Harcourt Budget of 1894, he quoted Lord Salisbury's bitter analysis of the actual representative strength of the trifling majority in the House of Commons which carried that measure. Lord Salisbury then showed that a turn of 150 votes in the country would have been enough to throw out the Finance Bill. In the face of that fact, Lord Salisbury argued strongly against rejection. Yet the Finance Bill of 1909, which was thrown out, passed the House of Commons by twelve times the majority that the Harcourt Budget possessed. As for Lord Curzon's claim that it was the business of the House of Lords to say when a Parliament has lasted long enough, it could not be reconciled with Parliamentary Government, while the assertion of a right of appeal to the electorate was really an attempt to control finance, because in no other way could the Lords bring about a dissolution. Lord Curzon, replying to Sir Frederick on Thursday, suggested that Lord Salisbury had declined to recommend rejection of the 1894 Budget because the Government of the day was "only in its second year of office," a precise reaffirmation of the claim of the Peers to determine the life of a Liberal Government as soon as they think it safe to do so.

* * *

SPEAKING at Boston on Thursday night, Lord Wiltoughby de Broke was asked, "Who gave Old Age Pensions?" He replied, "We gave them," and then proceeded to speak with gross discourtesy of Mr. Ure. At Evesham, Lord Clinton, declaring that you must "tax the capitalist as little as possible," and being asked whether he would "put it all on labor," replied that he would put it neither on capital nor on labor, but on the foreigner. On Tuesday night, Lord Salisbury claimed for the Lords that they were not "waiters on providence," and did not trim their sails to passing breezes, but were "independent" (i.e., of the people), and could thus "consider the wishes and views of the country." Again, Lord Tennyson suggested that they had thrown out the Budget in the interests of Tariff Reform, its only alternative. Finally, "The Voice" dealt with great effect with Mr. Walter Long, who had stated in the Strand that "the people already paid very heavy taxes on food."

"The Voice: Not so much as we did four years ago.

"Mr. Long: How much less?

"The Voice: Sixpence less on tea, a halfpenny less on sugar.

"Mr. Long: Supposing your view is correct——

"The Voice: It is correct.

"Mr. Long (tartly): Let's be civil."

* * *

LORD ROTHSCHILD, speaking in Whitechapel to a gathering of Jews, but declaring that he talked "as an Englishman to Englishmen," again showed his extreme aversion from the payment of taxes. He stated that the Jews fled from Russia to escape bureaucracy, and that it was "a similar bureaucracy that the Liberal Government want to impose on this country." That is to say they ask Lord Rothschild, the rich Jew, to submit to a valuation of his land and to make a statement as to his income, in common with the Gentile farmers of Buckinghamshire and the Jew shopkeepers of Whitechapel. If Lord Rothschild does not like these conditions, he is open to return to his ancestral home. But he will not take many of his co-religionists with him.

* * *

THERE has been much discussion in the German Press over the later phases of the negotiations for an Anglo-German rapprochement. The Pan-German element, which distrusted Herr Bethmann-Hollweg from the first, has been circulating reports, calculated to alarm, to the effect that the British success in obtaining the Lynch concession in Turkey was a prelude to a wholesale surrender of German interests in the Near East, which was itself part of a yet more sinister bargain to arrest the growth of the German Navy. The official denials are careful to state that the desire to reach a rapprochement exists. The most definite accounts of what is going on are to be found in the "Frankfurter Zeitung" and the "Standard," which state that negotiations, which are likely to be protracted, are in progress to reach an understanding (1) in regard to a number of minor African questions, (2) touching all Near Eastern questions, from the Bosphorus to the Persian Gulf, and, finally, in regard (3) to armaments. There can, it is said, be no modification of the Naval Law, which governs construction up to 1917, but after that date the two Governments may exchange information as to their intentions.

* * *

THE mysterious crisis of two weeks ago, when Hilmi Pasha's Government was almost upset for granting a monopoly of the river navigation of Mesopotamia to the English Lynch Company, has at last produced its natural consequence. Hilmi Pasha has resigned his post as Grand Vizier, advancing no explanation more convincing than a desire for rest—perhaps the last foible which this avid worker would be likely to entertain. His post was offered to Marshal Mahmud Chefheth Pasha, the soldier who led the Committee's army in April, and still rules Constantinople under a mild form of martial law. On his refusal, Hakki Bey, who long resided as a Consular official in England, was summoned from Rome. The Cabinet, when formed, is likely to reflect even more decidedly the predominance of the Committee (now an open party) in the Chamber. We know as yet too little of the real meaning of this crisis to pronounce a decided judgment, but it is said that Hilmi Pasha has fallen because of his complacency under English pressure in the matter of this unpopular concession. A disquieting feature of the Turkish situation is the unrest caused in Macedonia by proposals to deport large numbers of Bulgarians, and to undertake a systematic plan of Moslem colonisation.

* * *

THERE is at last some improvement in the internal chaos in Greece. The Military League, after some dramatic scenes in the Chamber, has been induced by the King's mediation to throw over its nominee, the Minister of War, Colonel Lapathiokis, who had made himself particularly obnoxious to the Constitutional parties. The Athenian students have indeed manifested their displeasure with this surrender. But the Press and the trade guilds, which were some weeks ago on the side of the officers, seem to have recovered their independence. On the other hand, the rival Constitutional groups in the Chamber are as far as ever from uniting against a menace which threatens the whole Parliamentary system. It is too soon to say whether the improvement is likely to be permanent. The Military League was threatening to move regiments on Athens only a week ago. If it still commands the army, it may at any moment recover the ground it has lost. A general election might bring back a more vigorous Chamber, but, in view of the determination of the Cretans to use such an opening in order to defy Turkey by sending deputies to Athens, that means of salvation is the last which could prudently be used.

* * *

THE Indian Congress movement has not recovered from the dissensions which broke out two years ago at Surab, and its meetings this Christmas seem to have been depressing and uncomfortable. The President-Elect, Sir Pherozeshah Mehta, one of the ablest and most universally respected men in the Moderate ranks, had resigned at the last moment, apparently because other leaders wished to extend a certain measure of tolerance towards the less irreconcilable extremists. The attendance was thin. The proceedings were occupied mainly with a severe destructive criticism of the regulations by which the Indian Government is giving effect to Lord Morley's Reform Scheme, chiefly because of the policy they embody (explicitly avowed in the original "Simla" scheme) of excluding the educated "Baboo" element as far as possible, and also because of their exaggeration of the principle of Mohammedan minority representation. These defects (and they are real and serious defects) bulk for the moment so largely in the minds of Hindoo politicians as almost to destroy the tempered welcome originally bestowed on the scheme by the Moderates.

* * *

MEANWHILE, the exclusion of Indians from the Transvaal continues to evoke intense feeling. It is evident that our failure to encourage and conciliate Moderate Nationalism is having the inevitable effect of reinforcing the wildest tendencies of the terrorists. The Indian police (whose revelations must be received with reserve) claim to have discovered a wide-spread conspiracy behind the murder of Mr. Jackson in the Deccan. Anglo-Indian sentiment (if the "Times" may be taken as its mouthpiece) is calling for wholesale deportations, for the quartering of "punitive police" in the villages, and for such a manipulation of the Courts that none of the accused shall escape on "legal technicalities."

* * *

THE Hungarian Cabinet crisis, which has lingered through various phases since midsummer, has at last reached a stage which has permitted the Crown to ask Dr. Lukacs, a capable financier and a politician free from party ties, to form a Cabinet. It is not as yet known whether he will turn mainly to the more moderate Kossuthist group or to the followers of the individually sympathetic, yet more extreme, M. de Justh. The latter is pledged to the creation of a separate Hungarian Bank, a concession which the Crown is not likely to grant; but he is, on the other hand, better disposed towards the subject races, and more likely to favor an honest scheme of universal suffrage. At bottom, Hungarian politics turn for the moment on finance, with their pivot in Paris. It is necessary to raise a loan of 20 millions sterling, and neither Vienna nor Berlin is in a lending mood.

* * *

It is not quite certain that the German Government will have the approval of the commercial community in its present complacency towards the Franco-German commercial group which proposes to develop the mineral resources of Morocco. A complicated bargain, in which Messrs. Schneider on the one hand and Messrs. Krupp on the other had a share, to develop the iron-ore fields, not merely of Morocco but also of Algeria, preceded the diplomatic understanding. But, in the meanwhile, an exclusively German firm, the Mannesmann Brothers, had obtained from Muley Hafid, while still an unrecognised pretender, in return for a loan of £15,000, a concession to exploit no less than 600 mineral claims in Morocco, which are said to be worth at least £10,000,000. A monopoly on this vast scale would seem to conflict with the Act of Algeciras. Herr von Schoen, on behalf of the German Government, shrinks from giving diplomatic support to the Mannesmann claim against the Franco-German Union des Mines Marocaines, and suggests a reference to arbitration. Herr Ballin, on behalf of the Hamburg shippers, has entered a vigorous protest, on the ground that Hamburg no longer makes all its old profits on the carriage of Swedish ore.

* * *

WE regret to record the death of Earl Percy, the heir of the Duke of Northumberland, at Paris, on Thursday, at the age of thirty-eight. The loss is a serious one to the Conservative Party, already bare to the bone of men of even average capacity for governing. Lord Percy had no genius, but he had great talent for Parliamentary speech, and special powers of application to foreign affairs, which he handled with far greater discretion than Lord Curzon. He spoke, not indeed with distinction, but with the effect which a master of facts produces in the House of Commons, especially when he deals with little known subjects. Had he lived he would almost certainly, in the course of time, have succeeded Lord Lansdowne as Foreign Secretary in some future Tory and Protectionist Government.—The death of Mr. Hirst Hollowell, on Sunday, at the age of fifty-eight, bereaved Nonconformity of one of its most direct and vigorous controversialists. Matthew Arnold would probably have said that Mr. Hollowell represented the dissidence of Dissent more than its culture, but controversy gained greatly by the service of so clear a mind and so honest a pen.

Politics and Affairs.

THE APPEAL TO THE MODERATE MAN.

THE cause of the peers is fated to be linked with the false and hypocritical notions of public policy which dictated their original breach of the Constitution. That insidious act, as Sir Frederick Pollock shows in a masterly letter to the "Times," had no other aim, and if it succeeds, can have no other effect, than to make the House of Lords supreme not only in legislation but in finance. Only by withholding supply could the Lords force a dissolution. Only by forcing a dissolution could they hope to bring a hated Government to the ground. Having achieved that result, they have not dared to allege in the face of the electorate the pleas on which alone they overthrew the Budget, for then the monstrous disproportion between their deed and the excuses for it would have appeared in the sight of all men. Accordingly, their false speeches and falser posters cover every point in the Budget save the taxes on wealth they have sworn to extirpate from it. The latter, indeed, contrive to suggest the really colossal lie that a financial plan aimed especially at saving labor at the cost—a very reasonable cost—of luxury, oppresses it in respect of the very imposts which the Lords passed without a murmur, and would have doubled with joy if thereby they could have saved their rents and monopolies.

Still more urgent is it for the Constitution-breakers to conceal the character, as well as the motives, of their act. So, with the whine of a bullying tramp, they call on "moderate" men to rally to their support, and promise that if only they are allowed to roll the House of Commons in the dust, they will promptly set about the business of "reforming" themselves. Thus speak most criminals when they are found out; let them off this once, and they will produce the most dazzling effects of virtue. With them, as with the House of Lords, the first business of the judge is to examine the true character of the offender, and when that has been probed to the bottom, to protect the community from his unreformed and unrepentant self. Even if the plea of reform were honest, it would be at once a condemnation of what the Lords had done and an invitation to the Liberal Party to proceed without delay or compunction to its necessary business of destroying their veto. It means, if it means anything, that an hereditary House cannot defend its act of war on the representative one; that, as it well knows, common right and reason and fairness disabled it from drumming up its most ignorant, obscure, and idle members to destroy a sacred privilege of the Commons. So let this body be speedily huddled out of sight, and something presentable put before the people's eyes, something suggesting the deed, not of self-regarding folly, but of impartial statesmanship. Then, perhaps, when Hyde has slipped his skin of palpable mischief, and Jekyll appears merely attired in the hypocrite's conventional garb, the old offence may be condoned, and a career of fresh licence opened up.

To this task, forsooth, is to be summoned the "moderate" man, the person disposed to take calm views of the whole field of politics. We should have said that he had already intervened with some effect in the controversy—through the "Quarterly" and "Edinburgh," in the persons of the Archbishop of York, Lord Balfour of Burleigh, Lord St. Aldwyn, Lord James of Hereford, Sir Frederick Pollock, and Mr. Arthur Elliot—and that the case for the Lords had withered in his hands. And we may well ask on what other side he could act than on that of the Liberal Party? Does he, for example, desire that the Constitution should maintain and develop the existing balance of its powers? Then, in the full flood of democracy, he will not think it wise to put the representative House at the mercy of the non-representative. Does he apprehend conscription, and an embittered and dangerous controversy with Germany, leading to war in a not distant future? Then he will avoid the party that openly preaches the one and steadily tends to the other. Does he think that our limited Monarchy is well served by the present party system, and that the Lords will seriously, perhaps fatally, weaken it by destroying one of those parties? He will then know where to use his influence in the present crisis. Does he think it inadvisable to give the people the impression of gross selfishness and repellent make-believe in their rulers? Then he will treat the Lords as they deserve. Does he think that Free Trade best serves the purpose of a great importing community, depending on foreign sources for two-thirds of its food supplies? Then he will avoid the extreme social danger of forcing on Protection through the destruction of a Free Trade Budget and a Free Trade Ministry by the House of Lords. Does he generally think it at once unscrupulous and reckless to use the tyrant's device of a plébiscite against the representative form of government, and to follow it up by a deliberately confused appeal on almost every public question but that which moved the Lords to their action? Then he will conceive it to be a far lesser evil to put back the House of Lords into the place which so good an observer as Bagehot assigned to it in the 'seventies, than to make it impossible for any Liberal Prime Minister to accept the King's invitation to form a Ministry.

Still more concerned will the moderate man be to vote with the Liberals if he rightly surveys the precise and imminent dangers of the situation. It is quite useless to disguise the fact that the Lords have brought us within hailing distance of Revolution. Probably the people do not see it; it is not the genius of our race to divine difficulties until they stare us in the face. But suppose the Liberals and Labor Party are defeated. It is a most unlikely hypothesis, but it should be entertained. The Government would then resign. The Protectionist and Peers' Party would have two Budgets to consider. The first would be the present Budget minus the land taxes. The second, immediately following it, must carry with it swingeing taxes on the people's food, for there would be no time to lay an elaborate tariff on manufactured goods. Thus an enraged and deceived community would find their bread snatched from their mouths by the same force that had at once shielded its own monopoly and destroyed their political power. The quicker the reaction from such a policy the better; and the longer it was delayed the more extreme its form must be. All this while, the defeated party would be an irreconcilable force. All the new taxes it would treat as essentially unconstitutional in origin and character. It would agitate the question of powers incessantly; calling for the restitution of the stolen authority of the House of Commons, and eventually creating a force that would sweep the Peer-Protectionist Ministry away and a good deal of worthless constitutional débris with them.

Or let us take a second hypothesis—that the Government are returned by a small majority. The Peers might then pass the Budget, and if they did not, a plainly forcible method would doubtless be approved by the Crown. But the Government might or might not prevail on the King to overbear the Peers' resistance to the destruction of the absolute veto. The Crown would thus be placed in an odious position. One party would ask it to disregard a popular mandate, the other to fulfil it. If it decided for the Peers, it would place itself in antagonism to the party that was bound to win in the end, and whose acceptance of the Monarchy is one of its strongest supports. If it decided for the People, it must become the subject of attack by the classes with whom the private life of the King is necessarily spent. In the one case he would be charged with acting too soon, in the other with going too slow; with one set of critics the complaint would be that the Monarchy had disregarded its past, with the other that it had taken no thought for its future.

Every one can divine the deep confusion, the bitter controversy, the embarrassing situations, which would arise from the new attitude that the Monarchy might be driven to adopt to one or other of the parties which, until the later interventions of the Lords, exercised practically an equality of opportunity in the competition for power. No one can tell what immediate form such a new relation of political forces would take, though the end can be predicted with certainty. Are these consequences desirable? Does the moderate man, in particular, desire them? Does he think that when the monstrous usurpation of the Lords is seen in its true proportions, and men realise that it has stripped the land almost bare of constitutional law, the resulting storm will be easily mastered? If not, it is clear that he, no less than every type of progressive politician, should aim at the one satisfactory issue of the General Election, the return to power of the Liberals and their Labor and Irish allies, by a majority which public opinion would recognise as sufficient for the double purpose of passing the Budget and ending the absolute veto of the House of Lords. All the crockery that the Lords have smashed cannot be mended; progress in future will not, in any case, be as orderly as in the days before the aristocracy broke bounds. But if every friend of progress thinks that he has British freedom in his personal charge, and is wrought to the pitch of putting it well in front of his average workaday partisanship, we shall, at least, save our politics from being violently twisted out of their course by a gang of revolutionists, one-half of whom are plotting for power and the other half for plunder.

THE SOCIAL PROGRAMME OF LIBERALISM

It is an old charge that Liberal policy is merely negative. There was a time when it contained a certain truth, but it was never less true than it is to-day. It is a fact that on two great points the Liberal of to-day is opposing change. On the constitutional side Liberalism is now the conservative force. It is conservative in that nobler and more generous sense in which Burke ranks as the greatest of conservatives. It is conservative in that it adheres to the spirit of the Constitution, and stands by the natural order of its development. It is conservative in opposition to the reckless reaction which tramples on tradition and defies the honorable understandings of generations. It is conservative again on the fiscal question. It stands by the victory won, under the leadership of Cobden and Bright, by common sense and the feeling for the general good. It recognises that the Free Trade principle is not only the best in itself for a great industrial nation, but is deeply rooted in our economic structure by the events of sixty years and by the special directions into which it has led British enterprise. On both counts the men of historical sense, the more philosophic conservatives who seek a slow and secure social growth firmly rooted in the past, begin to rank themselves on the Liberal side.

But while we hold to the elements of liberty that our fathers won, we are not dead to the miseries, the injustice, the waste, the tragedy of existing social circumstances. We can hurl back the taunts of the Tariff Reformer in his teeth. He has his "positive" policy, he boasts, that is to cure unemployment, redeem poverty, leave wealth untaxed, and make the foreigner pay for all. "Positive enough," we reply, positively wrong, positively fallacious, in some cases positive quackery. The Budget, says the Tariff Reformer, will do nothing for unemployment. The answer is given by Mr. Lloyd George and is reinforced in the stirring election address of Mr. Winston Churchill. We have now a policy clearly thought out in its broad outline for dealing with the worst evils of poverty. We do not pretend that it is a cure-all. We are aware that at some points it is experimental, and at other points palliative. But we claim that it takes every side of poverty into account, that it looks all round the question and fastens on every point of attack, and that it holds the field as the best ameliorative scheme that has yet been brought within reach of practical legislation in this land. Some of the leading features of the scheme were outlined in THE NATION eighteen months ago. Some have since been enforced and elucidated by the Reports of the Poor Law Commission, and especially by the Minority. Some are frankly inspired by German experience. We are not ashamed to learn from Germany. But when Mr. Churchill goes there for a lesson he picks up not the bad and reactionary ideas, the conscription and the Protectionism that are imposed by the autocracy or the Junkers, and that our autocrats and Junkers, our Milners and Curzons, would fain import. He picks out those elements of enlightened statecraft, those methods of advancing towards a true solidarity, which the German Government has learnt in its own despite from the Social Democrats whom it despises and once persecuted.

The campaign against poverty is not wholly in the future. It is no matter of mere promise. Its elements are already in being. Liberal legislation has already dealt with the aged, and the Budget provides the basis for the completion of the pension scheme by the removal of the pauper disqualification. It has begun to deal with the children, not only by the Children's Charter, but by medical inspection and care for the underfed child. On this must follow some provision for deserted wives and widows left with children. We must recognise that for them there is a sound and much-needed application of a principle which is too often misapplied, that the sphere of woman is the home. The home is certainly the sphere of the mother with young children, and if we are in earnest with this doctrine, we must cap it by admitting that in tending her children well and bringing them up to be healthy and capable workers, she is performing a public service, and deserves a form of public help.

But what of unemployment? Here, at least, says the Tariff Reformer, "we have a policy. We may be wrong. But at least we hold out a hope. What is your policy and what hope do you give?" The reply is given by Mr. Churchill in two words "Organisation and Insurance." The beginning of organisation is the national system of Labor Exchanges, which is no vague promise, but is actually in process of establishment. The Exchanges will, in the first place, minimise frictional waste by providing a link between every man who needs employment and every employer who can take on an additional man. That in itself is not to be despised. It will save thousands of industrious men the heart-breaking tramp in search of delusive openings. But what is far more than this, it will provide the bases of further organisation. It will give us the first complete registry of unemployment, and the first certain means of distinguishing the wastrel and the idler from the genuine searcher for work. It will crystallise the problem and define the responsibilities of the public. Next, what do we propose to do for the thousands who remain unemployed? We will point to three distinct remedies which are, or will be, the immediate purpose of the Liberal Government to take in hand. There is, first, the systematic organisation of public work, municipal and national, in such a manner as to adjust the maximum of public to the minimum periods of private employment. A valuable beginning in this direction was made last winter by the Local Government Board, in connection with municipal construction. But, secondly, and beyond this, is the organisation of public industries under the Development Act, which will provide considerable openings for unskilled labor on afforestation, road-making, and land reclamation. Thirdly, and especially for the more skilled men who cannot be bandied about from one form of work to another, there is the provision of a State-aided insurance, to give backing to the efforts already made in this direction by the trade unions. On all these issues Tariff Reform has no positive policy.

Behind it all lies the question of the land, which the Budget for the first time assails by the only sound methods of fair valuation, taxation on real market value, and the absorption of a moderate portion of the unearned increment. Superior to all European nations in our fiscal system, we lag far behind them in our system of land tenure. Where they have a landed peasantry as the backbone of their working population, we have the landless laborer who, more for want of prospect in his own home and in his own industry than for any other economic reason, is rapidly drifting away into the towns, increasing the labor congestion, crowding the labor market, and aggravating the trouble of unemployment. We mean to staunch this flow of the best blood of the countryside. We have done a little by the Small Holdings Act, but we can make a serious beginning when once we have rendered possible the acquisition of land by public bodies on reasonable economic terms.

This is our social programme. It means the end of the system of land monopoly on the one side and of unorganised industrial competition on the other. It means the end of the system which has given to the prosperous wealth beyond the dreams of avarice and has left the mass of the people at the mercy of every blast of industrial misfortune. That is why the Lords have placed themselves resolutely in our way, and staked their very existence on the defeat of the joint forces of Liberalism and Labor. More than ever the political question is now a social question. Is the community to be free to reform itself, to utilise all the vast material resources of modern science for the alleviation of human misery, or to be enslaved to liquor monopoly, land monopoly, and the feudal privileges of the Lords?

THE ALLIES.

It may be melancholy to think of a great political fighter deprived of power; but, in our view, it is far sadder to find him deprived of the ability to see himself, and the facts, and his creed, as a man of average honesty and clear insight sees them. Mr. Chamberlain is at the end of his career. He cannot hope to witness Protection established in this country. But if he cherished this dream, to what failure and ignominy would he consign every phase of his public life which preceded its close! In his pallid and dreary manifesto to the electors, he tells us that, "without inconsistency," he and we can change from Free Trade to Protection. He informs us that it is well within the powers of the Second Chamber to destroy a Budget, to overthrow a party, to force a Dissolution, to change the fiscal system of these islands. The fiscal system he casts off is that which he pursued through nine-tenths of his activities as a public man. The party he would destroy was his own, representing the most sincere and generous convictions he ever entertained. The Budget he denounces is framed exactly and literally on the lines which he commended on a score of public platforms and in the height and the most vivid passages of his career. The House that has throttled it he condemned for every one of the vices and arrogant assumptions that are the ground of the people's indictment against it.

From the retreat, which, unfortunately, he can never leave, he has sent out a score of messages, each contradicting the other. In one breath he has told us that Protection has not raised the prices of food in Germany above those which prevail in these islands—a statement of whose baselessness Mr. Bernstein furnishes a dozen pertinent and most modern instances in another column of THE NATION. In another, he has suggested that he has changed nothing in his earlier, as compared with his later, scheme of Protection, whereas in the one case he has brought into account the food of a whole people—the Irish—and in the other has exempted it; has changed his plan from a pretended transfer of food taxes to a positive addition to them; has offered the Colonies a free entry for their foodstuffs, and has then shifted his plan to a Protectionist duty on them, only lower than that which he proposes for foreign sources of supply. Having created this unprincipled and unmeaning tangle of policies, devoid of a plan that will hold water for a single week of the controversy, unable to answer his critics, to reconcile his self-contradictions, or to defend his false prophecies, he goes blindly forward with the pretence that the Colonies are with him, when he knows that not one unit of British Government within the Empire has ever looked at the preposterous plan he set out in the columns of the "Birmingham Post." It is all in the order of things that Mr. Chamberlain's soi-disant leader should disown him, and should hark back to the original and less offensive Birmingham scheme, while he, in a kind of belated honesty, abandons it and declares for still more cruel penalties on labor than those he originally devised for it.

Thus these two men act, countering each other, pretending to work with each other, condemning each other to a common and shameful impotence. Mr. Balfour uses Mr. Chamberlain as an electioneering asset, the only one he possesses. Mr. Chamberlain uses Mr. Balfour to keep Protection and Toryism together. The partner who can alone succeed to power does not believe in Protection. The partner who believes, or thinks he believes, in Protection can never attain power. Mr. Balfour knows that the first Chamberlain tariff, with its balance of remissions and fresh taxes, will yield him no revenue worth speaking of. Mr. Chamberlain knows that his proposal to tax Colonial food kills preferences. Yet each man consents to play a hypocritical game of assent to an ever-shifting series of propositions, not one of which has ever been thought out. Mr. Chamberlain falsifies his Radical past in order to give Protection, as he says, its last chance with the electorate, thus stripping every shred of legality from the back of the Lords. Mr. Balfour falsifies his Conservatism, because he has not the common honesty and strength of mind to say that he thinks Protection an imposture, and that it is no business of the Conservative party to destroy the customs and traditions on which the Constitution rests. These men, drifting from deep to deep, offer themselves to the people. They are fit allies. One ruined the Liberal, the other the Tory Party. One betrayed democracy, the other Constitutionalism. In their unreal union, and real division, we discern at once the key to the politics of the last six years, which has in turn imperilled the fiscal and the governing system of the realm.

THE INEVITABLE DUKE.

ROMAN augurs counted it a prodigy when the dumb ox spake, and to our contemporary politicians there is something portentous in the speeches of a Duke. Whether he speaks well or badly, the wonder is that he should speak at all. The most hesitating speech, the simplest letter, implies a certain effort of mind, and it is contrary to high-born nature to take so much trouble as that implies. When a man is accustomed to assistance in everything, even in putting on his shirt, it needs a certain heroism to face alone even a friendly audience or a blank sheet of note-paper. A private secretary can coach up the facts for the speech, he can even draft the outline of the letter. But when the Duke speaks, his mind revolves in splendid isolation, confronting fate. Carlyle used to commend the aristocracy for what he called their "cheerful stoicism," and we also can gratefully appreciate the stoicism and the cheerfulness required by a Duke when he makes his utterance and reads it in the papers next day.

From the first it has been an open question which of our liege-lords has supplied us with the finest examples of aristocratic eloquence and reasoning. One after another in turn has brought a new joy to the Peers' enemies and a fresh confusion to all who, for one reason or another, are attempting their defence. Never have public utterances been so carefully advertised by opponents, or hurried by supporters into such hasty oblivion. The speeches of the Dukes alone would have wrecked any cause, and we doubt if all the eloquence of Government orators has done so much to vindicate the Constitution as some little revealing phrase of a peer addressing his tenants for their good. But one of the latest of these utterances ranks among the best, and there is hardly a Peer in the legislature who could have surpassed the Duke of Sutherland's Christmas greeting to his vassals and retainers. Addressing his employes and pensioners, this owner of over a million and a quarter acres of our country, and of one of the most splendid palaces in Europe, thus begins:—

"I cannot resist the feeling at this crisis that I ought to draw the attention of those who receive wages and pensions on these estates to the present political situation, and how it may affect all those who receive all these wages and pensions."

That is the introduction. Its apologetic tone is something like the Bishop of Salisbury's, who writes to Canon Morrice that he "desires to leave Churchmen free to exercise their franchise according to their conscience, without imputation of disloyalty to the Church," but regrets that on this occasion he is obliged to give them a lead. His reason for interference with the votes which Churchmen might be disposed to give in the cause of the people, is that "the declarations of Cabinet Ministers have lifted discussion into the region of principle"—a reason that sounds very noble indeed till we discover the region of principle to be nothing but the old, old questions of the Lords, Home Rule, Welsh Disestablishment, and undenominational education, and begin to suspect that the Bishop is an inveterate old Tory war-horse, scenting the battle from afar, and masking his partizanship under this fine name or that. True, the good Bishop foresees revolution, or a series of revolutions, instead of progress on lines "slowly broadening down from precedent to precedent." We should receive this admonition with meekness did it not come from a member of a House which has just defied all precedent and violently abrogated the Constitution.

But to return from this elevated region of principle to the mere temporal Peer. He, at all events, leaves principles alone and keeps his eye on his pocket. He will refer "only to that portion of this controversy that will have an immediate and direct bearing on the management and welfare of these estates." The Duke proceeds to give the alternative policies so plainly that the humblest of his dependents can only misunderstand the issue at his peril. On the one side he puts Tariff Reform, which, he says, must increase employment by putting taxes on finished foreign manufactures. "All raw material," he adds, "would of course come in free," and yet from £16,000,000 to £20,000,000 a year would be got from "the foreigner." And, besides providing employment, Tariff Reform would also provide for the defence of the country, a Preference with the Colonies, &c. There is a fine, careless rapture about that " &c."

On the other side the Duke of Sutherland sets the Budget, which, he maintains, would reduce employment by increased income-tax, death duties, and a super-tax on the very wealthy. Then, having called to his retainers to look on this picture and on that, he concludes with the gentle fervor of an apostolic Epistle:—

"I have written this to you, as so much trouble is being taken to deceive you on this question. Nothing would give me greater sorrow than being forcibly compelled to reduce wages and pensions."

In these pastoral sentences lies the whole purport of the letter. It is bad enough that the Duke, who as President of the Tariff Reform League should know something about Tariff Reform, represents it in a shape which we must charitably hope was unintentionally deceptive; for, except the League's President, there is hardly a Tariff Reformer left who talks of taxing only finished foreign manufactures, and, except the President, there is hardly one so ignorant as to imply that the money can be raised without taxing food. It is bad enough for a Duke who poses as an economist to assume that the work of the country depends upon the expenditure of the rich upon their luxuries, and that the rich are trying to dodge the new taxes only for the sake of the dependents that those luxuries employ. But all this slipshod politics and forced logic is better than the threat, hardly veiled with decency, that, unless his employés and pensioners vote for the House of Lords, the Duke will turn them out to starve.

The day after the Duke's letter appeared, the "Manchester Guardian" mentioned a case which it had carefully investigated. A woman bought a bottle of whisky for 3s 3d., and the publican who sold it took her name and address, saying she would get 5d. back if the Tories came in. As a woman has no vote, she was expected to win over her husband by an impudent bribe. We can only suppose that this method of corrupting the electorate was authorised by liquor directors, many of whom sit in the House of Lords. Such a device ought to come under the Corrupt Practices Act, but, in our opinion, the Duke's method is equally corrupt, only meaner and more pitiless. The Duke of Buccleuch, who stands second among the owners of our land, began by cutting off a guinea subscription to a cricket club, but the Duke of Sutherland goes one better. He holds the threat of starvation over the heads of his workpeople and pensioners if he is "forcibly compelled" by the Budget to reduce that stately consumption of the wealth produced by others which Mr. Lloyd George has defined as the landlord's sole function and chief pride. To us there may be something ridiculous as well as odious in such a threat. But we cannot expect the unfortunate families, whose livelihood depends on the caprice of an enormously wealthy man, to recognise the humor of it. To them the alternative between selling their conscience and risking destitution is a terrible reality, and the only retort of Liberalism is to see to it that no Duke or other human being in this kingdom shall, by reason of his possessions, retain so malign an authority over another man's soul.

FROM ARMED TRUCE TO ARRANGEMENT.

DIPLOMACY is, of all the methods of human intercourse, the most conservative and the least likely to adopt a novel or original procedure. When the force of circumstances does induce it to strike out a comparatively new method, its tendency is to repeat it once and again with a patient confidence in the value of any expedient which has succeeded. The process by which we reached an entente cordiale with France was faithfully followed in our dealings with Russia, despite the fact that in that case the psychological conditions which governed the approach were totally different and much less hopeful. There is no longer a doubt that a serious effort is being made, with equal good will on both sides, to arrange a rapprochement with Germany, and once more diplomacy has had resort to the well-tried method. One by one the few controversies of detail which might give rise to friction are being removed, and the expectation is that the result will necessarily be, as was the case in our dealings with France, a state, if not of cordiality, at least of confidence, appeasement, and assured friendliness. For our part, we do not find the analogy altogether convincing. Our disputes with France in Egypt, and to a less extent in Morocco, were not merely the symptoms of the mistrust which had prevailed for a quarter of a century. They were its causes. The quarrel over our position on the Nile in all its many phases, from the bombardment of Alexandria down to the occupation of Fashoda, was the explanation, and practically the sole explanation, of all the recriminations, the pinpricks, the naval scares, and the Press polemics which had embittered our relations. Our difficulties with Germany, on the contrary, have been singularly elusive. It is possible, by looking carefully over the map of Africa, to find a variety of little differences which it is pleasant and useful to clear up. But not one of them, even in the angrier moments of our late discords, had ever led to a degree of friction which could be called uncomfortable, still less risky. It is also possible to find in the Bagdad Railway a ground for common action, and to use it to demonstrate our desire for co-operation in a way which ought, if we are careful to respect Turkish susceptibilities and interests, to advance the trade of both countries, while conferring great benefits upon a derelict but potentially wealthy region.

But these questions are not the causes of our estrangement, and it would be extravagant to expect that their settlement could greatly modify the central problem. Statements made by the "Frankfurter Zeitung" and the "Standard," which have an air of probability, have told us what we may at the best expect. By a series of detailed arrangements we shall reach a basis of agreement in all the affairs of Africa and the Near East. But there can be no modification in the German Naval Law. The laying down of four "Dreadnoughts" annually will continue up to 1912. But equally there will be no thought of increasing the modest provision of two great ships annually up to 1917, and thereafter the two Governments may agree to consult each other before fixing their building programmes. It would be a mistake to minimise even this measure of agreement. It should banish uncertainty. It should put an end to scares based on the suspicion of secret building and unavowed ambitions. It might cause the decay of the popular hostility from sheer inanition. It might bring about all over Europe a state of confidence and a belief that peace was assured for a long and certain period, which would be the best guarantee of its own permanence. But the fact would remain that we were still living under an armed peace, that our resources were still being squandered in armaments, and that Europe avoided war only by achieving an equipoise of forces. A recognised balance of power is incomparably preferable to a frenzied and uncertain competition. But it is none the less a handicap to progress, a burden upon the shoulders of the working-class, an incitement to revolt from below, and a temptation to intrigue from above.

There would remain, as we read the European situation, two factors making for unrest which such an arrangement as this would not at once remove. There is, first of all, the permanent weakness of France, aware, year by year, that the forty millions of her population are faced across the frontier by a race of sixty millions, whose numbers and resources are constantly growing. The suggestion, which Mr. Blatchford put so crudely and with so grotesque a show of altruism, that it is our duty to undertake the defence of France, only approaches practical politics if we assume that Germany contemplates a wanton attack on a good neighbor. Such an enterprise would obviously be a menace to Europe, and an offence to our common civilisation. But this is an academic question; Germany has no interest, no motive, to tempt her to so crazy an adventure. But have we treated it as if it were merely academic? Those who have followed recent controversies, who have read the "Temps," or the books of such semi-official authors as M. Tardieu and M. Mévil, cannot but fear lest an only nominally secret convention has bound us now for several years to render military and naval aid to France in the event of a German attack. Assuming such a convention as the real basis of our policy, it is clear that our present military resources are unequal to the strain which such an obligation would put upon them. We might be bound on paper to land only 100,000 men to assist the French armies, but when the test came, if ever it should come, we could not at any price afford to allow the war to be decided against our ally. If such a convention exists, it is the only argument for conscription which could count. The other difficulty, which no arrangement with Germany on the present basis would remove, is her determination to have a fleet strong enough, not, of course, to overcome our own, but at least to oppose to ours a resistance sufficiently formidable to make us chary of forcing a conflict. Such a navy would be useless for aggression. But it would introduce into diplomacy a factor new to us, and unwelcome to those who reckon that we must enter every negotiation with a fleet behind us that is not merely superior to any other, but so overwhelmingly superior as to make a conflict unthinkable.

Such factors as these we take to be in their nature unalterable. The relative weakness of France is as permanent as the determination of the German ruling class to free itself from the naval weakness which it felt to be a handicap to its diplomacy. But the relative weakness of any Power is not a sufficient explanation for pressure of the kind to which France has been subjected of late years. The peculiarity in the situation of France is that while she is relatively weak as a military Power she is enormously powerful in the domain of finance. She can, by her ability to lend, buy the support of Russia, contract a formidable partnership with England, and open up to exploitation such coveted fields as Morocco, with its rich mineral resources. The rattling of the German sabre is an answer to the clink of the French money bags. One must remember that French financial policy is sharply controlled by her Foreign Office, and has been used deliberately and persistently for a generation as a means of combating German ascendancy. When we talk of "defending" France, it is well to remember that it is not so much the cottage of the French peasant that is in danger, as the millions controlled by the French banks which have been used in every quarter of the globe as a formidable political engine. If French finance ceased to be political, the numerical weakness of her armies would no longer tempt the aggressor. He would have nothing to fear from peace; and nothing to gain from war. In the naval question the solution once more is to be found, we believe, simply in robbing naval warfare of its worst menace. By making merchantmen immune from capture, we should counter the only serious argument which makes a great navy a necessity. The political financier and the commerce-destroyer are the worst enemies of peace, for they alone provide an adequate motive for the resort to force and the accumulation of armaments.

Life and Letters.

THE MORAL OF THE HOARDINGS.

FROM time immemorial a General Election has been, for the English masses, that magic moment which is called in the Mohammedan calendar The Night of Power. For this once in the dreary waste of years the day laborer feels that his voice is inspired, that the Djinns do his bidding, and the powers of earth and sea await the favor of his command. It is for him the evening of Cinderella's ball, and he lays aside his hod and pickaxe to go dancing with a prince for partner. The highest in the land are competing for a month on end to find him entertainment. For him they balance their periods, sharpen their quips, and inflate their preorations. The hoardings are the visible sign of his importance. The distant and stupendous persons who govern an Empire have invaded his alley, paste brush in hand, as it were, to decorate his walls for him. They do it with a royal condescension. By a tacit understanding they conspire in his presence to make each other familiar, human, and even ludicrous. The festivity might, when one comes to think of it, have been arranged on quite another plan. Each side might have set its wits to work to render its own leaders formidable and portentous in the popular imagination. One can, for example, conceive of Tory cartoons in which Lord Curzon would have appeared in Viceregal state, seated, as at some Delhi Durbar, upon a symbolic elephant, to which the chiefs of the democratic Opposition did homage. Mr. Balfour might figure as some shadowy Demogorgon spinning the dark ambiguities of destiny in some metaphysical cave on the world's edge, while Lord Lansdowne, a more definite but still alarming figure of Fate, slit the thin-spun thread of legislative ghosts. In fact, neither party attempts in this way to impress public opinion. The hoardings represent an impartial attempt, sedulously prosecuted by both sides, to render all the nation's leaders, occasionally sinister, but nearly always ridiculous. One might almost conceive it to be a revolt of the electors against the assumptions of elected persons, the revenge of the weary-footed Roman legionary at his general's triumph. It is a purely Anglo-Saxon development of representative government. Visit a French town at election time, and you will find on the walls nothing but promises and rhetoric in prose. We alone are sufficiently docile, sufficiently sedate to indulge with impunity in a systematic campaign of ridicule against our rulers.

There is in this election no single personal figure who dominates the hoardings in caricature. The Budget is the centre of the fight and the Budget is the work of one man. Yet the Conservative caricaturist is singularly shy of handling the figure of the Chancellor. His instructions have clearly been to attempt the pathetic, to "talk unemployment" in colored presentments of gaunt working-men and starving families. He has obeyed the word of order with commendable skill. If those cartoons of the desperate workless laborer with the sunken jaw and the clean hands that tell of idle days had been designed by the Labor Party, they would have made a direct and immediate impression. They fail only by their patent insincerity. One thinks regretfully of other elections in which there figured the Grand Old Man with his symbolic axe, and Mr. Chamberlain disguised, as Sir F. C. Gould used to see him, in the familiar fur of Brer Fox. There is nothing in the personality either of Mr. Asquith or of Mr. Balfour which lends itself to such direct and successful handling as that. Both of them are intellects, and neither logic nor sophistry can be rendered on the hoardings. The real hero of this campaign is the Duke. He is a singularly impersonal figure, for of all the little band there is not a man whose visage or deportment is familiar to the masses. Not a Duke of them all has emerged from the almost anonymous obscurity of greatness since the last of the notable Argylls argued with Huxley and anathematised Gladstone. We know them only as rent-receivers, and the patrons of Tariff Reform. But the very obscurity of the type has been the caricaturist's opportunity. He revels in coronets and ermine, spends himself in garters and court hose, and fits within these gorgeous trappings the insignificant figure which represents the mere hereditary principle. His simplest efforts are, perhaps, his happiest. The conception of the joyful peer dancing a wild jig to the legend "Tariff Reform means happier Dukes," goes straight to the essential issues of this contest, though the execution is hardly worthy of the idea.

There is a direct and visible moral, too, in the portrait of a peer consulting his constituents—in a mirror. Lord Lansdowne, in white overalls on a cricket field as the unfair umpire who never gives his own side out, contributes happily to a just rendering of the situation. But of all these Liberal official cartoons the wittiest and the most original is certainly the sketch of the two Dukes in coronet and ermine, who remark to the elusive figure of Mr. Lloyd George seated on a flying machine, "Hi! There! That's our air." There is the same moral in the "Morning Leader's" cartoon of a Duke who extends his ill-developed arms in an effort to keep the crowd of laborers and farmers behind him "off the land." There is a more elaborate, but still effective, parable in the picture of the working man staggering under a load of taxes, who attempts to lift them on to a ducal motor car, only to be told by the noble owner that it will spoil the cushions. The "Leader's" cartoons, for all their roughness and their wilful ugliness in execution, are often particularly happy in their conception. We like its vision of the peer surrounded by the flood tide of democratic indignation, who exclaims as his throne of privilege floats past him, "I was given to understand that someone was going to dam the consequences."

The hoardings are interesting, not merely for what they reveal, but also for what they conceal. The democratic case is at least presented with a commendable directness. The veto, the new taxes, the struggle against the land monopoly, they are all on the walls in bold designs and pictorial arguments. Some of the symbolism is trite and obvious, much of it is fresh and telling. But this may be said fairly of it all—it does present, with perfect sincerity, the arguments by which the popular cause is defended on the platform and in the Press. The Tory case, on the other hand, has passed through a deliberate and very significant process of selection. We have not seen on the hoardings a single cartoon which attempts any general defence of an unrepresentative Upper House. The Dukes figure only in their opponents' cartoons. For any symbolic rendering of Lord Curzon's whole-hearted exaltation of the aristocratic principle, one looks in vain. From any attempt to glorify or render sympathetic the receiver of ground rents, or the beneficiaries of unearned increments, the party of monopoly has weakly shrunk. There are a few efforts to depict the Socialist bogey, and one or two conspicuous attempts to make the most of the foreign competitor and the dumper. But the whole pictorial talent of the Opposition's artists has been employed in "talking unemployment." One could ask for no more eloquent admission that the brief which the Opposition has accepted is, in its own judgment, unpopular and all but indefensible.

When the documents of this constitutional crisis come to be collected, there is one moral which the critical historian will find obvious in them all. Whatever may be the relative temperature which the struggle has engendered, however far it departs from the normal lines of our party warfare, there is not in any of these cartoons a hint of the passions which in other countries master the cartoonist's pencil in revolutionary epochs. The fun and the humor are invariably good-natured and almost gentle. Of savage satire there is not a trace. Of the anger which heats the blood there is not a symptom. It is all the temperate chaff of two parties which allow the tacit recognition of the common ground between them to limit and control their warfare. One has only to think of the wild outbreak of caricature and satire which marked the few free weeks of the Russian revolution to perceive how gentle and forbear-ing our own efforts really are. It is the fun of a pantomime compared with the grim and ghastly humors of an inferno. There are some accidental reasons which explain the comparative tameness and forbearance of the English caricaturist. He works invariably for a party or for a party newspaper. He must produce only what will appeal to the conventional mind of the man of middle views. Limited by these conditions, he never develops the daring of his French and German, not to mention his Russian, colleagues. They are individual pencils, free to doubt of everything, to satirise everything, to render hateful and grim not only the party foe, but, if so they please, society or mankind itself. Our own cartoonists are free to doubt of one-half of the accepted conventions, but of no more than one-half. If the limitation makes for suavity and good nature, it does not make for boldness or for fire. But more important is the absence of any sincere and overmastering anger or fear. The Conservative cartoonist may think that what he calls "Socialism" is going to restrict the luxuries of his paymasters, but he does not really think that it is going to submerge civilisation or establish a reign of terror. The motive to powerful work is absent. The Liberal cartoonist is probably at heart rather amused than alarmed by the pretensions of the Upper House. He is secure in his vision of the ultimate popular triumph, and the result is that his pencil does not burn the paper on which it works, as though he were a Russian artist, himself just liberated from prison and expecting to witness his brother's hanging on the day after to-morrow. Our political art, in short, is essentially the art of comfort and safety. It lacks the stimulus of physical fear and violent anger. It abhors excess. It succeeds by happy quips and kindly thrusts which inflict no wounds. It is an aid to argument rather than a call to arms.

THE ART OF SPENDING.

We in this country have something to learn from the Americans. We are not for the moment thinking of their democratic spirit, their political institutions, their social frankness and equalitarian ways, of their peculiar brand of humor, or of their improvements in the English language and their economies in spelling. We have before us an example of a way of scattering money broadcast which Dukes might read and perpend. We confess with shame that we read in the papers the name of Mr. George F. Kessler for the first time—with shame, for he is, it appears, already famous. "In America he is known as the champagne king," not, we gather from the context for the quality of his vintages, but because he poureth out champagne like water. He was, we learn from the "Daily Telegraph," the host of the "famous" gondola dinner at the Savoy Hotel four years ago. We did not know it was famous, and we should not have thought that gondolas were good to eat. But, however that may be, he has eclipsed himself. He has given a "North Pole" dinner at a cost of £60 a head for thirty-four guests. Expense, one might say carelessly, was no object. But, on the contrary, expense is clearly the main object. To spend £2,000 on a dinner requires genius. It is not to be achieved by every man who has £2,000 to waste. It was, indeed, eked out by the inclusion of "costly" presents to the guests—guests at dinners of this type expect a perquisite—and by gifts to a hospital—such a show is not complete without the philanthropic trail over it. There were only seventeen courses, and a large part of the money seems to have been run through in devising polar scenery and dressing up the waiters as Esquimaux. In the humbler ranks of life we keep amusements of this kind for our children's parties. The millionaires, poor souls, having melted down all the interests of grown-up life into gold, have to fall back on the make-belief of babies. They appear perfectly satisfied with their games, however silly, provided they cost a great deal. For, after all, to show that you have money that you can literally fling away upon the utterly nonsensical has advertising value.

There is in the end that one element of reality in the tinsel.

Well, it may be asked, what concern is it of ours? If Mr. George F. Kessler likes to dress up waiters like Esquimaux, and if his guests like to take "costly presents" from him, why should they not enjoy themselves as they please? If our Dukes imbibed some of that spirit of glorious extravagance, perhaps they would give up writing mean letters to their pensioners. We would rather dine with Mr. George F. Kessler at his £2,000 banquet than share the repast to be paid for, when the Budget has gone through, with the sixpences which a certain noble Duke intends to screw out of the pensions, amount unspecified, which he has hitherto allowed to his aged working folk. In all seriousness, we would suggest to Mr. Kessler, for his next essay, a "Budget" dinner to which Dukes and all who have docked poor peoples' pensions should be invited. Mr. George F. Kessler will show the Duke of Sutherland that he does not know what spending money is. So, before we say a word against our American guest, let us protest that, as compared with "our old aristocracy" in this the latest—could we but say the last—phase of its existence, he is a shining light and a beacon set upon a lofty hill.

But there is another side to the question. We are not all Dukes, and most of us succeed in paying away yearly a substantial proportion of our income without "taking it out" of our servants, or docking our old nurse of sixpence out of the few shillings that we are able to spare for her. Most of us, moreover, below the rank of Duke, if we did anything so unspeakably mean, would not be so incredibly foolish as to brag of it. We do not need Mr. George F. Kessler's lesson in the art of spending. There is such an art. As Ruskin tried to teach us, it is perhaps the highest and most difficult of arts. In a sense, it includes all others, and contains within it the true principles of social economy. We do not think that Mr. George F. Kessler, though he has advanced beyond the Duke of Sutherland, has advanced far in this art. We will mention only one very crude and obvious criticism. About a stone's-throw from the Savoy Hotel Mr. Kessler's guests might have detected a number of objects, dim, drab, dirty objects, drifting about the Embankment, loitering under Waterloo Bridge, huddling together for warmth when the wind blew, and perhaps sinking on to the stone steps leading up to the bridge for an occasional sleep. At a certain hour, unless the practice has changed recently, they might have observed numbers of these objects erect upon two legs, and revealing themselves as having once been men and women, drifting off with more appearance of purpose in the direction of one of the philanthropic shelters where soup is provided gratis or in return for a small task. "And a wicked waste of money too," we imagine any economist among them saying. "After all these years of the Charity Organisation Society have not people learnt to do better with their money than that?" Well, we do not advocate indiscriminate alms-giving. On the whole, we think it, perhaps, the worst way but one of spending money, but that one is the childish extravagance of a "North Pole" dinner. Had Mr. Kessler taken his 2,000 sovereigns in a bag and presented one a-piece to each homeless waif that he could find in the streets that night, it would have been a very foolish and wasteful thing to do. But it is possible that one sovereign out of the 2,000 might have saved a man or woman from ruin, from disease, or even from death. The £2,000 might have at least contributed to the temporary happiness of one individual, instead of ministering to the brainless extravagance of a silly set. The superstition that luxury of this kind has its uses, and helps to "give employment," dies hard. We fancy that the chief use to which the new type of millionaire will find that it is being put, is that of making the world at large probe more deeply into questions of the value of wealth, the social function that it serves, the uses and the calibre of a class that takes its amusement after this fashion. One thing is certain. If the possession of vast wealth and power were normally to issue in such a blend of meanness with arrogance as our "aristocracy" has displayed to an astonished world in these last months, or alternatively in such senseless follies as Mr. Kessler's dinners—if these things were normal, and not exceptional—the vast fortunes of to-day would not be tolerated. There would long ere now have been social upheavals which might have been futile and vain, but would, at least, have expressed the general sense of the need of some regulating principle, however dim, in the use and enjoyment of the vast resources which success in the modern world places in the hands of the favored.

"A NATION ONCE AGAIN."

WHEN from time to time the sick body of Ireland is dragged out of prison for medical inspection, the diagnosis of the learned takes various forms. "It was the suppression of her trade that weakened her first," says one. "Her blood has been unduly thinned by emigration," says another. "Parasites have sapped her strength," says a third. "Owing to the strife of part-colored corpuscles in her system, she has no constitution," says a fourth. "It's all her own silly obstinacy," say the rest, and back she goes to her cell, or to further "treatment" in the prison hospital.

All the doctors are in some sense right. The outward aspects of that long disease, the life of Ireland, have been what they describe. England did suppress her trade; she has reduced her population by more than half; she has sucked her blood, and engendered parties that maintain a perpetual strife in her system. Ireland, obstinate in her hunger-strike, neither forgets nor is conciliated. But if we would detect the ultimate causes of her sickness, we must go deeper than it is the business of doctors and politicians to look. For it is in the very depths of personality that Ireland has suffered wrong. Certainly, she has been deprived of her trade, her land, and her people; but it is not merely the restoration of these that will heal her sickness. It is not merely freedom from alien law, and the right to direct her own affairs, that she now demands—she, the Suffragette of nations. Her demand is for the right to personality, and the restoration of her own soul.

What she has lost since the English invasion may be seen even more clearly in her literature than in such a book as Mrs. Green's history of her commercial ruin. Take such a summary, for instance, as "The Dublin Book of Irish Verse," now collected by Mr. John Cooke for Messrs. Hodges & Figgis, of Dublin. It is a good collection, carefully edited, and, as a rule, wisely chosen, though, among the living poets, the very best examples of their verse have not been given, perhaps for reasons of copyright. It is modelled on Mr. Quiller-Couch's "Oxford Book of Verse," and to the Irish people it is meant to be of equal service. We only wish it could be so, but how melancholy, how accusing is the difference! In the first place, the Dublin Book is shorter than the Oxford by some 340 poems, and yet it is too long. Much would have been gained by omission, for there is much that does not reach a very high level, and in poetry especially, as in everything but love and rage, the half is always greater than the whole. They asked Grania, Dermid's lover, which was the best of jewels, and she replied, "The knife." It is a word to be remembered by men, women, and writers.

The Irish editor may plead that he had to make his selection over a much smaller space of time; and that, to be sure, is true, but, again, how melancholy, how accusing is the plea! The Oxford Book can go back six hundred, almost seven hundred years, for lyrics that are still comprehensible to every Englishman without much trouble. In them he finds a language being slowly built up out of various elements, but founded on one powerful basis. It is still uncouth, unmelodious, and a little cumbersome, like the original Low-Dutch stock of men who imported it with them; but it is his own language, and in it he can see, already forming like radiant crystals, all those secondary meanings, those associations, those subtleties of light which are of necessity and for ever hidden from the foreigner's eyes. At least four centuries ago the English language was already a fine instrument for poetic expression, and every generation has further developed its capacity, either for verse or prose. It is part of the English people; baby after baby has sucked it in; and a race that has not similarly secreted and imbibed its own language can but remain half-deaf and half-dumb, no matter with what skill it may contribute to the Babel of a table-d'hôte.

Literature is the expression of a national soul, and only in a nation's own language is expression possible. By imposing their language upon Ireland, the English cut out Ireland's tongue, not for love, like the mermaid's in the story, but for hatred. To begin his selection the Dublin editor cannot go back more than a hundred-and-fifty years. Instead of opening his book of national verse with "Sumer is icumen in," as the Oxford Book opens, he gives us on the first page, "When lovely Woman stoops to folly." Here is no germ, no growth, no development, no mother's milk. Instead of some unknown singer, stumbling, as it were, through woods and country lanes, towards the dim vision of poetry, we have Goldsmith and Sheridan tripping at ease along the pavements of the town, while they discourse in artificial accents upon the best way of wringing a lover's bosom or toasting the sex as a whole.

It is not that Goldsmith was a bad poet. Taken in his order among the English poets of the eighteenth century, he holds a high place secure. But he hardly represents the national literature of Ireland at all. He chiefly illustrates that irony of fate which imposed a foreign language upon a sensitive and deeply poetic people, just at the time when that language had taken its most unsensitive and prosaic form. As this Dublin Book shows, it was only in the eighteenth century that the Irish adopted English as their literary instrument, and then it was only under the compulsion either of penalty or genteel fashion. At no other period could the English tongue have wrought greater mischief. The most insincere and rhetorical form that the language has ever taken became established throughout the country as the standard of literary elegance, and the Irish poets, almost as incapable as Germans of judging what was really good or bad in these foreign expressions, stuck persistently to its conventional graces. What wretched stuff Burns wrote when he attempted English, how chilly, and stilted, and poor! But Burns had inherited a genuine language of his own, and could use it for everything of value that he composed. Irish poets had no language of their own that they could use, and for over a century they struggled vainly with a foreign medium, chilly, stilted, and poor. The result was that immense accumulation of facile and jejune verse, out of which the Dublin Book's editor has tried to winnow everything that is marked by distinction. In the history of the most lyrical of races there are few things more pathetic than this little heap of savings.

We call the Irish the most lyrical of races on the strength of evidence that any Englishman may test for himself—the evidence of the history of Irish poetry, as told by scholars like Dr. Joyce, or of the translations from the Irish poems themselves, as made by scholar-poets like Ferguson, Dr. Sigerson, Dr. Douglas Hyde, and Lady Gregory. Though literature can never be transferred into another language, these are things that even an Englishman can partly appreciate, and they are enough to show that deep-running quality of lyrical mood and expression. Take only the song called "The Brow of Nevin," the mountain that rises over Castlebar in County Mayo. Or, as that is long to quote, take three verses already known to all lovers of poetry; first, one verse from a "Love-song of Connacht," in Dr. Hyde's translation:—

"My love, oh! she is my love, the woman who is most for destroying me; dearer is she from making me ill than the woman who would be for making me well. She is my treasure, oh, she is my treasure, the woman of the grey eye, she is like the rose, a woman who would not place a hand beneath my head, a woman who would not go with me for gold."

And then two verses from the noble poem, known in the South of Ireland and in Aran as "The Grief of a Girl's Heart"; Lady Gregory's version gives them thus:—

"It is late last night the dog was speaking of you; the snipe was speaking of you in her deep marsh. It is you are the lonely bird through the woods; and that you may be without a mate until you find me. . . .

"You have taken the east from me; you have taken the west from me; you have taken the moon, you have taken the sun from me; and my fear is great that you have taken God from me!"

Even under the trammels of foreign speech and rhetorical diction that lyrical spirit burst out from time to time in last century's Ireland. We hear it in Moore when he sang his best—when he sang "Oft in the stilly night," "She is far from the land," and a few other songs. We hear it in Ferguson's "Lament of Deirdra" ("The lions of the hill are gone"); in some songs of exile, like Boucicault's "I'm very happy where I am"; in Arthur O'Shaughnessy's ode ("We are the music-makers"); and in some of the street songs, such as "I wish I were on yonder hill," the national ballad with the refrain "Gone, boys—gone," "The West's Awake," and a few others, down to the ballads in honor of the Irish Brigade in the Boer War. Throughout the miseries of last century the best inspiration of the lyrical spirit inevitably arose from patriotic sorrow or rage, and for that cause, Mangan's "Dark Rosaleen" may stand as the noblest poem composed by an Irishman during four generations.

But long since Mangan's pitiful death, just after the Famine time, there came a new note, a new power into the work of Irish poets who use the English language. It would be hard to say exactly where it was heard first; perhaps in Standish O'Grady's solemn address to Ireland, beginning, "I give my heart to thee, O mother-land." But for the moment we cannot date that poem, and in any case it was soon followed by the work of younger men—such poets, we mean, as William Yeats, George Russell ("A. E."), Lionel Johnson, Alice Milligan, John Synge, Anna MacManus, Padraic Colum, James Stephens, and about half-a-dozen more. By no means of equal magnitude, and sometimes opposed to each other in their courses, these poets have one quality in common: all use English verse and the English language with mastery, and not as natives of another land working in a foreign medium, nor yet as the Irish writers who clung to eighteenth-century thought and expression long after Wordsworth and his contemporaries had shaken them off.

One peculiar result is that very nearly half this Dublin Book is occupied with the work of poets still living, or alive within the last ten years. Even more remarkable is it that to these Irish poets English poetic literature owes its only important movement since the early days of Tennyson, Browning, and Swinburne. How, then, are we to describe them? Not one of them would endure to be called English; even to call them Anglo-Irish implies a certain slight; and yet they are not Irish, for we believe that, with the exception of Douglas Hyde, none of them have used the Irish language at all familiarly for their verse. One of the chief problems before Ireland at this moment lies in the question what her literary language is to be. Possibly the poets, having now become masters of an instrument, will continue to use English, or some Irish variety of it, such as Lady Gregory uses in her translations, and Mr. Yeats in some of his prose. Or, perhaps, the very perfection of the instrument will kill the art, as often happens. Or there is the chance that, as in Bohemia, the native language may be so revived as to become the whole country's mother-tongue again. To England that would be an irreparable loss, for English literature would then lose the twilight vision and the wistfulness, "the tender voice calling 'Away,'" "the heart-break over fallen things," which "A. E." identifies with Dana. But whatever the loss to other people, a country that would be a nation once again has only herself to consider, and her choice, however difficult, will have national personality as its single aim.

ON PLAYING CARDS.

THERE are few things pleasanter than picking up one's cards at an old-fashioned game of whist. The dealer turns up the trump card on the table, and then comes the leisurely arrangement of the alternate suits of red and black in the proper order of the têtes and pips. The turning up of the trump card, and the leaving it uncovered till the first trick is played is of the essence of the old, delightful game. The selection of the trumps should surely be the work of destiny, not of any human agent, as when Archbishop Howley, playing whist with his chaplains, chose his own strong suit, or as in the new, fantastic game of bridge, where the whole question is in a state of irritating suspense and doubt for some time after the picking up of the cards, too often to be followed by the declaration of spades, and the consequent throwing down of the hand. The mention of bridge touches a sore spot for the few remaining lovers of the incomparable game. In a restless generation the sufferings of the conservative minority are rarely apprehended with any degree of sympathy, but they must always appeal strongly to the truly humane mind. The present writer for one can never regard bridge as anything else than a violent perversion, in the interests of gambling, of the best game in the world. It altogether lacks the repose, the simplicity, the continuity of the older game, the qualities so essential to a good game, which whist possessed in such an eminent degree. The arbitrary variation in the value of the suits is peculiarly irritating to a whist player. Bridge surely can never become such an abiding source of human solace as the whist known to Mrs. Battle and the Dowagers with whom Mr. Pickwick played at Bath. In English literature whist holds a high affectionate place; if when bridge has run its inevitable course it is found to have left any mark at all, its connotation will be wholly bad.

There are still out-of-the-way corners of the land where the old game is played. The writer remembers, in a remote Yorkshire valley, four old farmers who met regularly for their rubber once or twice a week. One thing only troubled their enjoyment of the game, and that was, that with all their efforts they could never succeed in remembering to whom the deal rightfully belonged. The device they finally adopted was that the dealer should wear a nightcap, which was handed on with the cards to each player in turn. One sees the scene even now; the winter night outside with the world "happed up wi' snaw," as in that country we used to say, and within, the four old neighbors, with the dealer nightcap-crowned, in the cheerful warmth, and the silence broken only by the ticking of the grandfather's clock, at peace in the ease and abandonment of the game.

Cards, indeed, make their appeal to all sorts and conditions of men—from the rag-and-bone man to the Summus Pontifex. They have been a favorite solace of many ecclesiastics—Popes, and even canonised Saints. Picquet must have lightened the fatigues of journeying for many an old country bishop going about his diocese in bad weather over impassable roads in seventeenth century France. Leo X. is said to have practised "bluffing," and St. Francis de Sales sometimes to have cheated at cards. One hopes, indeed, that the present Pontiff, amid so many cares and scandals (as he thinks, for instance, of the death of Ferrer, and of Leopold, faring forth on his long journey, fortified with the Apostolic blessing, and laden with baskets of human hands), can find a brief forgetfulness in the "tresette" he so loved as Patriarch of Venice, and as a humble parish priest. "Tresette" belongs to some simple presbytery of the Veneto, far from these grisly things. The name suggests a fire of roaring logs, and chestnuts, and white wine. For humbler people in quiet places, cards often pleasantly fill up the long candle-light leisure of winter evenings. Round the green meadow of the card table, a summer in the midst of winter, the strife and rumor of the world is still. What a picture of intimate and careless ease is called up by the words of the old dame in the play of "Gammer Gurton's Needle"—

"What, Diccon, come nere, ye be no stranger,
We be fast set at trump, man, hard by the fire."

This play was published in 1551, and it rejoices one to think that such scenes of quiet human enjoyment were going on all through the hangings, and burnings, and bowellings of that atrocious time. The sixteenth century "trump" is probably the same game as our whist. It was also called "ruff," and to this day trumping is spoken of as "ruffing."

These lines must not be taken as an apology for "bumble puppy," but the writer believes that whist was killed by becoming too scientific—there passed away from it the breathless excitement felt by the old uncertain players, the sense of adventure with which, as third player, they played their highest card, the literal "triumph" with which they produced the last hoarded trumps. They played badly, often, no doubt, but they played with an absorbed interest and a keen enjoyment. One has heard an Italian lady, when her Knave was swallowed up by the next player's Queen, exclaim "Mio Dio," with the accent of one who beholds the catastrophe of Messina. This was doubtless southern, but English people played with the same intentness.

Sarah Battle delighted, it will be remembered, in the "imagery" of the game. She denied the right of chess to knights and castles. "Those hard-head contests can in no instance ally with the fancy. They reject form and color. A pencil and a slate (she used to say) were the proper arena for such combatants." In France the "imagery" of the cards is more romantic than with us. The court cards (they used sometimes, by the way, to be spoken of as "coat cards") all bear the names of kings and knights and ladies of romance. These have varied from time to time, but the names that have survived are Charles, Cæsar, Alexander, David, for the Kings; Judith, Rachel, Argine, Pallas, for the Queens; La Hire, Hector, Lancelot, Hogier, for the Knaves. The writer confesses his ignorance as to who Argine was. Hogier is, of course, the Dane, and La Hire the Squire of Jeanne the Maid. These honorable names show the injustice of the aspersion cast on the Order of Knaves by the familiar rhyme:—

"The Queen of Hearts, she made some tarts,
All on a summer's day;
The Knave of Hearts, he stole those tarts,
And took them all away."

"Knave" is, of course, the German "Knabe," the noble, knightly boy attending on the King and Queen. Chaucer speaks, by the way, of a "knave-child," and a "maid-child."

The marks of the suits have varied greatly since the introduction of cards into Europe. There existed in the fifteenth century cards with the truly delightful signs of Hares, Parroquets, Pinks, and Columbines, though these were never very widely used. The German signs are Bells, Leaves, Hearts, and Acorns. In Italy, until the sixteenth century, as in Spain till the present day, the signs used were Swords, Cups, Clubs, and Money—Spade, Coppe, Bastoni, Danari; or in Spanish, Espadas, Copas, Bastor, Oros. Our "Clubs" and "Spades" are the names for the suits of "Bastoni" and "Spade," affixed to the marks of the French cards. The "Trèfle," trefoil, clover, was originally the "Fleur." In Italy it is still called "Fiore."

There were many names for the different cards, and much lore about them, known to the old leisured players. To give one instance mentioned by Charles Lamb. He speaks of "the pretty antic habits, like heralds in a procession—the gay triumph-assuring scarlets—the contrasting deadly-killing sables—the 'hoary majesty of spades'—Pam in his glory." "Pam" is an old name for the Knave of Clubs. Old-fashioned players always called the Four of Clubs "the devil's bed-post." "Hob Collingwood" is said to have been a North-country name for the Four of Hearts, though the writer has never heard it. At modern bridge parties one never hears such old sayings as "there's luck under the deuce, but none under the tray." The very terms "deuce" and "tray" survive but faintly, and are ready to vanish away. The writer remembers an old lady with whom the expression "Deuce and Tray" was a continual exclamation. "Deuce and Tray!" she would cry out, "I've lost my snuff-box." It appears improbable that any quaint superstition, any fanciful imagery, any leisurely proverbial wisdom will ever gather round the game of bridge, which seems a pastime more suited to hard and mercenary spirits than to the "Utopian Rabelaisian Christians" of whom Elia writes.

Short Studies.

A HOME-MADE RELIGION.

SUSAN STAPLETON was the daughter of a country doctor who practised at Haling, in the Eastern Midlands. She was now about five-and-forty years old. Her father died twenty-five years ago, and her mother had died ten years earlier. After her father's death she found she could no longer remain in Haling. Its associations were painful, and she was obliged to economise. She went to her old friends, Mr. and Mrs. Barfield, of Lower Hatch Farm, about two miles from Haling, and the visit, which at first was to be for a month, had been lengthened, until it was clear that unless anything quite unforeseen happened she would end her days there. She had plenty to do, although she did not encroach on Mrs. Barfield's domain of poultry and butter. She looked after the linen, kept Mr. Barfield's accounts, and did part of the cooking, at which she was an expert.

Lower Hatch Farm was at the end of a narrow lane, which expanded into three or four acres of idle, grassy field or meadow, in which stood three or four big elms. At the side was a large pond, in which geese and ducks disported themselves. The silence of this remote corner of the earth, save for the natural noises belonging to it, was almost complete. Miss Stapleton had a quick ear, and with a south-west wind could distinguish the mill half a mile below. The music of the brook falling on the overshot wheel and escaping into the mill-pond rose and fell, at one moment distinct and at the next dying down to nothing. At night, when the mill was not working, she could just hear the water tumbling over the weir. Strange to say, considering this was the first half of the last century, she slept with her windows open.

Miss Stapleton read few books besides her Bible. This she read thoroughly and believed unhesitatingly. It never entered her head to inquire if it was true. There the Gospel was, like the blessed sun and rain. The sun was hot in summer and ripened the corn; the rain quenched the thirst of the fields. She did not ask whence the sun drew his heat, nor how the rain was stored in the clouds. She made for the New Testament a background out of materials which lay near the farm. Capernaum Lake and Haling Mere, for example, were curiously shot in her mind, one with the other, like some woven fabric of diverse but related colors. Nothing in the New Testament was foreign to the fields at Lower Hatch. At times one might almost see Jesus kneeling on the hill at the end of the Mere and praying Our Father.

One evening just before harvest time Miss Stapleton was walking home from Haling. The footpath led through two cornfields, and she thought of our Lord and of the disciples plucking the ears of corn. The picture was wonderfully bright. She saw herself behind Him, and yet edging as near as possible, so that she might not miss a word. He stopped and looked towards the west, over the motionless wheat, and shaded His eyes from the rays of the sun near to its setting. The vision reappeared in all its splendor and beauty every harvest-time when she went through those fields. Nor was it wholly confined to that season, but whenever she sat on one of the stiles, although it might be a still, gloomy day in November, and a wet fog hung low, she could plainly discern the sun and the ripening corn and her Master.

Haling Mere, Lower Hatch Farm, the harvest fields, and her dreams of Jesus had something to do, in Miss Stapleton's mind, with religion, although she could not define what it was. When she lived with them no evil came near her.

Miss Stapleton was not only contented, she was happy, at the farm. If ever she went away from it, she rejoiced like a child to return. Her heart beat freely again when she was back in her own bedroom. At last she was obliged to go to town on some legal business, which kept her there three or four days, including a Sunday. She did not know a soul in London, and she put up at an hotel at which Mr. Barfield had stayed years ago. He went with her, but was obliged to go back the same day, for it was haytime, and everybody was very busy. She could not rest, and went out. She was bewildered, giddy, and hardly knew what she was doing. The few people whom she now and then met in Lower Hatch Lane were distinct persons, and had personal errands. Here in the streets there was no personality. She beheld a mass of humanity, driven like dust by a desert storm. The place seemed mad. Her head began to turn, and she wondered which was the real world, Lower Hatch or Oxford Street.

She seldom thought of death at home, and it never weighed upon her. When she did think of it, she imagined herself dying in her own bedroom, looking sunward across the front garden and the farmyard. The voice of the mill or the weir would come to her pillow, the last sound she would hear in this world. In that dingy hotel, confused and deafened, death laid hold of her with a grip like that of a nightmare.

She had a New Testament in her bag, and before she went down to breakfast the next morning she read about Jesus walking by the sea of Galilee and calling Simon and Andrew, James and John. She did not know what to make of it. They straightway left their nets and followed Him. It could never have been. She looked out of the window. Where was Capernaum? How could she pray "Thy kingdom come"? As already noticed, in the common acceptance of the word, she did not doubt. But London contradicted the gospels, and belief had fled.

On Sunday she went to chapel and found a large and fashionable congregation. The preacher was eloquent, and his sermon was an attempt to prove the necessary existence of God. He evidently succeeded to the satisfaction of his hearers, and everybody who listened was much comforted. But Miss Stapleton could not comprehend a single sentence. She said to herself that perhaps she was not a Christian. Perhaps it required more brains than she possessed to be one. The preacher not only did not help her in any way, but afflicted her. She was troubled to find that she was totally unmoved by an exposition of her faith from an eminent minister of God's word.

She went back to Lower Hatch next Saturday morning, and lay in her own bed that night and listened to the weir before she fell asleep. Gradually, although it took a long time, she came to herself. Without internal argument, Capernaum and Jesus were restored to her, and she was at peace.

MARK RUTHERFORD.

Art.

A PASTEL PORTRAITIST.

In the year 1720 there came to Paris a Venetian lady, Rosalba Carriera by name, bringing with her the materials for the then newly perfected art of painting in pastels. A Continental reputation had preceded her, and Paris, or the beau monde of Paris, but lately awakened from the stately lethargy of the Louis Quatorze era, welcomed her with open arms, plied her with commissions, fêted and lionised her. When, after a short stay, she turned her back upon the city and went elsewhere, she left behind her the abiding memory of a gracious personality and a new fashion in portraiture—the pastel fashion. Now, pastel was a medium for which certain French artists were waiting, and when it came to them with Rosalba's prettily Italian, insipidly inoffensive creations as its example, they seized upon it with avidity. It would be wrong to suggest that it ever dispossessed oil-painting in France. Oil-painting pursued unbrokenly the course of its eighteenth-century development, and for the majority of French artists the use of pastel was merely additional to that of oil colors, a pleasant excursion into an intrinsically attractive medium. Nevertheless, its introduction was of profound importance. Though but few specialists in it made their mark, and the sum of their achievements is comparatively meagre, it gave the opportunity to at least one great French artist, Maurice Quentin de La Tour. And, through La Tour, Boucher, and one or two others, it did for the French monarchy what Van Dyck had done for the Stuarts, and Velasquez for the royal house of Spain. Our knowledge of Louis Quinze and his patient Queen and his successive mistresses and the entire Court would be infinitely less complete but for the pastel portraits that have come down to us; the portraits of King and Consort, of the de Mailly, the Pompadour, the du Barry, of the garish throng who constituted French society, the only society that mattered in those days, when the other France, the submerged France, had hardly yet begun to dream of revolution. In the words of Mr. Haldane Macfall's preface to his admirably-written volume on the French Pastellists,* a volume that contains some of the finest color reproductions of pastels that we have ever seen, "it was a strange, a romantic, and an airily sinning France" that the airy pastel came to interpret, and its powers of interpretation were little less than extraordinary. It was as if an age, a state of society, containing elements so frail and friable, could only be immortalised rightly in art through a medium whose one reproach was its friability. The next age—even when the Terror was but an ugly memory, and France had again called a King to be over her—had no use for pastel. Its popularity lasted just as long as the kingly traditions of the Grand Monarch, and no longer. In 1810 three francs were bid for La Tour's portrait of Rousseau, and twenty-four francs for Chardin's Portrait of Himself in pastels.

Among the artists who took seriously to pastel, La Tour is easily supreme. Almost from the first he adopted the new and fashionable medium as that peculiarly suited to his genius, and it was largely his amazing success that led to the foundation of a school of artists who were chiefly pastellists, and prompted the use of pastel by some of the first oil painters of the day. There was Perroneau, the unhappy wanderer over the face of the continent, who portrayed Madame Valade, and a host of other society leaders, with more than average merit, though Diderot described him bitterly as "amongst the poor devils who do not deserve altogether a line of writing!" There were Lundberg, a Swede, who got behind the character of Boucher with a rare skill in the pastel portrait of the latter artist, which is now in the Louvre; Liotard, the Genevan, with a native eye for the main chance, whose fine gifts, both for pastelling and picture-dealing, were recognised by the connoisseurs of this country; Boze, Le Châlier, and others. Boucher, who abandoned himself to a reckless output of Arcadian shepherds and shepherdesses, who painted the froth of the age as if it were the age itself, was drawn temperamentally to pastel, and where he went in this direction, Jean Honoré Fragonard followed later. Even Chardin has left a pastel portrait of Madame Chardin, which is Rembrandt-like in its exquisite mobility, and would be enough to discover his genius were that not already discovered. Yet La Tour triumphed over all of them in popularity, and it is to Chardin alone that he yields in solid merit, if, indeed, he yields to any contemporary artist in France. For La Tour, though he sought his subjects in a flippant atmosphere, in a Court whose courtliness was often the reverse of courteous, in a society whose deepest emotions were superficial, and Chardin his in the lowly cabins of the poor, was no flippant painter; nor was his scrupulous truth as far removed from Chardin's sincerity as might be thought. He would seem to have recognised that even the society of the French capital was not all polished surface, and to have had the will and the ability to probe its character as few others could or cared to try. La Tour belongs to the Intellectuals who were to make the new France. He is of the company of Voltaire. As artist, he caught and held such beauty and fragrance as belonged to an airy social world. As intellectual, he "saw too deep even into superficial souls, to be content with skill of hand in painting their mere fripperies of adornment, their powder and paint and patches and smile—he painted the frippery of their character. Yet his searching ken sees deeper here and there than his frail model thought, and behind the face of trivial charm we may see a haunting hint of sadness and disillusion even while the lips smile their set smile."

* "The French Pastellists of the Eighteenth Century." By Haldane Macfall. Edited by T. Leman Hare. With 52 illustrations. Macmillan. 42s. net.

To La Tour came all the wonderful humanities of this wonderful, light-souled age—a procession of princes, courtiers, soldiers and worldly abbés, dukes, duchesses, countesses, and mere mesdames and demoiselles, all striving for the honor of immortality by his little sticks of colored chalk. To him came, too, Madame Favart, the great actress who sent Paris and a French marshal crazy, and La Camargo, the celebrated dancer, and the singer, Marie Fel, who was afterwards to join her life to his own, and Voltaire, the satiric firebrand, and homely Chardin, with the round horn spectacles, and others who, if they were in society, were not of it. They came to him in fear and trembling, lest he should refuse them; for La Tour, having found his power, used it, and would paint none but those he chose. Even towards Royalty he showed a fine democratic contempt when it came to a matter of their sitting for their portraits. When Madame La Pompadour, the most powerful of royal mistresses that ever usurped a queen's place, sent her brother, Marigny, to La Tour, the latter returned the message, "Tell Madame that I am not going to paint her before the whole town." The Pompadour could have clapped him into the Bastille for less; as it was, and because she had, with all her faults of unscrupulous ambition and merciless statcraft, a nice taste in art, and was ever a firm friend to artists and writers, she only sent Marigny again and again, till at length the first sitting was arranged. The trouble, however, did not end here. La Tour had stipulated that during the sittings he should not be interrupted by anyone, and when on the first day the King himself walked in, the painter walked out, and refused to come back again until he was assured that the offence would not be repeated.

Owing to this and other misunderstandings, the huge pastel portrait was not finished for three years. Neither does the story of its painting even end peacefully, for La Tour proceeded to quarrel about the price of it, setting it down at 48,000 livres. It was Chardin who prevailed on him to accept half of that sum—Chardin, whose own bourgeois pictures, as they were then considered, never fetched more than the most modest bourgeois prices! In this and other matters Chardin gave good advice to the more popular painter, who was a Goya for waywardness and irritability, and the record of the sincere friendship that existed between the two men helps to sweeten a half sincere epoch. The picture of La Pompadour, now in the Louvre, is La Tour's accredited masterpiece in pastel. But one is sometimes inclined to wonder how far this honorable estimate of its merits is due to its unusual size, and whether, after all, the power of La Tour is not better realised in some of his smaller works, in those heads and shoulders of pretty women and brave men that combine in so marked a degree the sentiment of a light poetry and the value of artistic construction.

La Tour died in 1788, his last days darkened by insanity, and with him seems to have died the school of pastelists that he vivified. The art that Rosalba brought to Paris was, as it were, an exotic rose that would bloom only in the gay sunshine of eighteenth-century monarchy, and when the revolution broke overhead dispersed its petals to the winds. The pastelists were literally swept out of existence by the storm of '89. Their works, La Tour's amongst the rest, went for rubbish prices. Their vitality, as a school, was snowed under. The classicists in art who followed those troubled days had no use for pastel—not, at least, for pastel as a separate art of creating beauty. And, though in the hands of Millet, Israels, Lhermitte and others we have seen the colored chalk put to charming modern uses, it has never seemed so much at home in, so perfectly adapted to, its subjects as it was when La Tour handled it for the spattering of a rainbow beauty upon an unworthy world.

Present-Day Problems.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF "CONVERSION."

IN his new volume of narrative studies, "Broken Earthenware" (Hodder & Stoughton), Mr. Harold Begbie discusses one of the deepest problems of applied psychology. He read Professor William James's remarkable volume on "The Varieties of Religious Experience," and went down into a London slum to test and verify the Harvard philosopher's observations. His papers give the actual records of some of the "broken earthenware," the shards of cracked and soiled human crockery, he picked up on this deplorable rubbish-heap. These stories are told with the novelist's practised skill, and with vivid picturesqueness, and a realism that is redeemed from repulsiveness by the eloquent purity of the author's style. As a collection of authentic human documents the volume is of absorbing interest; a piece of pathological investigation, scientific in its keen analysis, but irradiated by a poetical imagination and a glow of sympathetic emotion. And, in a way, it is pioneer work, since it points to a fresh and fruitful method of handling social problems. On the one hand we have had the student in his library tabulating data and statistics, and conducting a priori researches into the causes of want, misery, and crime; on the other side, the writer of fiction and the descriptive journalist are content to give merely graphic pictures of the results. Mr. Begbie shows them a new use for their talents. The literary observer might do for the economist and the sociologist what the explorer does for the scientific geographer. He might give him the material to support or disprove his hypothesis, and establish or refute the theory by an examination of the facts. It is valuable to have Professor James's speculations on the philosophy of conversion applied to actual cases of "saved" drunkards and criminals drawn up from the depths of London slumdom.

Mr. Begbie's pictures of these vessels of grace are terribly graphic. The Potter's Thumb seems to have slipped badly in making this shattered earthenware. All the specimens are of the worst types known to our civilisation, if civilisation it can be called; for these creatures are really savage animals, rooting in the slime and garbage at the base of our social fabric. Horrible they are in their degradation and brutality, bestial and loathsome some of them in their outward aspect; yet they have minds, and capacity for affection, and, as it turns out, souls that can be "saved," traits and qualities that are often attractive when the grime of the pit has been washed away. There is the Puncher, the ferocious prize fighter, the terror of the slum public-houses:—

"His face is pale, with that almost transparent pallor of the red-haired; the expression is weary, heavy, and careworn; the features are small, delicate, and regular; one cannot believe that the light-colored eyes have been hammered, and the small, almost girlish, mouth rattled with blows. The man might be a poet; the last rôle one would ascribe to him would be that of the Ring."

A more poignant sketch is that of the man who was known as Old Born Drunk, the street newspaper hawker who had never since childhood been quite sober. Here is the impression he made upon the Salvation Army officer by whom he was "saved":—

"The vileness of his clothing and the unhealthy appearance of his flesh did not strike the adjutant till afterwards. Her whole attention was held in a kind of horror by the aspect of the man's eyes. They were terrible with soullessness. She racks her brain in vain to find words to describe them. She returns again and again to the word stupefied. This is the word that least fails to misrepresent what no language can describe. Stupefied! Not weakness, not feebleness, not cunning, not depravity; but stupor. They were the eyes of a man neither living nor dead; they were the eyes of nothing that had ever lived or could ever die—the eyes of eternal, stillborn stupor."

Then there is the criminal who began going to prison at the age of nine, and at thirty-four had spent half his life in gaol; the Copper Basher, a ferocious ruffian who devoted himself to assaults on the police; and the Lowest of the Low, a drunkard, thief, and bully, who lived on the earnings of fallen women.

These degraded wretches, when Mr. Begbie made their acquaintance, had been rescued by the Salvation Army. The book is a pæan in its praise. Thanks to its officers, and more particularly one young woman, known, not undeservedly, as the angel-adjutant, the Puncher and his companions in depravity had become sober, clean living, hard working persons consumed with "a passion for souls." The transformation is amazing. I do not wonder that Mr. Begbie is carried away when he surveys the process by which creatures almost below the level of normal humanity, ravaged by alcoholism, sensuality, and brutishness, are turned into respectable members of society. In all the cases "conversion" came suddenly, as it were by the blinding flash of some powerful light streamed into (or streamed from) the sinner's consciousness. It was the new version of the old miracle, the miracle of St. Paul, of Pascal, of Bunyan, and of many others, a miracle as old as Christianity, and, indeed, as old as Buddhism, and probably older still. This "call," this feeling of regeneration, of receiving grace, of "experiencing religion," is not the less impressive because it is familiar. How shall we explain the psychology of that condition in which the percipient seems to be born anew, and, in Professor James's words, "amid tremendous emotional excitement or perturbation of the senses, a complete division is established in the twinkling of an eye between the old life and the new," so that the sinner's evil habits fall from him like a garment, the drunkard shrinks from the taste of liquor, the sensualist becomes chaste? Professor James does not explain it; nor can Mr. Begbie. Only he insists that religion alone, and apparently religion of the sensationalist, emotional, Salvation Army type can generate the requisite atmosphere. General Booth's miracles are only faint copies of those familiar in the history of all Christian and Mahometan revivalist sects and movements. They have been performed over and over again when Methodism has developed a spasm of energy, they were capped by Moody and Sankey, and they were achieved on a large scale and in very strange circumstances by the Mahdi in the Sudan. "Conversion," it seems clear, comes from an emotional stimulus working on a temperament more or less neurotic, touched with the abnormality perhaps of genius, perhaps of degeneracy, perhaps of hysteria, perhaps—like all Mr. Begbie's cases but one—of drink. He is surely wrong in declaring religion is the only exciting cause. Patriotism will often produce the same effect. Has he read the records of Japan? Or the story of Germany in the Napoleonic war? Or the veracious chronicle of Mlle. Boule-de-Suif? I do not mean to be flippant in referring to this last example. It was a true instance of conversion, though religion had nothing to do with it. And Mr. Begbie is on insecure ground when he issues a challenge to science. Let science perform the miracles of the "Army," he says. Science has done them, as Mr. Begbie will see if he looks at the writings of those who have studied suggestion in the schools of Nancy and the Salpêtrière. Any modern text book on hypnotism will furnish him with scores of cases of criminals and degenerates who have been turned by suggestion to habits of decency, order, and honest living. If this treatment of moral and mental disorders has not been regularly practised, it is because it is so uncertain in its results. It does not appear capable of being applied to humanity at large. Most of Charcot's successes were obtained with hysterical women. Most of General Booth's, if we may judge from Mr. Begbie's record, are wrought on men diseased by drink and debauchery. In such cases the emotional stimulus has peculiar psychic effects; and I see no reason why treatment by conversion should not be studied as scientifically and dispassionately as treatment by hypnotic suggestion. I think the conclusion will be that the one is as limited in its curative application as the other; but both may be valuable remedies for certain intractable and obscure diseases, moral and physical. We may believe in miracles; but we ought not to expect them.

SIDNEY LOW.

[Mr. Low's article raises many interesting problems, which our readers may wish to discuss.—ED., NATION.]

Letters from Abroad.

HOW GERMAN WORKERS LIVE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The biggest of the German trade unions, the German Metal Workers' Union (Deutscher Metallarbeiter Verband), a society numbering about 700,000 members, has just issued a very valuable publication which may also interest English readers. The contents are indicated by the title: "320 Haushaltungs-Rechnungen von Metallarbeitern"—"320 Household Budgets of Metalworkers." One of the remarkable features of the German trade unions is their statistical work. They have imbued their members with a high sense of the importance of statistical information, and educated them to very active co-operation in such work. Their literature teems with statistical inquiries of every kind.

The present investigation of the Metal Workers' Union was decided on at the end of 1907, when the union considered the question of graduated contributions. It was thought valuable for a just solution of this question to have as a basis a trustworthy picture of the income and expenditure of the different sorts of wage-earners embraced by the union. 400 householding lists and books were sent out to forty-one local branches of the union, and of these no less than eighty per cent. came back in a fit state for tabulation and comparison. Of the other twenty per cent. the great majority could not be kept for the whole prescribed period of one year because of loss or change of work, migration, and similar reasons. The 320 serviceable lists represent localities of the most different type—big and small towns, progressive and retrograde centres, northern and southern districts, and workers of every description (turners and fitters, moulders and founders, smiths and furnacemen, engravers and goldsmiths, fine instrument makers and brassworkers). The yearly income of the household ranges from 1,019 marks (or shillings) to 3,356 marks; the average yearly income being 1,856 marks, made up of the following sources:—

From Wages of the legal head of the household (husband or father)	1,485 marks
" Earnings of other members of the family	179 "
" Outside contributions, sick pay, &c.	56 "
" Other sources	136 "
	<hr/>
	1,856 marks

The average size of the household was 4·91 persons; the composition of the 320 households 760 persons over and 812 persons under fifteen years of age. With one exception the household had a husband and wife as its head. The average number of hours worked by the legal head of the household was 2,670, the average number of working days lost by unemployment was 32·9, by sickness 27·2. From this it will be seen that the households belonged to the best employed workers of their respective sections. Altogether sixty-four households had an income of less than 1,200 marks the year, or 3s. 3d. a day.

Now, how have the incomes been spent? The lists confirm the old experience that the lower the income the higher the relative expenditure on nourishment. Of the incomes of less than 1,200 marks, 49·29 per cent.; of those between 2,000 and 2,500 marks, only 45·77 per cent. were spent on food. The percentage of the expenditure for luxuries in eating and drinking were almost equal, and equal also was the percentage of the expenditure in contributions to political and industrial unions and for insurance fees. It is interesting to learn that alcoholic drinks accounted for a comparatively small item in the expenditure. The consumption of beer is calculated at 62 litres for the year, whilst the yearly average for the whole population of the Empire is 117 litres per head. This shows that the organised workers are the most thoughtful of their class; that organisation leads to temperance.

I pass over other interesting details and come to the principal question of food. There we arrive at the following averages per head :—

	per year.	per week.
Meat ...	25.1 kilogrammes*	0.48 kilogrammes*
Butter ...	6.4	0.12
Flour ...	13.53	0.26
Bread ...	160.06	3.08
Sugar ...	12.63	0.24
Potatoes ...	128.95	2.48
Milk ...	115 litres	2.2 litres
Eggs ...	103	2

* 2 lbs. 3¼ ozs.

This is far, very far, behind the figures regarded as necessary by food hygienists, and also very far below the standard fixed in the Imperial Navy for the feeding of the bluejackets, whose work is hardly more exacting than that of the metal workers. Here is a comparison of the daily consumption in grammes (15.43 grains).

	Bluejackets	Metalworkers
Meat ...	335	68.8
Butter and Lard ...	65	17.5
Flour ...	71	37.0
Bread ...	750	438.5
Sugar ...	49	34.6
Potatoes ...	430	353.3

Even if it is considered that the figures for the metal workers include the consumption of young people and children, their food compares most unfavorably with that of the naval men. It approaches the latter most nearly in the item of potatoes and least in the item of animal food. When you analyse the foods of the different classes of workers, you arrive, of course, at the worst scale in the section of the lowest-paid workers. The consumption of meat was :—

Lowest class of workers...	21.6 kilogrammes per year.
Highest " " "	27.8 " " "

but of potatoes :—

Lowest class of workers...	135.5 kilogrammes per year.
Highest " " "	108.8 " " "

I must leave it to the British workman to compare these figures with his own consumption. But it is an established fact that he consumes more meat, butter, sugar, and similar food than his German brother.

Not that the German money wages are so much lower than those of Great Britain. The German trade unions have succeeded in raising the wages of almost all the sections of the German workers by considerable percentages. The statistics of the agencies for the workers' insurances offer many opportunities for comparison. Since 1903 the accident unions composed only of employers have based their records on wages actually paid, and since the compensations to the injured workers are calculated accordingly, they are in no way interested in exaggerating these sums. Well, the figures for the metal trader show that, from 1903 to 1907, the wages rose on the average 17.88 per cent. On this reckoning the workers ought to be better off than they are.

But they are not. An unseen hand stole into their pockets and abstracted much, if not all, of the surplus earnings. Putting the prices of the last ten years at 100, we have had to pay in 1908 in Berlin :—

Rye (the bread-flour of the workers) ...	126
Wheat ...	122
Potatoes ...	127
Second-class Butter ...	120
Lard ...	133

Only potatoes show any great fluctuation in the prices, the average of the nine years from 1900 to 1908 having been 108.6. In the case of the other articles the prices rise almost without interruption, while they bounded up after 1906, when the new tariff actually came into force.

This rise of the prices, which is to a large degree artificial, has made the fight of the German worker for a betterment of his lot like a reverse run on a moving platform. He has marched bravely forward, but the ground under his feet was moving the other way. As he looks around him, he sees that, in spite of all his exertions, he has, in fact, advanced very little. Nay, the weaker sections have rather been driven back.—Yours, &c.,

Schöneberg, Berlin,

December 26th, 1909.

Communications.

AUSTRALIA AND THE REJECTION OF THE BUDGET.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—You will be interested to learn by the mails to hand from Australia what the people there think of the rejection of the Budget by the House of Lords. If the Tory Party seriously believes that it represents Colonial opinion and has Colonial sympathy, a glance at Australian papers received this week will cause a rude awakening. The latest New Zealand files to hand are dated November 19th, and as the telegram announcing Lord Lansdowne's motion arrived on the night of the 18th, New Zealand Press opinion upon this move is not yet available in England, but the trend of comments upon the Budget debate has left no doubt that the Dominion will be quite as emphatic as the Commonwealth in condemning the Peers' attack upon the Constitution.

From Australia comes a strenuous chorus of disapproval, quite overwhelming the few timid voices raised in excuse or extenuation of the action of the Lords. In New South Wales there are two important morning papers, the Sydney "Morning Herald" and the Sydney "Daily Telegraph." Both condemn the Lords utterly. In Victoria the great organs of opinion are the "Age" and the "Argus." The former—Protectionist though it be; indeed, it is the great champion of Protection in Australia—puts fiscalism on one side, and is scathing in its denunciation of the Peers' attack upon the rights of the people. The "Argus"—Conservative and Free Trade—contents itself with a non-committal article in which it speaks of the gravity of the step contemplated by Lord Lansdowne. More than any other paper in Australia, the "Argus" represents such reactionary Conservatism as can be found in the Commonwealth, and yet it has not, so far, ventured openly to defend the Peers.

Going now to South Australia we find both the morning papers, the "Register" and the "Advertiser," equally strong in their protests. The "Advertiser," it may be remarked, is a keen advocate of Protection, while the "Register" has Free Trade leanings.

Western Australia is in tune with the sister States. The "West Australian," the only metropolitan morning paper, in spite of its more or less Conservative sympathies, is as vigorous in denouncing the Lords as is the "Kalgoorlie Miner," the more Radical organ of the goldfields.

Thus in four States, containing nearly five-sixths of the population of the Commonwealth, all the important papers but one condemn the Lords, and that one dares not come into the open and justify them.

From Queensland the only two papers to hand of later date than November 18th are the Brisbane "Courier" and the Brisbane "Daily Mail," both strongly opposed to labor and to land values taxation. They both make excuse for the Budget being "referred to the people." Queensland, however, differs from the other States, in having large provincial papers and a Labor Press, which, far more than in the other States, represent public opinion; and their views are not yet available.

The only paper I have seen from little Tasmania with its 200,000 people is the Hobart "Mercury," which is quite amusingly vigorous in its championship of every form of privilege. It loves the House of Lords, but, while maintaining that the Peers are constitutionally within their rights, it shrewdly adds: "The controversy is rendered much more bitter than it otherwise would be by the foolish action of the Preferentists and Protectionists, who want it (the Budget) rejected in order that they may have a chance to bring in their fanciful schemes for making the foreigner pay the taxes, and at the same time give employment by keeping out foreign goods."

The extracts given below from the other papers mentioned will show that the Australian public are not willing to see the British Constitution, upon which their own Constitutions are modelled, violated in party interests, and that they quite understand the motives which urge the Lords on to revolution.

The "Daily Telegraph" (Sydney) says :—

"Probably the Asquith Government will be helped in the fight by the stubbornness of the Lords, and their arrogant assumption of superiority . . . the deluded conceit of its importance which a long spell of Tory Government up to 1906 gave the hereditary and nominee House."

The Sydney "Morning Herald" says:—

"Were the claim of the Lords in this matter once admitted, it would mean that they who have their rights and their privileges by the accident of birth, and not by any will of the people, would be supreme over Commons and King. The whole machinery of Government would be paralysed unless the Lords had their liking. They could force a referendum on any question, and thus the cause of progress which stumbles forward now with leaden feet would be irretrievably ruined. The Lords would be the dictators, no matter what Government might be in office. Ministers would have responsibility, the Lords would have the power, and the Commons would be a mere addendum to the legislative machine. . . . They (the Peers) have discussed and criticised Finance Bills, they have claimed the right of rejection, but they have never ventured on the experiment. Why is it that by a side wind they are venturing now? It is because their profits, which they have gained not by their own exertions but by the exertions of the whole community, are to render up to the community some return, they are to pay something approaching a fair share of the cost of the protection which the laws and the navy and the army afford them. They, too, see a chance of substituting a tariff, a protective tariff, for the present system of Free Trade, and with that tariff they hope that they will gain by their agricultural lands becoming more valuable. . . . When the Liberal Government renews its lease of power, its first step after passing the Budget will be to introduce legislation which will deprive the Lords of all their present power."

The Melbourne "Age" says:—

"To a reactionary coup d'état the answer must come from the democracy. The issue once raised must end in nothing short of the destruction of the class veto. . . . Mr. Lloyd George's Budget, with its historic land tax clauses and its scheme of far-reaching social reforms, touching the life of the masses at its very root, has struck the imagination of the country as no legislation has done since the Reform Bill. In its spirit and practical effects it would reinforce the influences which were fighting for the health and progress of the race. It has shown an overwhelming feeling as to the crushing monopoly of the land. . . . The land taxes are not only just, but, as Sir Edward Grey argued at Leeds, they are carefully hedged round so as to impose no burden upon trade, industry or enterprise, and they have been framed in such a way as not to imperil the security of capital; they are not exorbitant and not retrospective."

The Adelaide "Advertiser" says:—

"In the mere fact of the extraordinary number of Peers assembled at Westminster to destroy the Budget may be seen a striking illustration of one of the Liberal Party's grievances. The Lords' veto, like that of Australian Legislative Councils, but even more emphatically, is a party veto. It is practically never put in force against Conservative legislation. If the Tories send up a measure from the House of Commons, it is assumed to be all right. Few of the Peers trouble to attend, and still fewer make any pretence of considering the Bills they are expected to pass. A Conservative Government may legislate without a 'mandate,' but it never occurs to the Lords that before they give their concurrence an appeal should be made to the constituencies. . . . A non-elective Chamber, which virtually represents only one party in the State, and is never fully awake unless the class interests it is most concerned to protect appear to be in danger, is an anomaly in this democratic age, and must be 'mended or ended.'"

The South Australian "Register" says:—

"Mr. Lloyd George looks facts in the face, and knows no fear, and splendid audacity always accompanies his faith and far-sightedness. The bigger the task, the better he likes it. He has not only the eye for the big occasion, and the courage which rises to it; he has also the instinct for the mighty foe."

The "West Australian" says:—

"What revision or review did the House of Lords accord to the measures of the last Salisbury and Balfour Administrations? Was there any attempt by the Peers to act as national watchdogs when these Administrations were in power? Their legislation, on the contrary, has only to face serious criticism in the House of Commons. But immediately the present Liberal Government assumed office a career of consistent and deliberate obstruction was opened. Soon a mangled heap of slaughtered innocents lay where the legislation asked by the people should have stood. . . . In such circumstances people naturally inquire—What is the use of the electors returning a Liberal Government to power? All that is vital to their policy is emasculated or destroyed by the House of Lords, and the Conservative Party is made ever legislatively supreme, no matter how the House of Commons is constituted by the people. . . . For the great British nation to accept this position would be a confession of utter impotence, and of decline from a high estate which is almost unthinkable."

The "Kalgoorlie Miner" says:—

"The House of Lords, the hereditary chamber, the representatives of property and not of the people, choose so to reject what they affect to look upon as an upheaval, the end of all things; whereas it may prove but the beginning of all good things. Should they enforce their threat, then we shall see what we shall see; and possibly one of those things we shall see will be the end of the House of Lords in its present constitution, or at least a curtailment of its present powers."

Yours, &c.,

C. H. CHOMLEY.

Letters to the Editor.

IRISH LIBERALS AND THE GOVERNMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It seems to me that my friend, Mr. A. M. Sullivan, whose letter you published last week, has not followed with appreciation the course of events in Ireland, but particularly in Ulster, during the last nine years. The question that he raises is historical as well as political. Previously to 1885 there were three parties in Ireland—namely, the Nationalists, the Presbyterian Liberals of Ulster, and the Tories, who were mainly drawn from the ranks of the Church of Ireland. In Ulster, the Liberals, with the assistance of the Nationalists, were always able to return from four to six or seven members of Parliament, but in 1885 Mr. Parnell broke the informal alliance that existed between them and the Nationalists, with the result that Irish Liberalism was completely wiped out. In the election of that year, eighty-five Nationalists and eighteen Tories (including the two members for Trinity College) were returned from the whole of Ireland. Mr. Gladstone then made Home Rule one of the official items of the Liberal programme, and the bulk of the Irish Liberals, following Lord Hartington, became Liberal Unionists, and finally were merged, for the time, in the Tory Party. In the election of 1886, eighty-five Nationalists again were returned and eighteen Tories. The latter represented the whole of the Protestant population of Ireland, with the exception of a few thousands (or perhaps hundreds) of Protestants, who in 1886, at the suggestion of Mr. Parnell, formed the Protestant Home Rule Association. The result, then, of Mr. Gladstone's action in 1886 was that a solid phalanx of Catholics became arrayed in a demand for Home Rule against an almost solid phalanx of Protestants. This unfortunate situation was paraded before the English electors in 1892, 1895, and 1900, and undoubtedly it has delayed the ultimate solution of the problem. It, however, is, and always was, the earnest hope of all Nationalists that the Protestants of the North of Ireland would sooner or later reach the light, and that they would realise that the demand for self-government was a great democratic, and not a mere sectional, question.

In the long years that have passed since the introduction of the first Home Rule Bill, a marvellous change has taken place in Ulster. The cut-throat Unionism of the Belfast rioters of 1886 was followed by the more deliberate, though scarcely less ferocious, Unionism of the Ulster Convention of 1892. Then came the Unionist compromise which was embodied in the Local Government Act of 1898. During those fourteen years an almost imperceptible change was coming over the feelings of Protestant Ulster. The first outward sign of that change was observable as long ago as 1900, when Mr. T. W. Russell, who had been a member of Lord Salisbury's administration, was opposed in South Tyrone by a local Conservative landlord. In 1902 a by-election took place in East Down, when Mr. James Wood was returned as an "Independent Unionist" against the official Unionist candidate. In 1903, Mr. Mitchell, another "Independent Unionist," was returned for North Fermanagh, and in 1905 Mr. Walker, a Labor candidate, almost succeeded in defeating the Unionist candidate in North Belfast, which had always hitherto been a Tory stronghold.

Mr. Sullivan says that on the resignation of Mr. Balfour's Cabinet in 1905 Irishmen were surprised to learn that there existed amongst them a third party. I am afraid that Mr. Sullivan has not been a very close observer of political events in this country when he suggests that this third party sprang into existence, as it were, in a single night four years ago. He forgets that the Dunravenite movement, which originated in 1902, was symptomatic of a strong undercurrent of feeling amongst the Protestant gentry, which is still gathering force. The most recent evidence of the strength of this movement is the selection last week of Mr. Leslie, a member of an old County Monaghan family, as the Nationalist candidate for the city of Derry. In 1900 a Land and Labor organisation was formed in the counties of Antrim and Down, and it was almost entirely Protestant in its personnel, and was entirely democratic in its constitution. By a natural process of evolution, it developed in 1905 into the Ulster Liberal Association, the members of which were not bound to adopt Unionism as part of their political creed.

But that is not the whole story. In July, 1902, the Orange body, which always was the mainstay of Toryism in Ireland, became disintegrated, and the Independent Orange Institution was formed, a body whose constitution was really based on democratic principles. The first visible result of the work of this new organisation was the return of Mr. Tom Sloan, in August, 1902, as the independent member for South Belfast, his unsuccessful opponent being Mr. Dunbar Buller, who represented the old Tory gang. At the same time the Labor movement was making great progress in Belfast, in spite of the efforts of the Tory wire-pullers, and the Protestant artisans of that city now realise that bread and butter politics is of more importance than the claptrap of Unionist scaremongers. All these various forces effected very considerable results in the election of 1906. Mr. Glendinning, the Liberal candidate, succeeded in wresting North Antrim from Mr. William Moore, K.C., the pride and hope of the Irish Tories, and Colonel Verschoyle, another Liberal, almost succeeded in defeating the Hon. Robert O'Neill in Mid Antrim. Mr. Sloan defeated with contumely Lord Arthur Hill in South Belfast. In West Belfast Mr. Devlin gained a foothold in the northern capital for Nationalism, whilst in North Belfast Mr. Walker, the Labor candidate, was within three hundred votes of defeating Sir Daniel Dixon. In South Derry Dr. Keightley, the Liberal candidate, was in a minority of less than one hundred, and North Tyrone and South Tyrone were retained by Mr. T. W. Russell and Serjeant Dodd respectively. Altogether twelve seats were fought by Liberal and Labor candidates, who polled a total vote of 38,215, against 11,962 polled for the Tories—a very remarkable result. The elections that take place in January will, it is confidently expected, show even more remarkable results. In all probability the official Unionist members, who now number only seventeen, will be further reduced in number to twelve, or at the most fourteen.

I do not see, as Mr. Sullivan apparently does, any cause for regret in this revival of democratic feeling amongst the Protestants of Ulster. To me it represents the break-up of the Tory gang that has held Ireland in thrall for the last hundred years. It shows that the "Nonconformists" of Ireland are coming into line with their fellow-countrymen, as they did in 1798, and that they can no longer be deluded by the bogies with which they were frightened in 1886 and 1892. I agree that "the natural party of progress in Ireland is the Nationalist party," and I agree, also, that "no other army held the field against the forces of ascendancy in the many dark years of the last quarter of a century"; but if the democracy of Ulster is again taking its proper place on the side of progress, I see no reason why it should be discouraged in doing so. Mr. Sullivan has all the Celtic impatience with compromise and all the Celtic insistence upon abstract perfection. It was, however, in the nature of things, impossible to hope that any large body of Irish Unionists would proceed to march straight from the ranks of Unionism into those of Nationalism. As I have shown, however, a great advance has been made since 1900, and it is showing a deplorable ignorance or disregard of events for anyone to suggest that the democratic wave of opinion which is passing over Ulster has originated with a number of "disappointed applicants for favors from the Tory administration."

As the result proved, Home Rule was not possible in 1886, nor yet in 1893. It first became possible in 1906, and in 1910 it has reached the region of probability. In this matter it is hard to distinguish between cause and effect; but, whether it is attributable to cause or to effect, it is plain that the phenomenon in Ireland of which Mr. Sullivan so bitterly complains is intimately connected with the success which the question of Home Rule has achieved. No Nationalist believes that Home Rule means Rome Rule, nor does any Nationalist desire to see maintained for ever the irreconcilable attitude which the Ulster Protestants adopted in 1886. The events of the last nine years have proved that the Irish Presbyterians and Methodists, at any rate, are no longer irreconcilable, but that, on the contrary, they are preparing to take their share in the work of the social and industrial regeneration which the granting of Home Rule will render possible.

I do not think that it is necessary to discuss the minor question which Mr. Sullivan has raised—namely, the distribution of patronage in Ireland during the last four years. It is probably true that during that time some injustice has taken place in the giving away of the loaves and fishes, but the reason of that is not hard to seek. The Irish party could not take any part in the distribution of Governmental patronage. The Liberal Government, being in sympathy with the aspirations of Ireland, had no desire to confer favors upon the old ascendancy party. In the result, Mr. Bryce and Mr. Birrell were, I suppose, obliged to take into their confidence the prominent members of the new organisations. It is only fair to add that the responsible leaders of the Irish movement and the Nationalist Press of Ireland have never uttered a word of complaint as to that course of conduct. So far as I know, both Chief Secretaries would have been only too glad to have been assisted by the advice of the Irish party; but, of course, that was not possible under the circumstances.—Yours, &c.,

W. J. JOHNSTON.

32, Elgin Road, Dublin,
December 27th, 1909.

THE CREATION OF PEERS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your Unionist contemporary, the "Standard," has warned the working men electors that a Unionist victory would bring them something much more solid than the prolonged and disturbing constitutional struggle which must be the sequel of a Radical success.

As it does not require an extravagant or over-sanguine calculation to make us conclude that the Liberal Party are going to succeed at the coming elections, it may be useful to point out, in anticipation, what the constitutional course will probably be immediately after the election. It need not be the "prolonged struggle" predicted by the "Standard," but a very short and decisive struggle.

Assuming that the old principle of redress before supply is followed, we may expect that the first move of the Liberal Party will be to pass through the Commons and send up to the Lords a Bill to carry into effect the Campbell-Bannerman Resolution of limiting the veto of the House of Lords. The question at once arises, How is this to be done? This question was argued in Parliament, and definitely settled, in 1832, and a constitutional precedent was then established.

In 1831 the Reform Bill was rejected by the House of Lords by a majority of forty-one, and in March, 1832, it was again passed by the House of Commons. The Whig leaders intimated that Peers would be created to make a majority in the House of Lords. The Duke of Wellington, speaking in the House of Lords on behalf of the Tory Party, denounced the threat of creating Peers as "an unconstitutional exercise of the prerogative." This speech is to be found in Hansard of May, 1832.

On May 17th, 1832, Earl Grey, the Prime Minister, answered the Duke of Wellington, and the following sentences in his speech admirably express the constitutional principle which was then finally decided: "I ask what would be the consequences if we were to suppose that such a prerogative did not exist, or could not be constitutionally exercised? The Commons have a control over the power of the Crown, by the privilege, in extreme cases, of refusing the supplies; and the Crown has, by means of its power to dissolve the House of Commons, a control upon any violent and rash proceedings on the part of the Commons; but if a majority of this House is to have the power, whenever they please, of opposing the declared and decided wishes both of the Crown and the people, without any means of modifying that power, then this country is placed entirely under the influence of an uncontrolled oligarchy. I say that, if a majority in this House should have the power of acting adversely to the Crown and the Commons, and was determined to exercise that power, without being liable to check or control, the Constitution is completely altered, and the Government of this country is not a limited monarchy: it is no longer, my Lords, the Crown, the Lords, and the Commons, but a House of Lords—a separate oligarchy—governing absolutely the others.”—Hansard, Deb. 3rd, Ser. XII., 1,006.

On the same day Earl Grey and Lord Brougham waited on the King, and obtained the following document: “The King grants permission to Earl Grey, and to his Chancellor, Lord Brougham, to create such a number of Peers as will be sufficient to ensure the passing of the Reform Bill—first calling up Peers’ eldest sons.—William, R., Windsor, May 17th, 1832.”—(Roebuck, Hist. of the Whig Ministry, II., 331-33.)

On the following day, May 18th, the King wrote to Earl Grey: “His Majesty authorises Earl Grey, if any obstacle should arise during the further progress of the Bill, to submit to him a creation of Peers to such extent as shall be necessary to enable him to carry the Bill,” &c.—(Earl Grey’s Corr., II., 434.)

As to the classes from whom the new Peers were to be selected, Lord Brougham’s own words are interesting: “When I went to Windsor with Lord Grey, I had a list of eighty creations, framed upon the principles of making the least possible permanent addition to our House and to the aristocracy, by calling up Peers’ eldest sons—by choosing men without any families—by taking Scotch and Irish Peers.”—(Lord Brougham, Political Philosophy, III., 308.)

It may be safely said that no man has lived in the present generation who was more familiar with the history and the working of Parliament than Sir T. Erskine May. His view of this constitutional question is as follows: “It must not be forgotten that, although Parliament is said to be dissolved, a dissolution extends, in fact, no further than to the Commons. The Peers are not affected by it, except as to a small number of Scotch representative Peers. So far, therefore, as the House of Lords is concerned, a creation of Peers by the Crown, on extraordinary occasions, is the only equivalent which the Constitution has provided, for the change and renovation of the House of Commons by a dissolution. In no other way can the opinion of the House of Lords be brought into harmony with those of the people. . . . Should the emergency be such as to demand it, it cannot be pronounced unconstitutional.”—(May, Const. Hist., I., 315.)

“The Commons may be overborne by a dissolution—the Lords by a threatened creation of Peers—the Crown by withholding supplies; and all alike must bow to the popular will when constitutionally expressed.”—(ib., p. 316.)

One of the latest and soundest authorities on constitutional questions is the “English Constitutional History,” by Taswell-Langmead. I quote from the fifth edition, printed in 1896, the comment on the struggle of 1831-32: “The constitutional position of the Lords with regard to legislation of which they disapprove, but which is supported by the Ministers of the Crown, the House of Commons, and the people, may be said to have been definitely settled by the result of the memorable struggle with the Upper House in 1831 and 1832 on the passing of the Reform Bill. After sixteen Peers had been created to assist the progress of the measure, the continued opposition of the House of Lords was at length overcome by the private persuasions of the King, and the knowledge that he had consented to his Ministers’ request for power to create a sufficient number of Peers to ensure a majority.”—(Taswell-Langmead, English Constitutional Hist., p. 597.)

Yours, &c.,
LXX.

December 30th, 1909.

BALZAC ON FREE TRADE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It would be difficult to find any subject of human interest on which Balzac failed to comment in the course of his “Comédie Humaine,” and few of his prophecies have remained unfulfilled.

Nothing could be more remarkable than the passages—written eighty years ago—in which he explodes the Protectionist fallacy, and predicts for the country which should adopt a Free Trade policy the very course of development which did, in fact, subsequently fall to the lot of Great Britain. It is true that Balzac pleaded for the adoption of such a policy by his own country; but perhaps she was troubled by the raging, tearing propaganda of fiscal reformers, who were going to make her the greatest and richest country in the world. However that may be, the still, small voice of Honoré de Balzac fell on unheeding ears, as sometimes happens with the voice of those who are “merely” thinkers.

The leading motive of “Le Médecin de Campagne,” published in 1831-32, is the successful organisation of agriculture and village industries under the benevolent despotism of a village doctor, who, by the local application of more scientific methods, replaces poverty, sickness, and despair by health and prosperity.

Dr. Benassis stimulates the country-side to the doing of all that it can best do for itself, but in making his policy clear he says:—

“In commerce encouragement does not mean ‘Protection.’ A really wise policy may aim at making a country independent of foreign supplies, but not by resorting to the pitiable shifts of tariffs or prohibitions. Industries must work out their own salvation; competition is the life of trade. A protected industry sinks into slumber. . . .

“The country upon which all the others will come to depend for their supplies will be that land which shall promulgate Free Trade, and thus become conscious of a power to produce its manufactures more economically than those of its competitors.”

Dr. Benassis then succinctly expounds the whole theory of international exchanges in the following illustration:—

“On the other side of the mountain they find it impossible to use wheeled ploughs, because the soil is not deep enough. Now, if the Mayor of the Commune had taken it into his head to follow our steps [i.e., by growing corn], he must have been the ruin of his district. I urged them to plant vineyards. This they did, and had an excellent vintage last year. Their wine exchanges for our corn.”

Thus does this writer—who had proclaimed the evolutionary view of race development whilst the greatest biologists of his day were still denouncing it—pack an economic treatise on Free Trade and Protection into a few sentences.

What would have been the history of France had she adopted Balzac’s policy of State and Communal aid to agriculture and Free Trade with the world?—Yours, &c.,

S. D. S.

December 29th, 1909.

FORCIBLE FEEDING.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have read Mr. Brailsford’s remarks about “forcible feeding” in your last issue, and, as I am honestly unable to understand his exact position, I beg your permission to ask him the following question:—

Supposing he admitted that the women suffragists were justly imprisoned, would he then consider it right to feed them forcibly in case of a persistent refusal to eat?

If he answers Yes, he is admitting that, apart from their imprisonment, he has nothing to complain of; that is, his grievance is really about the causes or conditions of their imprisonment, and not at all (except through mere confusion of thought) about their forcible feeding.

If he answers No—i.e., that forcible feeding would be wrong even if the imprisonment were right—he is logically bound to adopt one of these two alternative positions:—

(a) That a prisoner justly imprisoned should be released because, and solely because, he or she refuses to eat. I emphasise the “because,” for, the imprisonment being ex hypothesi just, there can be no ground for the release except the refusal. This would be to let a second offence cancel the punishment for the first.

(b) That a prisoner should be deliberately allowed to commit suicide.

The State treats an attempt at suicide as an offence even on the part of the ordinary free citizen, and punishes anyone who connives at it. In permitting a prisoner to starve herself to death, the State would itself be deliberately conniving at this same offence on the part of one in its own care.

If Mr. Brailsford has a real complaint against the forcible feeding of women suffragists, as distinct from their imprisonment, he must accept one or other of these alternatives, (a) or (b). Which does he? Or what possible third alternative can he suggest?

I hope he will not allow his sense of the indignity involved in such feeding (which those who differ from him in other respects can feel as keenly as he) to divert him from the logical issue.

It is certainly a horrible thing, but the question is, who is to blame for it?—Yours, &c.,

J. A. SALTER.

8, Sydney Street, S.W.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The claim of privilege for political offenders has arisen because prison treatment has been brutal, and one hopes that nobody, or at least nobody outside a prison, now wishes to brutalise "ordinary criminals," whether refractory or not. The suffragist prisoners are most brutally treated, and it is evident that other women and men must be brutally treated too, without publicity, without the support of influential friends, admiring crowds and money, and without the consolation that imprisonment with all it involves is voluntarily and deliberately undergone for the sake of an idea. I have heard that girls under sentence for child murder "have to be" forcibly fed. If this is true, and if they are deranged in mind, as is likely, why are they in prison? Or if they are sane and in despair, is this the approved method of help? When a prisoner breaks the window or knocks about the tin pans, is it usual to put her in handcuffs for twelve hours, or to leave her in a dirty punishment cell till she faints? Is it true that, as an authority said to Miss Marsh, they "always break the spirit of refractory prisoners"?

These are methods of barbarism, and it is horrible that want of sympathy with a conspicuous party should make decent people condone them now, when it is impossible not to be aware of them. The sentences on Miss Marsh, Miss Clarkson, and Miss Neilans are savage. Miss Neilans is imprisoned for three months for discoloring some paper. The law and prison treatment seem to be quite out of touch with modern understanding of human nature, and, after all, even a voluntary prisoner is entitled to be treated according to reason. Surely it is not possible that these things will be allowed to go on.

I am sorry to learn from Mr. Brailsford's letter that one of the small Superstitions is still alive, a wretched little creature with one eye and the forehead of a spider monkey, whose name is "A Reform Bill is necessarily the work of the last Session of a Parliament." If it should recur, would you, sir, kindly utter the words, "Right Honourable Walter Runciman, Cabinet Minister"? As it has the greatest respect for authority, it will at once turn green and run into one of the caverns of black basalt which surround the office of THE NATION for the imprisonment of the enemies of mankind. Mr. Runciman did, on October 19th, say to a deputation that he thought the Bill ought to be brought in early in the new Parliament. This is clearly not only possible, but necessary, if the subject is such a large one as adult suffrage. If, when the Act came into operation, there were a few years of adult suffrage bye-elections to begin with, the timid would have time to find out gradually that the new electors were of the same color, the same nationalities, the same classes, the same political parties, the same religious opinions, and the same homes as the old ones.—Yours, &c.,

R. NASH.

42, Well Walk, Hampstead.

[This correspondence must now close.—ED., NATION.]

THE FALSITY OF THE PLEBISCITE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The following speech, delivered by the late Jules Grévy before the National Assembly on the 19th November, 1873, seems appropriate to the occasion:—

"Le plébiscite n'est qu'une fausse déférence pour la souveraineté nationale. La masse des électeurs ne peut ni comprendre ni résoudre les questions si ardues et si complexes qu'on voudrait lui poser. Il y a des démocrates de deux espèces: il y a ceux du gouvernement direct par les masses, et il y a ceux qui admettent le principe de la représentation. Je suis de ces derniers. Je trouve que la masse d'un peuple arrivé à l'état de lumières où sont parvenues les nations modernes n'est point assez éclairée pour résoudre elle-même de telles questions (interruptions et rumeurs). Alors, messieurs les interrupteurs, que faites-vous ici? Pourquoi ne renvoyez-vous pas devant la nation la discussion et le vote de vos projets ordinaires? Pourquoi ne pratiquez-vous pas franchement le principe du gouvernement direct? Si le peuple est capable de statuer sur les grandes questions de gouvernement, à plus forte raison l'est-il de discuter les lois ordinaires que vous votez. Réunissez donc le peuple sur la place publique et laissez-lui le soin de se gouverner lui-même. Nous connaissons, nous, une autre manifestation de la volonté nationale; c'est la représentation, qui, seule, rend possible, dans les grandes nations, le gouvernement du pays par le pays, mais qui a cet autre avantage de remettre la direction des affaires publiques à l'élite des citoyens, mandataires des autres; c'est le grand principe moderne de la représentation, c'est le principe libéral et parlementaire; l'autre n'est qu'apparence et déception."

—Yours, &c.,

J. L. BALBI.

December 27th, 1909.

MAKING THE FOREIGNER PAY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Rowland Hunt infers in his letter that the tariff of the United States subjects to duty only those articles which the poor do not buy, and he instances three commodities—tea, coffee, and raw cocoa—to prove his statement. As a matter of fact, the articles he mentions are the only three (and cocoa is only free in its crude state) which can be said to be used by the masses of the people, and which are on the free list. Every other commodity or article that is necessary for every-day life for the people themselves is subject to very considerable and heavy duties, and it only needs to instance a few to prove that such is the case.

Wearing apparel	50 per cent. to 60 per cent.
Woollen wearing apparel ...	60 per cent. and 44 cents (1/10) per lb.
Woollen underwear	60 " " " 44 " " "
Blankets	30 per cent. to 40 per cent. and 22 " " " "
Crockery	60 per cent.
Matches	6 cents gross boxes of 100 matches.
Paper	35 per cent.
Fish, canned	30 per cent.
Vegetables, canned	40 per cent.
Vegetables, fresh	25 per cent.
Oatmeal flour	1 cent lb.
Wheaten flour	25 per cent.
Salt	7 to 11 cents per 100 lb.
Pickles	40 per cent
Bacon	4 cents per lb.
Fresh beef	1½ cents per lb.
Eggs	5 cents per doz.
Lard	1½ cents per lb.

Mr. Hunt fails to distinguish between the fact that in this country duties are levied for the purpose of revenue only, and that the greatest part of the duties paid go into the Exchequer, whereas in the United States the duties levied are for the purpose of Protection, and the amount paid direct to the Treasury does not form more than a small proportion of what the consumer in that country is called upon to pay. It is indisputable that in no country in the world is the consumer so heavily taxed, for the benefit of the few of the richer classes, as in the United States.

Mr. Hunt's mode of calculating the benefits which would accrue if Tariff Reform were introduced into this country is, like similar calculations made by Tariff Reformers, based on pure theory. He takes no account of the fact that our exports of manufactured goods far exceed our imports of manufactured articles, and he assumes that the three hundred millions of such manufactured goods now exported would not be interfered with.

Mr. Hunt's advice that the people of this country should look back at the lessons of history is one that should be taken, and the reader of history would then ascertain the deplorable state in which the masses of the people were under the protective regime. They would find that wages were reduced all over the country, that the greatest distress prevailed, and that in large towns many were without visible means of existence. In Leeds alone there were 2,000 such families, and one-fifth of the town's population was dependent for existence on the poor rates.

Finally, Mr. Hunt refers to the warnings that have been given to the British men and British women on the question, and those men and women cannot do better than take note of the warning given to them by Mr. Chamberlain some years ago, when he said:—

"I can conceive it to be just possible, although it is very improbable, that, under the sting of great suffering, and deceived by misrepresentations, the working classes might be ready to try strange remedies, and might be foolish enough to submit for a time to a proposal to tax the food of the country; but one thing I am certain of, if this course is ever taken, and if the depression were to continue or to recur, it would be the signal for a state of things more dangerous and more disastrous than anything which has been seen since the repeal of the Corn Laws."

Yours, &c.,
S. R.

December 29th, 1909.

[This correspondence must now close.—ED., NATION.]

"THE BLUE BIRD."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your critic of Maeterlinck's play, "The Blue Bird," seems to have missed much of the secret of its charm, and once again one recognises that the most beautiful things in life do not appeal to every spectator. The play is a dream, and a dream would cease to be a dream if it were not inconsequent, intangible, illogical. It would lose that perfect incompleteness that makes one able to enjoy it without deep moral earnestness.

The lesson of man's conquest of nature is gently hidden by the unsatisfactory episode of the rebellious forest. The relations of the dog and the cat are shown much more by the natural state of enmity in which they live than by the faithfulness of the dog and the treachery of the cat to man.

The mysteries of life and death are indicated more beautifully than any reasoned argument could do it. These are at the back of every child's mind, and are either ignored or despised or respected by their elders. M. Maeterlinck gives no explanation; he only shows which way the answers lie. His play is not instead of teaching, but it throws a new light on the old familiar truths. Let us be thankful for the spiritual meaning so delicately indicated for those who have eyes to see, and let us be neither surprised nor offended that the curtain falls without the whole being made clear.—Yours, &c.,

M. L. B.

December 29th, 1909.

FOOD TAXES, WIDOWS, AND PENSIONERS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In the conflicting issues of the General Election now before us it is of vital importance to consider that great army of voiceless and honorable women, I mean the widows of England, who, in silence and with patience, endure the trials and adversities of life and bring up their children, God alone knows how, on a pittance obtained either from the small estate left them by their husbands or which by their own efforts they are able to obtain by odd jobs.

From the summary tables of the Registrar-General of the 1901 Census, it appears that there are no less than 1,246,407 widows in England and Wales, more than one-fifth of the total married women in those two countries, and it is of the utmost importance to consider what the effect of any increase in the cost of living must be to these the weakest, the most lonely, and the most sorrowful of his Majesty's subjects.

Admittedly any further taxation of food must inevitably raise its cost, and what compensating advantages can any system of Tariff Reform give to these poor women to compensate them for this increased burden which it is proposed to place on them? Unless an immediate benefit equivalent at least to the burden thus thrust upon them is secured to them, it will be a disgrace to the manhood of England if, for whatever ulterior advantage they may receive, they add any additional privation to this honorable class of English womanhood.

This is not the only question to be considered in this connection:—

From the report of the Poor Law Commission it appears that, in 1908, there were only 77,705 widows in receipt of relief (both indoor and outdoor relief). Just imagine that, only 77,705 out of 1,246,407; and of these 33,066 were not able-bodied. The figures given are as follows:—

OUTDOOR RELIEF.

Able-bodied Widows 32,973
Children ... 92,344, or an average of 2·8 for each widow.

INDOOR RELIEF.

Ages.	Able-bodied in health.	Temporarily sick.	Not able-bodied.
20-44	662	761	334
45-59	1,056	1,907	1,697
60	48	231	28,140
Total	1,766	2,899	30,167

Total Indoor Relief ... 34,832
Total Outdoor Relief ... 32,973

77,705

When one considers these figures, one cannot refuse one's homage to these women, who exhibit such resource, independence, and all the sterling qualities of citizenship at its best, in avoiding the taint of pauperism, that only the small number of 1,766 able-bodied in the year given had recourse to indoor relief, and of the 32,973 receiving outdoor relief they have each three children to feed, clothe, and bring up as citizens.

I would also instance a further class who would be grievously affected by any increase in the cost of food, and that is the old age pensioners. I have not the exact number by me, but there are at least between 600,000 and 700,000 of these, and I would ask upon what conceivable principle can it be just to increase the cost of food of these poor aged people, who cannot possibly reap any compensating advantage. An increase of 3d. a week in the cost of food would, to these people, be the equivalent to an income tax of at least 1s. in the £ on the pension received from them by the State.

I have ventured to deal with this matter at some, but, I trust, not disproportionate, length, in the hopes that the elector will think, not once, but twice and three times, before he does anything to add to the burden already borne, and patiently and silently borne, by the aged, the fatherless, and the widow.—Yours, &c.,

A. W. FINDLAY.

Langholm, 101, Bulwer Road, Leytonstone.

Poetry.

NEW YEAR VERSES.

I.

W. E. GLADSTONE: BORN DECEMBER 29TH, 1809.

It is a hundred years
Since the chimes of New Year morn
Idly broke on the ears
Of a little child new-born,
Whose voice, in the fulness of time,
Ringing a New Year chime
In the ear of England, should pierce,
Through the stupor of doubts and fears,
And the riot of scorn and sin,
To the heart of England, crying
That the Year of old feuds was dying,
And the Year of new hope come in.

II.

What dost thou bring, New Year? Triumph or trial,
Foisson or famine, flowers or weeds?—
"I am the moving shadow on the dial;
You are the garden, and the seeds."

C. H. HERFORD.

Reviews.

THE IDEAS OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.*

"A REVOLUTION" (said Mazzini) "is the passing of an idea into practice." The remark is deeply true of all Revolutions which are worthy of the name. Some of them, of course, are mere changes of masters or of parties. Others, again, like the English Revolution of 1688, or the French Revolution of July, 1830, are little more than a vindication of earlier principles of government against the reactionary attempts of monarchs. They imply no forward reach, but rather a return to accepted usages. The outbreak in France in 1789 was of a very different order. It was neither a pronunciamiento, nor a reversion to type. It baffled the calculations of statesmen and the rules of the party game. It was a Revolution because it sought to carry into practice ideas fermenting in the brains both of thinkers and of peasants.

Prince Kropotkin is well suited to the task of telling again a story that has been told full often. He approaches it from a novel standpoint. He is a distinguished thinker, but he can feel with the peasants. He has perforce long resided in the West, but he has the experience born of contact with the beginnings of Revolution in Russia. These circumstances, which invest the book with a peculiar interest, have their own perils. His hatred of Russian autocracy is apt to color his judgments on the far milder rule of Louis XVI.; and his memory of Muscovite serfdom tinges his description of the agrarian abuses of the ancien régime. Macaulay remarked that historians who essay the description of comparatively recent events incur a danger which almost counterbalances the interest of their theme. Their story lives because it treats of institutions and parties still among us; but it tends to be, and is chiefly used as, a repertory of partisan arguments. What was notoriously the case in Macaulay's great work, is so here. Prince Kropotkin intended his narrative to be impartial; but at times it sinks almost to the level of a pamphlet against the Tsardom.

The author unduly depreciates the old monarchy. Louis XVI. and his reforming efforts receive short shrift at his hands. The King is condemned as a stupid, heartless, hypocritical being, whose efforts for reform, always a mockery, were abandoned at the first plausible excuse. This is to misread the character of Louis XVI., whose weakness, though inexcusable at times, resulted from his very limited understanding, his distrust of himself, and the almost monastic seclusion in which he had been kept during the reign of Louis XV. Having no experience of public affairs, he encountered a situation of unequalled difficulty. Moreover, his Queen was often his evil genius, especially in her endeavor to secure the fall of Turgot, a man whom the author summarily dismisses as a middle-class pedant. Further, the difficulties arising from the opposition of the Parliaments to the royal reforms were really serious; but a reader who is not aware of the facts would gather from this work that the King and Parliaments, as well as the cowardly middle-classes, were more or less in a league to keep the people out of their rights. This is surely a Muscovite reading of events. It is generally recognised now that the position of the peasants markedly improved during the years 1774-1788, and that the Revolution resulted largely from their rising spirit. They were certainly far better off than the serfs of Spain, Naples, and Prussia; and Prince Kropotkin should have suggested reasons for the outbreak taking place in France rather than among those down-trodden peoples.

Briefly, we think, they were these. The pulse of thought beat far more quickly in the French populace, partly because of the writings of Rousseau, Mably, and others, but also because their troops had fought side by side with the soldiers of Washington, and on their return home spread the story of the founding of the United States. Now, people do not move until some gleam of hope beckons them on. France alone saw the gleam. Temporary and local circumstances also helped to bring about the débâcle in the spring of 1789. The previous summer had been a time of drought, broken by most destructive hailstorms; the winter of 1788-89 was of unusual severity, damaging the mulberry trees of the central districts; and it was followed by a dry season which lowered the streams and left many of the corn-mills idle. The stories of the so-called pacte de famine, to which Prince Kropotkin lends too ready credence, may be explained partly on this natural basis, partly on the fear or credulity of the many, on which selfish speculators profitably traded. It is now recognised that there was a sufficiency of corn in France itself in 1789; but much of it could not be ground into flour; and in many localities the populace refused to let it be sent away to Paris or other large towns. Hence the bread riots which play so large a part in the history of that year.

The book improves when we approach the outbreaks of 1789. Prince Kropotkin does well to remind us that the jacqueries of that year were not due in the main to the capture of the Bastille by the Parisians. Of course, the imitative instinct is strong, especially among the French; and the popular triumph in Paris gave zest to the agrarian revolts; but it is well to point out that the outbreaks began long before July, 1789. He also holds strong ground, as against the National Assembly, when he indicts that body for its timidity in dealing with the agrarian abuses. The so-called "St. Bartholomew of privileges" (August 4th, 1789) was a thrilling occasion for the Liberal nobles and their backers; but that "orgy," as Mirabeau termed it, was, after all, little more than a declaration of war against Feudalism, soon patched up by a half-hearted compromise on the questions of tithe and peasant proprietorship. There is something to be said for the plan of maintaining all that was tenable in the old system. It was especially hard on the curés to sweep away tithes without any compensation whatever; and the same may be said of some of the feudal proprietary rights in question. But it was certainly the height of folly loudly to proclaim the abolition of Feudalism and then to fix thirty years' purchase as the quota for the buying out of the feudal lords outright. Here we have one of the chief reasons why the Revolution did not "consolidate." It was not (as Carlyle whimsically held) because the constitution "would not march," but because the peasantry had their appetites whetted and then were put off with half a meal. The author harps perhaps too strongly on the agrarian motif when he terms the Legislative Assembly of 1791-2 reactionary because it did not decree absolute manhood suffrage and sweep away without indemnity all the relics of Feudalism. Somewhat strained, too, is his contention that the Revolution subsided after 1793 because the Convention tackled these questions. There were several other influences working to the same end, namely, the warping influence of a semi-military despotism on democracy, the successes gained over neighboring Powers, the rise of the old national questions, sheer weariness after four years of turmoil, and disgust at the needless ferocity of the leaders of 1793-4.

On these wider questions Prince Kropotkin has little to say; and his narrative is weak in regard to the personality of the chief actors in the Revolution. It is at its best in dealing with the agrarian questions at stake. Their influence has never been so incisively described. His volume has benefited from the advice of French scholars. A notable instance is the long note of M. Guillaume on pp. 137-9. We can therefore pardon Prince Kropotkin the exaggerations or errors that disfigure his pages. They are numerous—as when he says that "the mass of the people, flayed without mercy, had come to the point of not being able to produce its own food on the rich soil and in the productive climate of France"; or when he vaguely suggests a comparison between the English movements of 1648, 1688, and that of France in 1789-93; or, again, when he accuses England of using all possible means to bring about a relentless war against France in 1793 (an Anglophobe legend long since exploded); in fine, his persistent glorification of the men of the street and his undue depreciation of rulers, statesmen, and Assemblies.

We forget all this and more when we peruse the hopeful "Conclusion," gemmed with sentences like this—"A reform is always a compromise with the past, but the progress accomplished by Revolutions is always a promise of future progress." We must add, however, that this progress depends on a due understanding of the follies and blunders of the French Revolutionists, which wrecked their cause, and will wreck that of their would-be imitators, unless they behave with more wisdom and self-restraint. Such wisdom will scarcely be gained from this volume, which is a panegyric of the popular movements of 1789-94 rather than a judicial examination. "The people! Always the people," exclaims Prince Kropotkin. Be it so. But the example of the years 1793-4 is not altogether encouraging, if the "popular communism" which the author praises has to be consolidated under the rule of an "Imperial juggler." We can only hope that the Russian people, to whom he points as the leaders in the next great onward move of mankind, will see in the French Revolution not only a beacon of hope, but a lighthouse warning off from rocks and quicksands.

* "The French Revolution (1789-1793)." By P. A. Kropotkin. Translated from the French by N. F. Dryhurst. Heinemann. 6s.

THE CULTS OF THE GREEK STATES.*

THIS is an excellent work. Dr. Farnell refers in his preface to the five volumes into which the work has grown, not one volume is too large, though the whole is larger by two volumes than it was at first projected to be. With its publication what the author terms "the self-imposed task," which has occupied his "intervals of leisure throughout twenty years, is at last completed." Had Gibbon allowed himself to say in a preface to his history—though his theme was the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, yet it was not greater than the Greek Cults—what he has said in his autobiography he would have confessed, as Dr. Farnell has done, that his task was "self-imposed"; but he would have added that unoccupied leisure was nigh to madness, for the state of a man who tried to live without any "self-imposed task," was only to be described as a form of dementia. It is only the men who so fill their memories of leisure that redeem their moments from prosaic commonplace. Dr. Farnell, who is here more prosaic than Gibbon, does not say on this point all he might have said; but he does better than if he had tried to imitate the inimitable. With a proper knowledge of his own limitations and powers he yet fulfils the promise of his opening volume, and brings the work to a respect-worthy conclusion.

In effect, he says, there are subjects between which he selects, and of those he specifies as omitted there are three:—

(a) The worship;

(b) The cults of the dead;

(c) The various ideas thereto attaching; though there is a peculiarity of phrasing which co-ordinates (c) with (b).

Here let me say quite frankly that Dr. Farnell seems to have confused his own limitations with those necessary to his subject. The function of the book is simply, as stated in the title, to interpret the cults of the Greek States, while the relation which existed between art and religion in Greece is a favorite one with our author. His book, therefore, tends to become what the Germans call a real Geschichte of Greek art, rather than an account of Greek religion. The two subjects of "hero worship" and "the cults of the dead," are ideas so intimately and so organically related as to be inseparable even in thought. If Greece has any philosophic sense and significance for later ages, they are due to the cults of the dead, or the doctrine of immortality which has a special relation to the future and to the continued life of man; and, according to Plato, not only was man immortal, but he worshipped the deities because they were worshipful and they continued to live in the life because in the thought of man. To speak with a modern poet, they lived in "the faith of human reason," because they were conceived as higher than the highest of human beings, not simply in physical qualities, but in moral. And so we need the two beliefs treated fully before we can see Greek religion as it really lived.

In this work we find the cults of the Greek States clearly conceived, yet what is needed is far more a discussion touching the relation of the religion to the States, as well as to the ideas that went to make up the religion, than an account of the way in which religion is an institution, created of man for the culture of his own spirit and the need of society. This needs to be clearly stated because it is one of the points where Greek religion, as such, profoundly influenced Christianity and the Christian Church. This religion must be conceived as distinct from the Christian as well as the Greek State. Unless we so conceive it we fall into the greatest of all difficulties as regards the idea of the State or the religion. And unless this be done, we cannot have any philosophy of religion nor any discussion of the comparative work of Greek religion.

If we turn to this volume we find that it contains an excellent sample of the way in which, in past volumes, Greek religion has been handled. At least there are two Deities here treated in detail, Hermes and Dionusos. The first of these is Hermes. Dr. Farnell thinks he has evidence that Hermes was not a native Greek deity, but an adopted and adapted god. One of the evidences is connected with a name given to him, and it is significant, not only of the elevation of Greek religion, but also of the fastidiousness of the Greek spirit which naturally avoided anything that suggested uncleanness, whether in God or in man. The word is φάλης, which is held here to be related to φαλλός. One of the things that most astonishes every visitor to India is the presence of the Phallic symbol especially in connection with the worship of a deity so great and so austere as Siva. I do not think that Siva can be identified with "the reproductive energy of nature." To understand him and his association with so grotesque a symbol we must recall how the late Professor Monier Williams, when he inquired why water was poured upon the symbol, was told that the water signified the need of some element to cool the heat or keep down the agitation of the god. It is because I do not believe that "Phallic" worship, as practised at any rate in modern India, is connected with a Divine being, that I hold it insignificant, or, at least, unconnected with "the reproductive energies of nature." This is only one Greek name given to Hermes, but evidently from Acts XIV., 12, where Barnabas was identified with Zeus and Paul with Hermes, Zeus and Hermes stood together, though in connections that make for their similarity, and though they are similar, yet it is under conditions that speak of Zeus as native to the Greek, while the other deity is alien. On the other hand Dionusos is a Greek god with a host of epithets which are described as belonging to him through his cult. The really significant name which is given to Dionusos is a name that is confined to Megara, and is not said to signify any living tradition of ancestral descent.

I greatly regret that more cannot be spoken in praise of this work, which is genuinely learned without being ostentatious in its learning. If I cannot speak as frankly as I would like, it is not through any desire to depreciate a book which is throughout good. If Farnell had distinguished properly between the State and the religion he would have done a good turn, and would have placed himself in a better position to deal with men in society; in other words, he would have had a clearer notion of religion which was to be criticised through itself, and not through men gathered together, whether in a college or in a society called a State.

A. M. FAIRBAIRN.

SOME ERRORS OF A THEORIST.*

It is a point of curious significance that whereas the Imperialist strain which Mr. Chamberlain injected into his Protectionist movement six years ago has dwindled into impotence among the fighting forces of his party, the few "economists" who have enlisted in his cause have joined because they wished to "save the Empire." The bacillus of Imperialism appears to find a particularly favorable nidus in certain sorts of academic brain. Professor Shield Nicholson is the latest victim. In this volume, mainly a commentary upon certain portions of the "Wealth of Nations," we trace the intellectual wanderings which have brought him to the conclusion that it may be desirable to bind the Empire by a Customs union and a protective tariff. That Adam Smith, whom most men have regarded as the great gospel of Free Trade, should here be pressed into protective service, may seem strange at first. But to those familiar with the type of academic mind, it will be recognised as natural enough. The deeper and more detailed study of any subject disposes such students to convert exceptions into rules, and to correct the popular estimate by placing some neglected doctrine in the place of first importance. Now in the liberal and occasionally loose exposition of the principles of free exchange by the great economist, there are certain passages of qualification. Adam Smith did allow that defence was more than opulence, and that for defensive purposes some sacrifice of perfect liberty might justly be required. When a home trade in competition with a foreign trade was subjected to special taxes, import duties might be put on to balance them. The principle of retaliation also receives from him a strictly limited assent. None of these concessions, however, contravenes the economic validity of Free Trade logic.

* "The Cults of the Greek States." Vol. V. By Lewis Richard Farnell, D.Litt. Oxford University Press. 18s. 6d. net.

* "A Project of Empire." By J. Shield Nicholson. Macmillan. 7s. 6d. net.

Professor Nicholson cannot really extract authority for his main position from these sources. It is to Smith's argument in favor of the superior advantages of home employment of capital that he directs himself. He persuades himself that Smith would have been willing to prevent invasions of our markets in certain eventualities by means of a protective tariff. "Adam Smith, looking always to facts, makes it an essential condition for the retention of capital in the home country that it should obtain equal, or very nearly equal, profits as compared with employment elsewhere. . . . If, then, by a small duty the home market can be retained for our own workmen—if the small duty gives enough profit to retain the capital—the duty would, on his principles, be an advantage, unless it can be shown that the capital, if displaced, would find at least equally advantageous employment at home in something else."

Professor Nicholson intimates that Adam Smith had no principle wherewith to decide whether or not a tariff can increase the volume of employment of capital and labor, and for his part he insists that what is needed is a Royal Commission to study the facts. This, in effect, is a frank abandonment of the theory of exchange on which Free Trade takes its stand. Admitting, as he does, that Adam Smith did in fact reject all the proposals of Protection in his time as injurious to the people both in their capacity of consumers and producers, Professor Nicholson urges that these positions are not binding upon our time, that they need "the verification of experience, and from generation to generation experience changes or may change." "In this demonstration no repetition of postulates and axioms can dispense with the appeal to experience."

Now we deny that this rightly represents the attitude of Adam Smith towards the principles of free exchange. He would not, consistently with the main trend of his thought, have admitted that postulates and axioms and the play of logic were incompetent to dispose of such a fallacy as that Protection can increase the volume of employment in a country. Professor Nicholson may hold this, but if he does, we would invite him to show, by illustration, how a Royal Commission can possibly by any appeal to facts test the issue.

He makes a good deal of play with the statement that Smith's objection against tariff duties was fear of creating monopoly, and suggests that, if it could be shown that such an effect would not ensue, Smith might have sanctioned Protection of home markets. No doubt there are passages in which Smith allows that import duties might be used for revenue, without urging the necessity of corresponding excise, but to give away the entire Free Trade position upon the strength of a few qualifying passages of this kind is an abuse of intelligent criticism.

However, we are not concerned to defend the absolute logical integrity of Adam Smith. The curious thing is that Professor Nicholson should choose so intricate a manner to unfold his own Imperialist proposals.

What he is "after" is succinctly expressed in his concluding paragraph—"Imperial defence, to which every nation, or dominion, or commonwealth contributes its share; a system of representation by which every responsible constituent of the empire has a voice in the control of the concerns of the whole; an immense internal market for every part of the produce of all the constituents; a Customs Union and a common policy in commercial relations with other countries; a policy adverse to every kind of monopoly, and favorable to everything that increases the revenue and the prosperity of the great body of the people throughout the empire."

If Professor Nicholson had made any intelligent study of public opinion in the colonies, he would know that Free Trade within the empire was nowhere entertained as a possibility, that no single colony was to be scared or argued into withdrawing the protection of their manufactures against the competition of British goods, that neither Canada, nor Australasia, nor South Africa would hand over their national defences to a central Army and Navy, would limit their control of their fiscal arrangements, or would undertake the vast responsibilities of governing and defending our great "unfree" empire. Imperial federation of this sort is definitely killed. All this might have been learned from a careful reading of the Report of the last Colonial Conference, supplemented by such account of the negotiations for Imperial Defence as have been published this year.

The notion that any such Imperial Customs Union, with the necessary tariff against foreign goods, would fail to foster "monopolies" in this country, or would increase the aggregate revenue and prosperity of our people, is not particularly plausible, even when put forward under the protecting aegis of Adam Smith.

A CITY OF ITALY.*

THE strong attraction which the Italian Renaissance still has for all thoughtful people is explained when we remember that we are still to-day living in Renaissance ideas, and continuing the line of thought which the Renaissance initiated. We feel the same liveliness of interest in the original Italian movement that a river, if a river were conscious and self-analytical, might be expected to feel in its own natal source. Moreover, in days like these, when culture has become such a concentrated and laborious affair, and when all the realm of knowledge has been parcelled out among specialists and experts, who from time to time administer to us in small dry doses the results of their highly scientific investigations, but who naturally resent the intrusion of unlicensed outsiders into their own private domain, in such days as these it is, to say the least, not strange that we should turn longing eyes to a time when knowledge was free, when the delight of the mind in the exercise of its own faculties was the incentive and the inspiration, when men thought less of the find than of the search, when, as if from a mountain top, the first thinkers looked out over the landscape of the future, bathed in dew and light, all fresh and untrodden, before yet the Professor had claimed his lot in it, and dug himself in, and put up his "trespassers will be prosecuted." It has been argued that the Renaissance itself was not very deep in knowledge, that "science is indebted to it," as the encyclopædias say, for no discoveries of first-rate magnitude. Nevertheless, it made the discovery that thinking and investigating were sources of excitement and felicity, and was not that discovery the father of all future ones? Any man with a grain of mental vitality in him would rather, we take it, discover for himself that a duck can swim than be professorially instructed in the whole contents of modern science. It is the mind's activity that counts, not what the mind's activity brings in. If we could but forget all we have learnt, then we might have the joy of learning it all over again. But alas! we cannot forget.

So, grown old and disillusioned, with much petty knowledge stored in our tired old brains, we look back with a regretful interest at that golden intellectual youth of ours among the hills of Italy. We look first and most at Florence, of course, for Florence was as much the source and centre of the new intellectualism as Athens had been of the old. The lead Florence took and kept in every department of science, literature, and art, she took and kept by right of her keener and quicker intellectual sensibility. To science, literature, and art, she first gave the aim and tendency that was necessary to their development as instruments of an intellectualised civilisation. Florence, in a word, adapted art and letters to the conditions of modern life.

* "Bologna: Its History, Antiquities, and Art." By Edith E. Coulson James. Frowde. 12s. net.

A COMFORTABLE OLD AGE AND HOW TO SECURE IT.

VERY many have their capital invested in ordinary high-class securities yielding such a low rate of interest that their incomes are quite inadequate to their requirements. Few are aware that by selling these securities and using the capital to purchase an annuity they may increase their incomes from two to eight-fold, according to the purchaser's present age and state of health.

For example, £1,000 invested in the ordinary way in gilt-edged securities will yield perhaps £30 per annum. Invested in an annuity, a male aged 45 would draw annually £67 4s.; at age 60, £97, and at 80, £213 5s.

An annuity with a sound life assurance company has the supreme advantage of absolute safety. Professor de Morgan, the great mathematician, affirmed: "There is nothing in the commercial world which approaches even remotely the security of a well-established life office," and Mr. W. Schooling says in "Life Assurance Explained," "The position of an assurance company is much more stable than that of a bank." Why, then, pinch yourself on a mere three per cent., or, worse still, risk both capital and income, and invite worry and anxiety, in an attempt to obtain 4½ or 5 per cent. by investing in stocks or second grade bonds, when you may with the very best security obtain 6, 10, 15, or 20 per cent. of the amount of your capital annually for the rest of your life?

If you have not considered the matter you naturally ask how it is possible to give such large returns. It is the result of co-operation. If you knew when your life would end, you could spend part of your capital and all of your interest each year, so that at your death your capital would be exhausted. For lack of such fore-knowledge, you cannot safely adopt this method. You can, however, obtain the equivalent result by co-operating with others through the medium of a well-established life assurance company, thus getting the benefit of average duration of life, with the assurance that should you live to extreme old age your income never fails.

Having decided on this method of providing for a comfortable old age free from the vexatious cares and worries of uncertain investments, it only remains to select a company which best meets your requirements.

The insurance editor of the "Daily Telegraph" recently gave the following good advice on this question:—

"The rate of interest that can be earned upon the funds of a life office is the main factor in settling terms for annuitants which a life assurance company can give. The Colonial companies are able to earn a substantially higher rate of interest upon their funds, and see the way clear to keep on earning a higher rate of interest in the future than English and Scottish societies. Consequently, the Colonial offices can afford to give better terms to annuitants than English and Scottish companies.

"I frequently have to explain to correspondents the pros and cons of Colonial offices for annuities, and perhaps, therefore, it is well to put on record this opinion on the subject, because, the security being first-class, it is to the advantage of annuitants to obtain the superior terms which the Colonial offices are in a position to give."

There is no company to which the above remarks can be more appropriately applied than to the Sun Life of Canada. It has £6,000,000 of well-invested funds earning £5 10s. per cent. per annum, and gives its annuitants the advantage of this high rate. The result is that the Sun of Canada pays a higher rate to annuitants than any other company doing business in Great Britain.

This statement can be easily verified by consulting any standard work of reference on the subject.

The Sun of Canada was established over forty years ago, and confines itself strictly to life and annuity business. It has for many years transacted a successful business in the United Kingdom, where it has steadily grown in favour as its merits have become better known. In Canada, its home field, where it is best known, it has in volume of new business surpassed all other Canadian companies. Its annual new business is exceeded by very few companies in the British Empire.

For the special protection of policy-holders and annuitants in Great Britain and Ireland, the Sun Life of Canada has made a voluntary permanent deposit of £100,000 in the Bank of Scotland, in the names of the Right Hon. the Earl of Albemarle and the Right Hon. Sir Charles Dalrymple, Bart., P.C., as trustees for the faithful performance of all its obligations in the United Kingdom.

The following shews the amount required to purchase an annuity of £100 per annum, payable half-yearly, in the Sun Life of Canada, in comparison with other British offices:—

MALES.		Age	Age	Age
		55	65	75
SUN OF CANADA	£1,214	£895	£613
Average of other British Offices	£1,307	£956	£635
FEMALES.
SUN OF CANADA	£1,335	£992	£669
Average of other British Offices	£1,441	£1,071	£701

In addition to giving a larger return than other companies, the Sun of Canada pays the stamp duty amounting to £5 on each £1,000 of purchase-money, in many companies paid by the purchaser.

The company has adopted the equitable system of granting larger annuities where the health of the annuitant is slightly impaired. When the impairment is of a more serious nature, the amount of the annuity is correspondingly increased. Rates for these will be quoted on application.

Many persons are deterred from purchasing annuities because of the loss of capital that would result from early death. To obviate this objection the Sun of Canada issues annuity bonds guaranteeing that should death occur before the annuity payments equal the amount invested the difference will be returned to the annuitants' legal representatives on proof of death.

Deferred annuities to begin at some fixed date in the future may be purchased at greatly reduced rates, and may be paid for in a single payment or by annual or half-yearly instalments, either with or without return of premiums in case of death before the first payment of the annuity becomes due.

Survivorship, joint life, and all other forms of annuities are granted by this company.

The chief office of the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada is 93, Queen Victoria Street; manager, J. F. Junkin. Full particulars will be sent free to any enquirer. The date of birth should be given.—[ADVT.]

And yet an Italy that was all Florence would be but a meagre and uninteresting affair. So much that enriches life, so many thoughts and aspirations we could ill afford to let die, were housed in other cities! In Padua and Bologna scholarship had struck root, in lonely Perugia were treasured the pure relics of medieval sanctity, in Naples and the South the old childish, wide-eyed paganism still pleasantly survived, among her grey lagoons Venice darkened and glowed in all the voluptuous splendor of Oriental color. The chief Italian cities seem like a cluster of precious stones, each flashing with its own light, Florence, the white diamond of intellectualism, shining in the midst of them.

It is of one of these cities that Miss James writes. Like all the others, Bologna has its own history, its own charm and interest, its own individuality. This individuality Miss James has disengaged with much skill and precision. She calls her work a "slight sketch"; but it is more than that. If not exhaustive, it is essentially suggestive. The chapters on art, on history, on archæology, on literature, are based on wide reading and a careful examination on the spot of the best authorities. Occasionally we are tempted to think that the author has yielded a little to the inclination we all have slightly to overrate the importance of a subject to which we have devoted years of attention. We doubt if an entirely dispassionate critic would rate Bolognese painting quite as highly as Miss James is inclined to rate it. Nevertheless, on this subject as on others, she writes with a thorough knowledge of the latest critical researches, and in several particulars, notably in her vindication of the merit of Jacopo degli Avanzi, in which she avails herself of the light thrown by Mr. Perkins on that artist's work, she performs a useful service in counteracting the inadequate but still prevalent estimate of Crowe and Cavalcaselle. The book, in short, is the fruit of much study, careful investigation, and no slight literary ability, and may quite confidently be commended, not only to visitors to Bologna, but to all who wish for a succinct but not superficial history of the city.

TALES OF OVERSEAS.*

MRS. MEYNELL, in her thoughtful essay, "Decivilised," took to task the provincial, overseas, American or colonial for promising "the world a literature, an art, that shall be new because his forest is untracked and his town just built." She spoke of the "young nations with withered traditions" born into "an inclination for things mentally inexpensive, nations for whom there is no future, since the infection of commonness once begun in the many, what dulness in their future!" From "the infection of commonness," which modern civilisation has spread all over the globe, it is true that literature can gain no advantage. Purity and beauty of style are qualities that wake no response in democracies that seek inspiration in the cheap novelette and joy in the gramophone. More serious is the lack, both in supply and demand, of original matter in communities whose experience of life, at least, lies often out of the track of routine. It seems that an unconventional life does not heed unconventional types of minds. The Colonies offer scant encouragement to writers to look at life with a fresh eye, and these last are compelled to hawk their wares in London, with but a shadowy chance of attracting the attention of English people, whose sympathies rarely carry beyond the radius of their own affairs. It is for these, as well as for other reasons, that we welcome the two volumes before us, "The Trader" and "Tropical Tales," both of which reveal the unconventional horizon of writers who, irked by the cramping routine of the daily duties and distractions of town life, have wandered far from the centre. It is interesting to note the contrast in the attitude of the man and the woman wanderer. Miss Dolf Wyllarde, whose talent is indeed not seen to such advantage in her short stories as in "The Story of Eden" and "Uriah the Hittite," is fond of showing us heroines who, under the hardened mask of women who are fighting for their own hand, conceal a nervous intensity of unsatisfied feminine feeling. The absence of the sheltering warmth of home life, while developing in them a frank camaraderie with the men with whom they are thrown together, naturally intensifies their desire for social happiness. Unlike the women of a luxurious society, if they are hard without, they are soft within. Women whose inexperience or girlish innocence has been taken advantage of by men who scheme to play on feminine weakness are prominent in Miss Wyllarde's works. Perhaps the cleverest study in "Tropical Tales" is the first, which closes with the passionate relief of a girl when she hears of the death of a man whose memory she hates for the pain and fear it has brought her. "There was a brief episode in her life which she would have given anything to wipe out—and, behold, it was done for her! He was gone—she might breathe freely again." Another clever tale is "On the Plains" which recounts how the new manager in a Jamaican sugar factory, when summoned to his child's deathbed, cannot leave it in an hour of crisis, and how his wife cannot fathom his masculine sense of duty. Interesting, also, is the last sketch, "Across the Pastures," which makes clear under what scheme of household arrangements it is that the tropical portions of the Empire see the steady increase of a snuff and butter colored population. The colored woman's point of view is well brought out here, and it would be interesting to know what proportion of Englishwomen would sympathise with her.

Less critical in outlook is Mr. Cecil Ross Johnson's "The Trader," a story of overseas experiences, agreeable in its masculine impersonality and breadth. While the author has nothing of the artistic skill that distinguishes the pages of Mr. Conrad, his tone is free from the drum-beating of Mr. Kipling's school. His hero, Carteret, is an Englishman of good traditions, who emigrates to Australia, and, after some years of painful experiences of Queensland droughts and a straitened livelihood in bush townships, joins a fellow rolling-stone, Burdan, in setting up a trading station on the coast of British New Guinea, in the Torres Straits. The part of the coast selected for the venture is Danger Bay, a district where the natives are still savage and warlike, and one, consequently, shunned by the white traders, who are not to be found within a hundred miles on either side. The narrative gives lively pictures of tragedy and comedy in the life of the dozen white men settled within a few hundred miles, such as Curtin and Wayne, the Resident Magistrates, who each administer a district; Polk, the ruffianly ex-mate of "a Yankee floating hell"; Hendrickson, the trader on the Fly River, whose half-caste daughter, Anna, unluckily the one who bakes the better bread, elopes with an amorous pearler; and Smith, who is maimed in the most hideous fashion by the explosion of a dynamite charge. The pages on the death of this unfortunate man, who lies in agony imploring his mate to put him out of his misery, and the agonising debate of his two haggard-faced watchers, in whom conservative instinct fights a battle with humaner reason, bite deep into the memory. Excellent is the sketch of Curtin, the Magistrate, with his half-bitter, half-wistful look, a man who is eating his heart out at his lonely post, Daru, to which it is impossible to bring a white woman. Curtin is engaged to a girl at home, and has no prospects of an exchange or a pension, and a couple of months elapse between each mail. The chapter entitled "I Take a Few Passengers," which describes Carteret's cruise with some dangerous scallywags from Thursday Island to the mouth of the Mambare River, with an inland excursion to a new goldfield, is full of capital touches. A mutiny is quelled on board more by luck than by management, and the passengers develop so many feuds between themselves that Carteret is left to sail the ketch in peace. Typical is the trader's rencontre with the little cockney, Thornton, a New Guinea official, who turns up in the nick of time to rescue Carteret when he has been down five days with fever and dysentery, left alone in the bush, his carriers having gone on to the station in search of help and food. Thornton's practical philosophy is so typical of the cynical spirit in which the white traders and planters face life that we select a passage, in which tragedy and comedy are nicely blended:—

I realised that I was alive, and apparently going to live. "For God's sake move me," I said.

* "Tropical Tales." By Dolf Wyllarde. Stanley Paul. 6s.

"The Trader." By Cecil Ross Johnson. Duckworth. 6s.

FREE TRADERS

Should study and circulate the following important works:—

THE LIFE OF RICHARD COBDEN.

By LORD MORLEY. With a Portrait. Popular edition in 1 vol. Cloth 2s. 6d. net (post free 2s. 10d.). Jubilee Edition in 2 vols. 7s. the set.

Special Edition in five parts. Paper covers, 6d. net each part.

THE POLITICAL WRITINGS OF RICHARD COBDEN.

New Edition. With Preface by LORD WELBY and Introductions by SIR LOUIS MALLETT and WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT. With Frontispieces. 2 vols. (Reformer's Bookshelf.) Large crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. (post free).

RICHARD COBDEN AND THE JUBILEE OF FREE TRADE.

By P. LEROY-BEAULIEU, HENRY DUNKLEY ("Verax") Dr. THEODOR BARTH, The Right Hon. LEONARD COURTNEY, M.P., and The Right Hon. CHARLES VILLIERS, M.P., with Introduction by RICHARD GOWLING. Uniform in style with the Jubilee Edition of "Richard Cobden." Cr. 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. (post free).

COBDEN AS CITIZEN. A CHAPTER IN MANCHESTER HISTORY.

Being a facsimile of Cobden's pamphlet, "Incorporate Your Borough!" with an Introduction and a complete Cobden Bibliography. By WILLIAM E. A. AXON. 21s. net (post free 21s. 5d.).

SPEECHES ON QUESTIONS of PUBLIC POLICY.

By RICHARD COBDEN. Edited by JOHN BRIGHT and JAMES E. THOROLD ROGERS. With a Preface by JAMES E. THOROLD ROGERS, and Appreciations by J. E. THOROLD ROGERS and GOLDWIN SMITH, and 2 Photogravure Portraits. Fifth Impression. 2 vols. Large cr. 8vo, cloth. (Uniform with the Jubilee Edition of Morley's "Life of Cobden.") 7s. (post free).

ECONOMIC SOPHISMS OR FALLACIES OF PROTECTION.

By FREDERICK BASTIAT. Containing an Introductory Note by the Right Hon. H. H. ASQUITH, M.P., and a Frontispiece. Cloth 3s. 6d. (post free).

"The cardinal doctrines of Free Trade have never been more cogently presented or more brilliantly illustrated."—Mr. Asquith in the Introductory Note.

BRITISH INDUSTRIES UNDER FREE TRADE.

Essays by various writers. Edited by HAROLD COX. Cloth. (Reformer's Bookshelf.) 3s. 6d. (post free).

THE HUNGRY FORTIES.

An account of Life under the Bread Tax from the letters of Living Witnesses. With an Introduction by Mrs. COBDEN UNWIN. Illustrated (Reformer's Bookshelf.) 3s. 6d. (post free). People's Edition. Paper Covers, 6d. (post free).

COBDEN'S WORK AND OPINIONS.

By LORD WELBY and SIR LOUIS MALLETT. 3d. net (post free 4d.).

PEERS OR PEOPLE?

The House of Lords weighed in the Balance and Found Wanting. By W. T. STEAD. Popular edition, 1s. net (post free 1s. 3d.).

THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

By J. WYLLIE. Cheap edition. Paper boards, 1s. net. (post free 1s. 2d.).

"A concise and impartial history of the House of Lords."—The Times.

THE GOVERNANCE OF ENGLAND.

By SIDNEY LOW. Popular edition. 3s. 6d. net. (post free 3s. 10d.).

UNWIN'S SOCIOLOGY SERIES.

Paper boards, 1s. net. (post free 1s. 3d.).

INVASION AND CONSCRIPTION.

By J. A. FARRER.

THE LABOUR MOVEMENT.

By J. T. HOBHOUSE. With a preface by the Rt. Hon. R. B. HALDANE.

WOMEN'S WORK AND WAGES.

By EDWARD CADBURY and Others.

A complete list of the volumes in Unwin's Sociology Series will be sent free on request.

PAMPHLETS.

CORN LAW RHYMES AND OTHER VERSES.

By EBENEZER HOWARD. Paper covers, 2d. Cloth limp, 6d. (Postage 1d.).

SIDELIGHTS ON PROTECTION.

The History of a Vanished Industry. By AUSTIN TAYLOR, M. P. Paper covers, 6d.

T FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

January Number Ready on 1st.

The Hibbert Journal.

Principal Contents of January Number.

Father Tyrrell: Some Memorials of the last Twelve Years of his Life By BARON F. VON HUGEL.

George Tyrrell: A Friend's Impressions. By Rev. C. E. OSBORNE.

Tennyson. By Professor HENRY JONES.

Greek Religion and Morality as set forth by Pindar. By Professor EDWARD B. CLAPP.

The Collapse of Liberal Christianity. By the Rev. K. C. ANDERSON, D.D.

Orthodoxy, Heterodoxy, Heresy, and Freedom. By the Rev. P. T. FORSYTH, D.D.

Divoreons! By AN EVANGELICAL LAYMAN.

Grounds of Faith: A Study of Likelihoods. By ALBERT GEHRING.

Faith and Knowledge. By Professor EDUARD KONIG.

Truth in Art and in Religion. By E. F. CARRITT.

Catholicism and Happiness. By the Rev. R. L. GALES.

Savage Supreme Beings and the Bull-Roader. By R. R. MARETT.

Self-Assertion in Nietzsche and Self-Surrender in Boehme. By W. A. ROSS and the Rev. G. W. ALLEN.

Discussions. Reviews. Recent Books and articles.

Single Numbers, 2s. 6d. net.; 2s. 9d. post free.
Subscriptions, Ten Shillings per annum, post free.

JESUS or CHRIST?

BEING THE

HIBBERT JOURNAL SUPPLEMENT for 1909.

Now Ready, nearly 308 pp. super royal 8vo, 5s. net.
Postage inland, 5d.

This volume comprises contributions from the undermentioned writers:—

The Bishop of SOUTHWARK
Canon H. SCOTT HOLLAND
Rev. Father JOSEPH RICKABY, S.J.
The Late Rev. GEORGE TYRRELL
Rev. Principal A. E. GARVIE, D.D.
Rev. R. J. CAMPBELL, M.A.
Professor B. W. BACON, D.D.
Rev. JAMES DRUMMOND, D.D.
Rev. Principal J. E. CARPENTER, D.D.
Sir OLIVER LODGE
Professor HENRY JONES
Professor PERCY GARDNER
Mr. JAMES COLLIER
Professor H. WEINEL
Professor P. SCHMIEDEL
Professor NATHAN SODERBLOM (Upsala)

Just Published. Crown 8vo, Cloth. 5s. net; postage 4d.

SCIENCE, MATTER, AND IMMORTALITY.

By RONALD CAMPBELL MACFIE, M.A., M.B., C.M.,
Author of "The Romance of Medicine," "Air and Health," etc.

Prof. J. ARTHUR THOMSON, in "The British Weekly,"—"We are continually in need of having the history retold, since each great discovery makes it new. For this reason alone we should welcome Dr. Macfie's story of the becoming of things, for he has got a grip of modern researches and sees their bearing on past evolution, but we find a stronger reason in the way the story is told. There is a glow about it that we miss in most expositions of the great process, which discuss the stages in the unfolding with palaeontological solemnity."

From the First Review.—"As a general compilation of the achievements and limitations of Science it is altogether admirable, and we know no work of recent date better fitted to give the non-expert some idea of the new knowledge. A man who has read it with any care will have quite as much knowledge of recent Science as anyone, not a specialist, need require, and he will find, besides, much that is stimulating to speculation on what Science in the future is likely to achieve."—From a Leader in Globe.

Crown Theological Library. New Volumes.

MODERNITY AND THE CHURCHES.

By Prof. PERCY GARDNER, Litt. D., Oxford.

Just Ready. Crown 8vo, 5s.

THE OLD EGYPTIAN FAITH.

By Prof. EDOUARD NAVILLE,

Translated by Rev. Colin

Campbell, M.A., M.D.

Just Ready. Illustrated. 5s.

LIFE OF THE SPIRIT.

By RUDOLF EUCKEN, D.D., Prof. of Philosophy in Jena.

Third Edition at Press.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s.

Ready. Crown 8vo, 6s.

NATURALISM AND RELIGION.

By RUDOLF OTTO, Professor of Theology in the University of Gottingen.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,

14, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

"I'm going to. You want washing."

It was undeniable.

"I feel as if I wanted burning. How long have I been here?"

"Five days, as far as I can make out. 'Ave some stew?"

Afterwards they washed me; also they burned my bunk, my blanket, and my clothes. Thornton had brought a spare fly with him, and I used that. The next day Darkey dressed me, and I got up and sat outside, and began to move about. Thornton helped me to a log.

"Ow do you feel now?"

"Much better, thanks. I'm quite over it now."

He was staring in my face.

"Lord, but you look bad, Carteret. Your eyes are 'alf-way through your 'ead. And the 'ollowness of your cheeks makes the 'eight of your nose look 'igher than what it is."

"It strikes me I've had a rather near shave."

"Very near, I should say. I've 'ad seven men die of dysentery in the last few months. I've got 'em all buried in a row at the bottom of the garden. I'll show you their graves when you come down, if you like."

"Thank you very much."

"I buried 'em all myself. The men in the camp liked to see their mates buried all proper when there was a Government officer about, though when they are alone they don't bother much. Like all Australians, they 'aven't much sentiment, but they are good-'earted. So I buried 'em myself, all seven—and I made up a different prayer for each," he added, with a modest pride.

"Indeed?"

"It's a fact, Carteret. With two of them there was a chap in the camp gave me a 'and. 'E'd been a parson of sorts, they said—chapel, I believe. 'E could make up blooming fine prayers, too, and no mistake, but too long—with tags of the real service thrown in, all about 'dirt to dirt and ashes to ashes.' 'E wanted to boss the show through, but I wouldn't 'ave that, I being the magistrate." He spat reflectively. "I've got 'im there too."

"Dead, also?"

"'E was the fourth. There was another chap that I recognised I 'ad been shipmates with once. Funny meeting 'im like that, wasn't it? And another chap, they said, was the son of a lord."

Carteret gets away from the Mambare River as soon as possible, and sails for Danger Bay, only to find that in his absence the station has been rushed by the natives, looted, and burned to the ground. The boys have been wiped out, and Burdan is a prisoner in the hands of the Karo men—reserved for torture. It is evident, from many signs, that the author is not here writing of things he has himself known, though probably of things recounted to him. Carteret's subsequent experiences, his landing alone, his killing his partner, Burdan, when bound to the stake, with a well-directed shot, and his subsequent madness, all this is the work of the author's imagination, not convincing us, but serving to wind up some chapters in the life of a rolling-stone, singularly fresh and living in actuality and in atmospheric truth.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

"LADY HESTER STANHOPE," by Mrs. Charles Roundell (Murray, 6s. net), is a biography of Pitt's eccentric niece, based almost entirely on Dr. Meryon's "Memoirs" and "Travels." Mrs. Roundell says in her preface that no account of Lady Hester Stanhope has been placed before the public since Dr. Meryon's volumes appeared. This is inaccurate, for one of the best of George Paston's "Little Memoirs of the Nineteenth Century" is devoted to Lady Hester Stanhope. Mrs. Roundell only gives one chapter of eighteen pages to the first thirty-four years of her heroine's life; this period is full of interest, and deserves more extended notice. For three years she lived in her uncle's house, and had no small influence on politics. When Pitt was reproached for allowing this, he used to say, "I let her do as she pleases; for if she were resolved to cheat the devil himself, she would do it." "And so I would," added Lady Hester, when she told the story. Her later career showed that Pitt's estimate was not so very extravagant. In 1811 she went to Syria, and with only two or three English companions spent the rest of her life there. She adopted an Eastern mode of life, and exercised a great influence upon the Turkish pashas and her other half-civilised neighbors. For books she had a Bible, a Peerage, and a volume on cookery. Most of her day was spent in bed, and for four years she never left her own grounds. Occasionally she granted an interview to European visitors, one of these being Lamartine. The poet tried to appear to his best advantage, and thought he had succeeded, but Lady Hester said that "the very muleteers and servants thought him a fool." Lady Hester Stanhope, though overbearing, impatient and unpractical, was a woman of no ordinary gifts. Her later years were lonely and unhappy. She felt that she had thrown her talent away, that her ambitions had not been realised. Mrs. Roundell's book fails to present her in an adequate light.

* * *

In a volume called "The Dauphines of France" (Stanley Paul, 16s. net), Frank Hamel gives us fifteen biographical sketches of the wives of the French Dauphins. Fourteen of these ladies had an undisputed right to the title of Dauphine; the fifteenth, Marguerite of Austria, was repudiated by Charles VIII., and used the title only by courtesy. The author reminds us that, in spite of the pomp and glitter by which it was surrounded, the position of Dauphine was not in most cases one to be envied. Two of them, Mary Stuart and Marie-Antoinette, died on the scaffold, several others witnessed scenes of insecurity and danger, while only six became queens of France. As a general rule they were children when they came to France, ignorant of the country and with only a slight knowledge of the language, and unable to hold their own in the game of intrigue into which they were drawn. One of the happiest, as well as one of the most thoughtless and frivolous of them all, was Marie-Adelaide of Savoy, Duchess of Burgundy. Her high spirits and charm of manner won the affection both of Louis XIV. and Madame de Maintenon, and though many of her escapades caused a storm of disapproval, her irrepressible gaiety soon brought her back to favor. "Frank Hamel" shows a good knowledge of French history, and her narrative is clear and simple. Her book covers a period of more than five hundred years, and a full account of the fifteen Dauphines is impossible in four hundred pages. But, if she has not fully succeeded in her aim "to produce in every case a finished study of life and character," she has at least written a readable volume which compares favorably with most Court biographies of the present day.

* * *

As a memorial of the late Professor Hastie, a Lectureship bearing his name has been founded in Glasgow University, and the first course of lectures was given last spring by Dr. Macmillan. They have now been published under the title of "The Aberdeen Doctors" (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.), and make an interesting contribution to Scottish ecclesiastical history. The Aberdeen Doctors were a group of six theologians—three of them professors in the University, and the remaining three ministers in the city—who during the bitter controversies of the seventeenth century endeavored to exercise a moderating influence, and held views not unlike those of the Latitudinarian school in the English Church. "The point to emphasise," says Dr. Macmillan, "is that the Aberdeen Doctors had freed themselves from the influence of the confessional theology, which was narrowing down into a vain and narrow scholasticism. . . . They took up the questions that were the source of strife in an independent fashion, brought the light of thought, of reason, of history, and of free inquiry, to bear upon them, and came to conclusions which were naturally displeasing to both parties, but which were much nearer to the truth." Dr. Macmillan examines the views held by the members of the group in regard to Church Government, Doctrine, and Worship, and ends by a discussion of the problem of Church union, as it presents itself to-day. His book shows courage in grappling with fundamental problems, and should awaken interest in a group of scholars who, although they left but little mark upon the Church, deserve more attention than they have hitherto received.

* * *

It will surprise the average reader of "Christians at Mecca," by Mr. Augustus Ralli (Heinemann, 5s. net), to find that so many Europeans have emulated the achievement of Sir Richard Burton in getting through to Mecca and back again. There is quite a gallery of them, extending from the sixteenth century onwards. Some went merely for the sake of adventure, and of these John Fryer Keane has given us one of the most spirited narratives. Others were attracted thither in the cause of science, the names of Badia, Burckhardt, Hurgonje, and Burton being the most

MACMILLAN & CO.'S LIST

THE GLADSTONE CENTENARY

THE LIFE OF

William Ewart Gladstone

BY JOHN MORLEY.

In 3 Vols. 8vo. 42s. net.

POPULAR EDITION. In 2 Vols. 8vo. 5s. net each.

Trans-Himalaya :

Discoveries and Adventures in Tibet. By Dr. SVEN HEDIN. With 388 Illustrations from Photographs, Water-Colour Sketches, and Drawings by the Author, and 10 maps. 2 vols. 8vo. 30s. net.

2nd IMPRESSION.

In the Grip of the Nyika.

Further Adventures in British East Africa. By Lieut.-Col. J. H. PATTERSON, D.S.O. Author of "The Man-Eaters of Tsavo." With Illustrations. 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Light Come, Light Go.

Gambling—Gamblers—Wagers—The Turf. By RALPH NEVILL. With 9 Colour Plates and other Illustrations. 8vo. 15s. net.

THOMAS HARDY.

Time's Laughingstocks and Other Verses.

The Times.—"There have been a good many volumes of poetry published this year; but has there been one that surpasses or equals this in the indefinable quality of greatness by which human productions survive?"

The Rhythm of Modern Music.

By C. F. ABDEY WILLIAMS. Extra crown 8vo. 5s. net.

A Project of Empire.

A Critical Study of the Economics of Imperialism, with special reference to the Ideas of ADAM SMITH. By J. SHIELD NICHOLSON, M.A., D.Sc., F.B.A. Professor of Political Economy in the University of Edinburgh. 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Macmillan's Guide to Egypt and the Sudan. Including a Description of the Route through Uganda to Mombasa. With 35 Maps and Plans. Sixth Edition. 5s. net.

Mexico. The Wonderland of the South. By W. E. CARSON. Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 10s. net.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

The Education of Uncle Paul.

Algernon Blackwood.

Author of "Jimbo," &c.

Robert Emmet.

An Historical Romance.

Stephen Gwynn.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

Illustrated. Price 1s. 4d. Annual Subscription 16s.

TRAMPING IN PALESTINE. By HARRY A. FRANCK.

AFTERWARD. A Story. By EDITH WHARTON. Author of "The House of Mirth."

THE CREATORS: A Comedy. III. A Novel. By MAY SINCLAIR.

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE.

6/- for 2/- Post Free

2,800 "VICTORIAN" EDITION OF

BARRY'S TEACHERS' PRAYER BOOK.

Being the Book of Common Prayer, with Introductions, Analysis, Notes and a Commentary upon the Psalter. By the Right Rev. ALFRED BARRY, D.D., D.C.L., and a Glossary by the Rev. A. L. MAYHEW, M.A. 16mo. Bourgeois, Large Type Edition. Cloth boards, red edges. 6s. for 2s. Abroad 2s. 2d.; Pastegrain, limp, gilt edges, 7s. 6d. for 3s. 9d.; Abroad 3s. 11d.; post free. 53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

GLAISHER'S DECEMBER CATALOGUES OF PUBLISHER'S REMAINDERS AND BOOKS FOR BOYS AND GIRLS are now ready, and will be sent post free on application. These TWO CATALOGUES include many ENTIRELY NEW REMAINDERS in General Literature; also a large and wide selection of well-illustrated and attractive books for the young, suitable for New Year's Presents.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., Remainder and Discount Bookseller, 265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.

BOOKS FOR THOUGHTFUL READERS.

JUST ISSUED.

THE

La. Cr. 8vo. 6. net.

PRINCE OF DESTINY.

A Romance. By ARATH KUMAR GHOSH, Author of "1001 Indian Nights." A presentation of INDIA BY AN INDIAN, with its eternal patience, religious fervour, and PASSIONATE LOVE.

INDIA HELD BY THE SWORD (?)

This statement so often made in the British press is shown in this book to accuse Indian resentment and to cause BRITAIN'S PROBABLE LOSS OF INDIA.

The Daily Telegraph says: "Enthralling . . . A treat provided only by the most skillful of novelists."

The Outlook says: "An Epic of dreams. . . . Stirs the imagination and quickens the pulse."

Liverpool Post says: ". . . The reader who turns the first page will read to the end."

Bookman says: "We have read no book in which the very atmosphere of India is so wonderfully reproduced."

Observer says: "Sheer enchantment. . . . A real study of British India. Written by a gentleman."

Just issued. Demy 8vo. Cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

PROGRESSIVE REDEMPTION.

The Catholic Church, its Functions and Offices in the World reviewed in the Light of the Ancient Mysteries and Modern Science.

By Rev. HOLDEN E. SAMPSON.

Author of "Progressive Creation" (see below).

This book is of profound interest and importance to Theologians, Clergymen, as well as Ministers of all Denominations and religious THINKERS and workers generally. It presents a new and extremely important view of the Incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the Virgin birth, that connects the Catholic Doctrine with its scientific interpretation. A book peculiarly appropriate for the Clergy and Ministers who are at this season contemplating the subject of the Incarnation.

Now ready. Two den y 8vo. vols. Cloth 21s. net.

PROGRESSIVE CREATION.

A Reconciliation of Religion with Science.

By Rev. HOLDEN E. SAMPSON.

A book that has confessedly baffled the reviewers, and of which Mr. Arthur E. Waite has said, "It is of the quality of Revelation."

Just issued. Demy 8vo. 4½ pp. 7s. 6d. net.

SCIENTIFIC IDEALISM:

Of Matter and Force, and their relation of life and Consciousness. By WILLIAM KINGSLAND, Author of "The Mystic Quest,"

"The Esoteric Basis of Christianity," &c.

"Mr. Kingsland's work is well worth study, and that by men of all theologies, or of none. He is a man of wide knowledge."

Christian World.

Descriptive Circulars of these and other

LONDON:

REBMAN, Ltd.,

important Books sent on application.

129 Shaftesbury Ave,

W.C.

and all Librarians, etc.

THE ENGLISH REVIEW

MONTHLY.

2s. 6d.

CONTENTS OF JANUARY NUMBER:—

MODERN POETRY

LETTERS FROM AMERICA

(II)

C. Lowes Dickinson

BLOOD OF WOMAN

Austin Harrison

COLOUR MEANINGS OF SOME BRITISH BIRDS AND QUADRUPEDS

Philip Oyler

"MAMKA"

J. Saturin

TWO ESSAYS

Elizabeth Martindale

LUCY EVANS (II)

Gilbert Cannan

THE WIFE OF ALTAMONT

(II)

Violet Hunt

THE MONTH

Editorial

SOCIAL PARASITISM

J. A. Hobson

THE CONTENDING FORCES

Professor L. T. Hobhouse

REVIEW

R. A. Scott-James

Subscription—One Year 30s.; Three Months 7s. 6d.

CHAPMAN & HALL, Ltd., 11, Henrietta Street, W.C.

prominent in this connection, and one or two were carried there against their will. The one prominent point of similarity in their records at the Holy City is that they were, one and all, compelled to make open profession of the Mohammedan faith, and this, in most cases, involved the concealment of their nationalities. Only one instance is recorded of a European having entered Mecca and returning alive without abjuring either country or creed, and he afterwards owned that his terror of discovery prevented him from making observations. The Meccans enjoy a grim reputation for their treatment of infidels caught in their midst, and it still remains to be seen whether the opening of the Hejaz railway, linking up Constantinople with Mecca, will make the latter any more accessible to Christian tourists. To those who love the adventurous deeds of history we can commend no better book than this anthology of pilgrims to a still strange place.

* * *

WE have received from Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co. a most admirable satirical pamphlet, called "The Dook's Doomsday Book" (6d.), which is the wittiest and most entertaining presentment of the case against the Peers we have seen. It is so full of good drawing and good writing that we might quote it at any page for the amusement of our readers. We take quite at random these political "recipes":—

THE WELSH RABBIT.

"Take one good heart, a prime tongue, a sense of justice and a sense of humor; sprinkle with pepper, add a seasoning of ginger, some milk of human kindness, and plenty of Cream of Tartar. As soon as it simmers, serve hot—and strong."

THE BALFOUR JELLY.

"Take a thin slice of cold tongue, soak it in butter and vinegar, stir it up with a supercilious manner; add a seasoning of real brains, and the soft backbone of an eel; put over a slow fire till lukewarm; then stir in Tariff Reform, Protection, Free Trade, stale bread (taxed), and fresh meat (untaxed), with other such mixed notions and half beliefs minced very small. Season with philosophic doubt and bitter herbs. This should be turned out (at Election time) and kept in a cool place."

DOOKS STEW.

"Take a large rent-roll, stuff with unearned increment and hereditary rights, add a full tablespoonful of sauce, some superior capers, and several nice pieces of invective. Boil in the usual way; then mix with it a juicy stake in the country, a large veto, a good Budget cut up into slices, and a British Constitution chopped into fragments. These will fill the pot, and will soon boil over. Dish it immediately, and serve up at a General Election. This will be found an excellent way of treating what is too tough for ordinary cooking."

THE HEREDITARY GOOSE—HOW TO COOK IT.

"Use votes liberally, and, as soon as the goose is well basted, give it a good turn before the burning indignation of the country; it will be done brown in no time, and can then be taken down."

Or this from "Who's Who Among the Lords":—

"BORROWMORE, 5TH EARL OF.—Ivan, Frederic, Moses, Miguel, Louis, Oscar Schmidt, A.B.C., B.U.S.T., N.W., P.I.P., R.S.O. Purely English ancestry. Would have held several lucrative offices, but was never asked to. Notable athlete at College; created the highest record for running up bills; continued to go the pace, and at length, to crown his career, ran right through his ancestral estates. His legislative powers are, nevertheless, as good as ever, and, out of sympathy for the People, he came home from Monte Carlo at the risk of being summoned by his tailor, in order to vote against the Budget. Address: Formerly resided on his family property; is now living on his wits and cannot be located."

The Week in the City.

	Price Friday morning, Dec. 24.	Price Friday morning, Dec. 31.
Consols	82½	82½
Midland Def.	57½	59
Union Pacific	207½	209½
Mexican 1st Pref.	130½	134½
U.S. Steel	93½	94½

THOUGH interrupted by the Christmas holidays, business of all kinds has been active enough, and a generally cheerful spirit has been abroad both in Lombard Street and Capel Court. Lombard Street has, as usual at this season, been chiefly busied with providing itself with the fifteen to twenty millions of artificial credit that it and the rest of the financial world required at the end of the year, largely for the purpose of decorating balance-sheets with a fine show of "cash in hand." This credit it creates by taking securities to the Bank of England, borrowing the necessary millions from it, and leaving them with it to the credit of the various borrowers. Since a deposit at the Bank is considered as good as cash, the necessary cash is thus easily forthcoming, and the system is prettily elastic and economical. A spell of cheap money is looked for when this annual pressure is over, but after that the outlook is universally dubious.

BROADENING SPECULATION.

Stock markets have shown remarkable strength, in spite of holiday interruptions, inactive business, and a big account to be settled and dear money to finance it with. Members are looking forward to active business and buoyant markets in 1910, and, apart from political and other accidents, there seems to be no reason why these flattering hopes should not be realised. The City is a little afraid that a Radical victory would interfere with their programme, but, though it would almost certainly cause dulness for a few days—owing to the ingrained prejudice which produces the weakness that it fears—probably enough the investing and speculating classes would very soon discover that the world was going round much as usual, and would shortly return to a saner frame of mind. Business in the speculative markets has shown signs of broadening, with a strong demand for West African mining shares, which are said by their supporters to be going to be the leading market in the New Year. It seems likely enough that the public will rush in to discount the possibilities of this field, which are genuine enough up to a point, and will discount them, as usual, much too fast, and then feel aggrieved because it has paid too high prices for shares which it finds difficult to dispose of except at a loss.

LOANMONGERS BUSY.

Amongst the markets of older standing, investment securities of all kinds, home, Colonial, and foreign, have been drained nearly bare of stock, and might look like higher prices were it not for the probability, which amounts almost to certainty, that loan issuing is going to be on a vast scale, and that investors will have plenty of opportunities for supplying themselves with any variety of stock that they may happen to require. The Baghdad Railway and its finance are already the subject of oracular telegrams in the daily press; Hungary, Austria, Russia, and Bulgaria are practically known to want loans for various purposes; Germany is thought likely to continue its policy of meeting deficits by loans and making posterity pay, since the foreigner, in spite of the most scientific inducements of Protection, refuses to do so; Canada, the United States, and South America may be relied on to hold out appeals for fresh advances, and altogether it seems reasonable to expect that the lamentable exodus of British capital will go on at an accelerated pace, with its usual beneficial effect to British trade. Underwriters and financiers are looking forward to a busy year, and, as long as they do not overdo the business, and as long as the loan funds are well spent, and not wasted on armaments and other fripperies, there is good reason to wish them a successful one.

JANUS.

EVANS' ANTISEPTIC THROAT PASTILLES

are THE remedy for Loss of Voice, Huskiness or Soreness of the Throat, Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, &c. These Pastilles have an unrivalled reputation for their wonderfully soothing qualities for all Throat troubles. Made to a formula of the Liverpool Throat Hospital.

1/- and 4/6 per box
of all Chemists, Stores, &c.

Write for Sample enclosing 1d. stamp to cover postage to

EVANS SONS LESCHER & WEBB, Ltd.,

Hanover Street, Liverpool.

Ask for EVANS' Pastilles and refuse all imitations.

FIRST IN OFFICIAL TESTS
FIRST IN PUBLIC FAVOUR

DEVON FIRE

NONE BETTER THAN THE BEST

Sole Proprietors & Manufacturers

CANDY & Co Ltd

London Showroom: 87 NEWMAN ST.

Works: HEATHFIELD DEVON

GIVES UNIVERSAL & COMPLETE SATISFACTION

LIVERPOOL SHOWROOMS: Chicago Buildings, Stanley Street.
HUDDERSFIELD SHOWROOMS: 5, Britannia Chambers,
St. George's Square.
MANCHESTER SHOWROOMS: Scottish Life Building, 38, Deansgate.

TANGYES

TYPE "AA" OIL ENGINE

*For Farm or Estate Work,
Country-House Lighting, &c.*

NO LAMP REQUIRED AFTER STARTING.
GRAVITY OR PUMP OIL-FEED.
SIMPLE, ECONOMICAL, RELIABLE.
REDUCED PRICES.

TANGYES LTD., BIRMINGHAM.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

TANGYE'S

TYPE "AA" OIL ENGINE

*For Farm or Estate Work,
Country-House Lighting, &c.*

TANGYES LTD., BIRMINGHAM.

TOURS.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."

£12 12s. OPORTO, GIBRALTAR, TANGIER, ALGIERS,
PALERMO, February 15th.

£26 5s. PALESTINE, EGYPT, CONSTANTINOPLE, GREECE,
March 3rd.

Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

£7 7s. —SKI-ING, SKATING, TOBOGGANNING
TOURS, including Second-Class Return Ticket
and Accommodation Hotel Aubepine, Ballaigues. Also Hotels at Mantana, Villars, St. Beatenberg, Wengen, Lenzerheide, etc.—
Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, London, S.W.

BENGER'S FOOD

is primarily a nutritive food for those suffering from digestive debility, or during severe illness, and convalescence. But a course of Benger's Food is also of the greatest advantage to those enjoying the best of health. Benger's Food is different from any other food obtainable—it can be served prepared to suit the exact physical condition of the person for whom it is intended.

Benger's Food is sold in tins by Chemists, &c., everywhere.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME V. OF THE NATION

Is now ready, and can be obtained free on application to the Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER. Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Spring Term commences January 14th.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.

BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.

(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

TETTENHALL COLLEGE,
STAFFORDSHIRE.

£00 feet above Sea Level.

Headmaster—R. L. AGER, M.A. (Rugby and Corpus Christi College, Oxford).

FREE CHURCH PUBLIC SCHOOL.CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey, Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK.
K. M. ELLIS.

STRAMONGATE GIRLS' SCHOOL, KENDAL.

Founded by the Society of Friends in Kendal.

A Boarding School for the daughters of gentlemen, where Domestic Science forms part of the ordinary course of studies.

Full particulars from the Headmistress.

ROYAL HOLLOWAY COLLEGE.

(UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.)

The LENT TERM BEGINS on JANUARY 14th, 1910. The College prepares Students for the London Degrees in Science and Arts.

TWELVE ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS, from £50 to £60 a year, and a certain number of Bursaries of not more than £30, tenable for three years, will be offered for COMPETITION in June, 1910.

Inclusive fee £100 a year.

For further particulars, apply to the SECRETARY, Royal Holloway College, Englefield Green, Surrey.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL.

HEAD MASTER:—ARTHUR ROWNTREE, B.A. (Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History and Practice of Education Cantab.)

Preparation for Universities. Citizenship Course. Leisure Hour Work.

The Spring Term begins on January 18th.

For prospectus, etc., apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

EDUCATIONAL.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD, HASLEMERE, SURREY.

COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Sandy Soil. 600 feet above sea level.

Healthy outdoor life, combined with thorough education on modern lines. Usual curriculum, including citizenship course, extension lectures, &c. Preparation when required for University and other careers. Handicrafts, gardening, riding, nature study, archæology, &c.

Principal: Miss AMY KEMP.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Claws, Tripou, Camb.)

Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

The January BOOK MONTHLY, 6d. net, bringing the record of the book year to its close, is now ready.

CONTENTS.

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR. Chatty Paragraphs about all Literary Matters, with many Portraits and other Pictures.

CHRISTMAS'S CHEER! The Book Beautiful as the Ideal Present—by A. J. PHILIP.

BARRACK-ROOM BOOKS. What the British Soldier reads in his Leisure Hours—by HORACE WYNDHAM.

THE TYPOGRAPHER. His Growing Place in the World of Letters.

THE MEMOIRIST. An Art on which a Duchesse Instructs us.

A LONDON LETTER. The Circulating Libraries and the Unspeakable Novel.

POINTERS! As Americans say on the Short Story.

LIGHT AND LEADING. New Fact and Current Opinion Gathered from the Book World.

THE GENERAL READER. Snap-Shot Reviews of the Best and Best Selling Books.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY. Particulars of Interesting Volumes Likely to be Published this Month.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH. A Classified Catalogue of the Noteworthy Books, New Editions and Reprints of December.

THE PERIODICALS. Contents of this Month's Reviews & Magazines.

Publishers: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & Co., Stationers' Hall Court London.

HIGHEST QUALITY
TURKISH TOWELS
AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY

BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;

And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED).

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it

WILL BE REPLACED.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Bathrooms on every Floor,
Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading,
Billiard and Smoking Rooms.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) Single from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc..
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71 Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Mise Tye
Central. Board and Residence. 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) Hotel. Close Pier; 1st Class; moderate

SILVER HOW.. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House. Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL. Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL 120 rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCs.

CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.

BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE. 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone 3032 Royal. 3 wires

LLANDUDNO.

The WHITE HORSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LYNTON (Devon).

ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S HYDRO. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.

RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant One Minute from Station

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boar's Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c., Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

SOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish. Electric. Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647

ROCKLEY HYDRO. Electric and other baths; Excellent cuisine.
Lift. Near Golf Links. From 7s per day. Tel. 422.

HOUGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclist's Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

Your Week End Is Not Complete

WITHOUT

The Saturday Westminster

(The Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette.")

It is the only Weekly Magazine Review of the kind.

"F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week.

An Unique page of "Problems and Prizes,"

Book Reviews and Special Literary

Articles by the best known Writers.

ONE PENNY. Post 6/6 per annum (home), 8/8 (abroad).

Offices: Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION
Office, 14 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION
PUBLISHING Co. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-
sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—
Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions
are received.

By their Measures which is the greatest man?

In the above Silhouette Lansdowne does not appear so tall as Lloyd George, nor he so tall as Asquith, but if measured they will all be found of equal height.

N.B.—No other Equality is to be Inferred.

The Nation

VOL. VI., No. 15.]
Registered as a Newspaper.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 8, 1910.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K. 3d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE		PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK ...	589	The Time for Practical Christianity. By the Rev. F. G. Montagu Powell ...	608
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—		Shooting a Tame Stag. By G. G. Greenwood, M.P. ...	609
What we are Fighting for ...	592	Psychology of Conversion. By Maurice B. Wright, M.D. ...	609
The Game of the Opposition ...	593	England and Germany. By Dr. J. Holland Rose ...	610
The Vindication of Free Trade ...	594	The Art of Spending. By the Rev. Clement F. Rogers ...	610
The Character of the Indian Police ...	595	The Indians in the Transvaal. By L. W. Ritch ...	611
The Humbug of "Tariff Reform" ...	597	Ulster Liberal Unionism. By S. Shannon Millin and a Nonconformist Liberal ...	611
HOW IT STRIKES A CONTEMPORARY. By C. F. G. Masterman, M.P. ...	597	A Case of "Malice." By H. N. Brailsford ...	611
A SURVEY OF THE CONSTITUENCIES. By One Who Has Been Round Them ...	599	OUR YOUNGER POETS:—
LIFE AND LETTERS:—		I.—William H. Davies ...	612
Our Lost Romance ...	600	THE WORLD OF BOOKS ...	613
The Beaten Path ...	601	REVIEWS:—
The Sea in Music ...	602	The Re-Statement of Liberalism ...	614
The Robin ...	603	A Master Bibliographer. By Thomas Seccombe. ...	614
ART:—		Sincerity ...	616
The Academy Winter Exhibition ...	605	In the Hills ...	617
LETTERS FROM ABROAD:—		BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
The "Insurgent" Movement in the United States. By Henry George, jun. ...	606	My Thirty Years in India ...	618
COMMUNICATIONS:—		The Fortnightly Review ...	620
The Troubles of a Socialist Elector. By Sadly Perplexed ...	607	The Nineteenth Century ...	620
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—		Peers or People, &c. ...	620
The Deeper Crisis. By H. Bagenal ...	608	THE WEEK IN THE CITY. By Janus ...	620

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

THE noblest utterance of the election is that of Mr. Arthur Chamberlain, who, in one of a brilliant series of letters, writes these burning words on the bread tax. They should be posted all over the land, for they are a model of the best and simplest English, and a child can read and understand them.

"A tax on bread is the cruellest tax on earth. The poorer the man and the larger his family, the harder it presses upon him. It is a hunger tax that some poor people will pay at every meal. It is a tax on old people and on little children. It is a tax on the strength of England to make it weaker, and it is a tax on the poor of England to make them poorer. I would rather die than vote for such a tax."

The meanest utterance (but one) of the election is that of Lord Rosebery, ex-Liberal Prime Minister, ex-Home Ruler, and ex-Constitutionalist, who writes to a gentleman in Devonshire, with "natural pain and reluctance" that he is against the Government on three out of four electoral issues—Socialism, an "independent" Irish Parliament, and the reform of the House of Lords. With equal "pain and reluctance," we imagine, Lord Rosebery omits to mention the fourth issue on which he favors the Government, which is, we suppose, either the taxation of the people's bread or the theft of their liberties, or both.

* * *

Most of us know the method of the confidence trick. Its contrivers—there are usually two of them—approach their victim with a liberal display of flash coin and paper money. "You see," they say, "these notes and sovereigns. All are yours. Look at them, handle them. In return—just to show your confidence—hand us over your watch and purse." So say the political tricksters. "Give us, first, your Government and its device for stopping unemployment. Hand over the Budget, with its taxes on the rich, because they merely descend to the poor. Hand over your House of Commons, which can't work without us, and your bauble of a Constitution, which was made for fogies. Hand over the right of taxation by your elected representatives. Now that you are about it, you might also lend us the right of Dissolution, which the King may exercise to-day, but which is really much safer with the House of Lords, especially after we have made it so strong that you will never any more want a mere common representative House again. And, if you will be so good as to let us tax most of what you eat, wear, and use, you shall have so much more wages to spend that you will have no difficulty in paying for them."

* * *

Is this an exaggeration? Let Lord Lansdowne's speech at Liverpool tell its own story. Admitting that the Lords killed the Budget because they wanted to "switch on" Protection and "switch off" Free Trade, he said that they had merely proposed "a clear, straightforward little amendment." That amendment (which was neither clear, nor straightforward, nor little) merely proposed to put an end to the House of Commons after it had lasted four years, which was as long as Mr. Asquith thought it should last. Claim I.—Power of Dissolution at any moment when the Lords think right. Lord Lansdowne went on to specify the powers which he considered should not be "handed over to the House of Commons and the Minister who controls the House of Commons." They were the direction of Indian, Imperial, and Colonial affairs, naval and military defence, finance, and general politics. Claim II.—The House of Lords to govern the Empire, to interfere not only with the Budget, but with the Army and Navy Estimates, and to be supreme in legislation.

* * *

LORD LANSDOWNE proceeded to say that these powers should, in his opinion, be wielded not by the present House of Lords, but by "a kind of inner House of Lords," consisting of (a) superior peers, (b) peers elected by peers, (c) peers nominated by the Government of the day. Claim III.—To destroy the established constitutional power of the Crown (see Professor Dicey—"The Law of the Constitution," p. 360), to create fresh peers, with a view of bringing the House of Lords into harmony with the House of Commons—i.e., to provide for the Lords a form of control similar to that which a General Election supplies for the House of Commons. Here, then, is stark, staring Revolution. Englishmen fought, and were right to fight, against such claims when the Crown preferred them. Are they going to take them lying down from Lord Lansdowne?

* * *

THE Chancellor of the Exchequer, speaking at the Queen's Hall and at Reading, gave a masterly and convincing exposition of the problem of unemployment as the Budget has worked it out. He pointed out (1) that, during the last fifty years, the returns showed that unemployment diminished with the growth of imports, (2) that, during the recent world-depression of trade, unemployment in Protectionist countries, notably in the United States, had been far worse than in ours. In proof of this he gave some striking figures of unemployment in the State of New York. In that State in the month of May, 1908, thirty per cent. of the workmen making returns were out of employment. About the same period our maximum was ten per cent. Mr. George might have added that even in the succeeding month of June, that is to say, in the height of summer, the returns of unemployment for ninety-two trade unions in the State of New York were nineteen per cent.

* * *

"HERE," concluded the Chancellor, "you are in this Protectionist paradise, where you have got Customs House officers lining the shores like cherubims, with the flaming sword of a scorching tariff to keep out every foreign-made article from the Garden of Eden; here, once you enter the Garden you find the serpents of hunger, want, unemployment, hissing in every glade." The Chancellor's third point was a rehearsal of the Budget's scientifically conceived plan for dealing with unemployment in the only possible way—namely, by the re-organisation of the labor market. The accredited machinery for that re-organisation is labor exchanges and insurance for unemployment. Thus the laborer acquires increased facility for following work when it comes, and for waiting until it comes. The total provision, under all the headings, for this purpose is a sum of nearly eighteen millions.

* * *

THIS sum should be placarded in the largest figures during next week, all over the kingdom, for it is safe to say that no Government ever offered a people so large and well-founded a scheme of industrial security. Neither Protection nor Free Trade can cure unemployment, which arises from the huge, stagnant "reserves" of labor that modern industry collects and makes no effort to disperse. The machinery of labor exchanges should break up one part of this pool. That of averaging wages by means of State-aided insurance should break up another. The plan is as sound as, in our view, a considerable part of the experiments begun under the Unemployed Workmen's Act are unsound, and not a serious word has been written in its disparagement.

* * *

THE full account of this provision was made out in Mr. Churchill's speech at Dundee, and we quote as follows:—

For unemployment insurances and labor exchanges, £1,500,000 a year.

Expenditure upon roads (all of which would go in labor, which would be pushed forward in times of bad trade and slacked off in times of good trade), £600,000 a year.

Development grants in aid of agricultural afforestation, and such-like schemes of colonising our own country, £900,000.

Old Age Pensions, nearly nine millions a year; the removal of the pauper disqualification, two millions more.

Invalidity, sickness, widows', and orphans' insurance—those great schemes which were to be started in conjunction with the friendly and benefit societies—four millions to begin with, but the amount would work up in future years as the scheme developed.

It is incredible that the workman can drop the substance of this magnificent plan—commended them by the responsible Minister who has worked it out—for the shadow of Protection.

* * *

WILD and even wicked words are used by partisans on all sides, at all elections, but the palm for this kind of language belongs to-day to Mr. Balfour, and will rest on his head. Speaking of the relations between Great Britain and Germany at Hanley on Tuesday, he declared that "amongst statesmen and diplomatists of the lesser Powers" there was "an absolute unanimity of opinion that a struggle sooner or later between this country and Germany is inevitable." He added that he did not agree with them, but said that this view sprang from disbelief in the "virility" of our people, an opinion of which his party is the daily and hourly propagandist. He added this disgraceful sentence. "I have known of Germans not connected with the Government, but men of position and character, men engaged in great affairs, who, if you talk to them about the adoption of Tariff Reform by Great Britain actually say, 'Do you suppose we should allow Great Britain to adopt Tariff Reform?' Such talk," he added, "makes my blood boil."

* * *

THUS Mr. Balfour, whose blood never boiled at anything that kindled a generous heart, contrives (1) to stir up the coarse anti-German flame which Mr. Blatchford tried to light, (2) to reap all the party advantage that may be gathered from it, while (3) escaping any personal call to account. Meanwhile, we hope that Mr. Balfour will be required at every public meeting which he addresses to give his authority for such language. In our opinion it was never used. But even if this base coin be in circulation, no good citizen or high-minded man ever stoops to pick it up. Happily, the German Press has taken Mr. Balfour's language for what it is, a piece of gross electioneering, and of very frigid and calculated—boiling.

* * *

THIS base speech—which the "Neue Freie Presse" roughly calls "the sickly scream of the desperately pressed politician"—was truthfully handled by the Prime Minister at Bath and Mr. Lloyd George at Peckham. Mr. Asquith, speaking with great weight and not less conspicuous contempt, declared it false to say that "the statesmen and diplomatists of the lesser Powers of Europe" unanimously believed an Anglo-German war to be inevitable. The Prime Minister's knowledge of the diplomacy of Europe, which was as "close and fresh" as Mr. Balfour's, enabled him to say that not a single Power, small or great, shaped its policy with a view to any such contingency. Nor was there any cause of quarrel between us and this "great and friendly nation." As to the suggestion that Germany would stop us from having Tariff Reform if we wanted it, he asked why public opinion should be enflamed and embittered by quoting such silly menaces. He gave "flat and absolute contradiction" to Mr. Balfour's statement that our naval supremacy was endangered. Not within the memory of living man were our shores and sea-power so safe. Mr. Lloyd George compared Mr. Balfour to the low type of American politician known as the "tail-twister," and said that we knew by the South African experience that men who talked of inevitable wars often made them.

* * *

MEANWHILE, the worth of Mr. Balfour's Mr. Blatchford as a controversialist may be gathered from two examples. The first is his statement that the toast of "Am Tag"—to the day when the German fleet conquered the English—was drunk every night on German battleships. This statement Prince Henry of Prussia, Admiral of the German fleet, has declared to be a lie, and we have not yet observed that Mr. Blatchford has either withdrawn or reaffirmed it. The second example is his statement that when he was in Germany he stood at "Krupptown" and "reflected that the German blood and iron works had recently taken on 28,000 new hands." On this Mr. Tuchmann quotes in the "Westminster Gazette" a letter from the Chairman of the Krupp Company saying that this number represents about the whole of the employes at Essen, that during the last three months there had been no additions to the staff, and that these numbers are what they practically were in 1906. A statement, giving almost exactly the same proportions in the number of the staff, though differing as to the totals, is supplied by Mr. John Leyland to the "Times." Mr. Tuchmann's letter was naturally refused insertion in the "Daily Mail," and the 28,000 new hands in Essen, Mr. Balfour's twenty-one or twenty-five German "Dreadnoughts" in 1912, and a few other frigid and calculated companions, still go the rounds.

* * *

WE doubt whether it is worth the while of Ministers to touch so ignorant a writer as Mr. Blatchford, but Mr. McKenna, in a powerful speech at Portnewydd on Thursday night, convicted him of the following mis-statements, which he described as "grossly untrue": (1) That in two years' time Germany will have eleven Dreadnought docks to our three. We shall have sixteen and Germany nine. (2) That Rosyth will not be ready for seven years. It will be ready in six, or five. (3) That Germany has more fast destroyers than we, and can build them quicker. Both statements false. (4) That Germany can build twelve Dreadnoughts at a time, and has more slips for big-gun ships than we, and (5) that at any period, on any basis, she possesses, or will possess, a naval power comparable to our own. This is the really colossal falsity that underlies all these naval scares, by whomsoever engineered.

* * *

THE two Archbishops have both issued what we suppose must be called manifestoes. The Archbishop of York, who spoke with force and ability on the constitutional issue, now suggests to Churchmen that they must also consider the "peril" or the "risk" of Welsh Dis-establishment, or of a new Education Bill. While one Archbishop puts forward the private interests of the Established Church, the other calls upon the people to avoid the exaggeration, bitterness, and untruthfulness which prevail at election times. All these things exist, especially when such issues as popular rule, the taxing power, war, and Protection arise. So long as the Church has nothing to say on the whole moral content of politics, the nation will pay little heed to the Primate's exhortations to avoid excitement in discussing it.

* * *

THE elections to the new Indian Councils are nearing completion, and those of Bengal and Bombay have already met. The Mohammedans, as was inevitable, have everywhere returned much more than their proportionate share of the members. The other outstanding feature of the new Councils, particularly in Bengal, is the small number of "intellectuals" who have been returned, and the large number of landowners and local magnates. The reason is, of course, the restriction which required the local and district Councils to nominate only their own members. Anglo-Indian opinion is jubilant at the exclusion of the despised "baboo," and especially of the "lawyers," by this ingenious device. But experience may suggest quite another verdict. It is doubtful whether the country gentlemen who have been returned possess either the ability or the independence required for the transaction of affairs on a national scale. If that is so, the Councils will lack prestige; the native members will not attempt to assert themselves or will make the effort without the necessary intelligence; outside the Councils the accepted Nationalist leaders are already contemptuous and critical. The total result may well be to maim the intention which Lord Morley had in mind. His scheme was admirable. It is the regulations grafted on it by Simla which threaten it.

* * *

DR. DE LUKACS has failed, as he was expected to fail, in securing the co-operation of any of the Magyar parties in forming a Government. M. de Justh adhered firmly to his programme of economic independence for Hungary, which involves a separate tariff, a separate State Bank, and the right to raise Hungarian loans abroad. On these terms the Emperor-King refused to bargain. M. de Lukacs is however definitely named Prime Minister, and will doubtless succeed in forming a Cabinet of more or less respectable, but uninfluential, individuals. It is less certain that he will succeed in obtaining the supplies for two months, for which he has asked. A general election will be the next phase in the crisis, and this, on the still unreformed franchise, can end only in the return in uncertain proportions of the various Chauvinist groups, which really differ little in their separatist policy and their devotion to the ideal of Magyar racial ascendancy. Already the politicians of the extremer Justh group are talking eagerly of a sharp conflict with the Crown, in which the new Diet will assert itself by refusing supplies and recruits.

* * *

THE Greek Kingdom has touched during the past week the lowest level of degradation which has fallen to its lot since its officers took to imitating the Young Turks. Smarting under the defeat inflicted on it through the dismissal of its nominee, the Minister of War, the Military League determined to avenge itself on the Chamber. Its preparations were simple. It confined the troops to barracks, and served out ammunition. It then sent its emissaries with an ultimatum to the leaders of the two Opposition parties, demanding that they should co-operate promptly in passing the Budget, and some 150 Bills which embody the League's programme. It next required of the Prime Minister the dismissal of four Greek Ministers in the more important European capitals. It wound up by exacting, as a compensation for the War Minister's retirement, the dismissal of the Minister of the Interior. Every one of these exactions was satisfied within the prescribed number of hours—the King meanwhile using his influence to prevent the Cabinet from escaping further humiliation by resigning in a body. The brutality of such proceedings is exceeded only by their childishness.

* * *

IN the course of last session a Bill was passed setting up an Under Secretaryship for the department of the Post Office. This has now been excellently filled by the appointment of Sir Henry Norman. Sir Henry's special experience and skill in organisation well suit him to such work.—We much regret to record the death of Mr. William Earl Hodgson, a frequent contributor to THE NATION. Mr. Hodgson wrote well of many aspects of country life, and especially of the craft of fly-fishing, of which he was an acknowledged expert. He used a pen of much skill and point, and was an accurate student of the English language as well as an admirable writer of it.

Politics and Affairs.

WHAT WE ARE FIGHTING FOR.

THE contest which begins next week draws the controversies of many years to a head. On the constitutional side it resumes a campaign which was begun, only to be broken by a premature truce, in 1884, which was declined when it should have been pressed in 1894, and which from 1906 to 1910 has come year by year to be more clearly recognised as a struggle for the life or death of political freedom in this country. The entire forces of reaction stand massed behind the House of Lords. The land monopoly, the liquor interest, the nervous selfishness of "property," the anti-foreign panic, the more bigoted forms of sacerdotalism, take shelter with one accord behind the irrational privileges of an hereditary order. On the other side, in spite of a certain amount of waste maintained by local and personal jealousies, the Progressive parties have drawn sensibly nearer together. On all hands it is realised that the crisis is national, and more than national; that its consequences will reverberate through the world, and that this month will see whether the traditional land of freedom, the Mother of Parliaments, having set an example that has been, and is being, copied directly or indirectly from end to end of the civilised earth, will remain faithful to herself, or will tamely let the heritage of centuries slip from a nerveless grasp. Let us attempt to review the heads of controversy which the electors have to decide.

First and foremost among them stands the question of a Free Parliament. Here we have no need to brush away sophistries. Lord Curzon and the bolder champions of the Lords have done that for us. The pretension of the Lords is clear and expressed. Their case is that an irresponsible hereditary body, placed above the necessity of consulting the electorate, is for that very reason impartial and clear-sighted. It can interpret the true will of the nation better than those which the nation elects to represent it. We, the people of England, are not fit to govern ourselves. We are to be governed by hereditary Curzonian autocrats and the Milners whom they select from the heads of the bureaucracy and choose to associate with themselves in the governing body. What precise functions they would leave to the House of Commons they have not yet deigned to tell us, but it is clear that the position of that House would be quite subordinate. It would be able to propose legislation and suggest financial measures, but its very existence is to be at the mercy of the Peers, who, by refusing supply, are to be able at any moment to compel a dissolution. The whole historic sequence which built up the structure of our freedom is to be reversed. As the House of Commons gained, first, the power of the purse, and through the purse the control of Ministries, and through the Ministry the predominant power in legislation, so now the Lords claim the purse-strings, and through the purse the control of Ministries, of legislation, and ultimately of the House of Commons itself. The issue is the broadest and simplest ever presented to a great popular constituency, and in face of this crisis there can be only two parties. A vote for a Liberal, a Labor candidate, a Nationalist, or a Socialist, is on this occasion equally a vote for British freedom.

Second, and in full harmony with this dominant issue, comes the question of the Tariff. The pre-eminent caste, rallying round the privileges of the land, takes us back to the days of the Hungry 'Forties, and boldly demands the taxation of the food of the people and many of the materials and appliances of industry. Here, again, we are no longer dealing with Conservatism. The Conservative Party has long ceased to be Conservative, and become reactionary. The methods of that German Government which it professes to hate and fear are faithfully copied, and the burden of the ever-increasing cost of national administration is to be lifted from the shoulders of the rich and placed on the backs of the working-class. To this the workers are expected to assent, in the hope of securing more continuous employment, by protection against foreign competition. It is the vainest delusion, as argument and appeal to the statistical evidence of Protected countries have repeatedly shown. Such as it is, it is the one bribe that our would-be masters consent to dangle before the eyes of an electorate which they despise, and in the combat much will depend on the courage, on the real grasp of the logic of Free Trade, which our candidates can muster in meeting this particular appeal. Fortunately we have now on our side a definite constructive policy to show, not merely on paper and in the future, but taking its first practical shape in the Labor Exchanges which come into being next month. Free Trade finance can offer to the employer and workman the cheapest food and the cheapest materials in the world's market, and for the workman it adds a practical mechanism for reducing unemployment, and the definite promise of insurance against the risk that remains.

Thirdly, while the privileged class rallies round its land, the Budget for the first time leads a serious assault on the land monopoly. In advance of our foreign competitors in our fiscal system, we have long lagged behind them in the matter of land tenure. We have allowed our peasants to be expropriated. We have allowed the vast wealth of site values, created by the growth of population, to drain away into private hands. This is the price that we have paid for the persistence of aristocratic privilege. The work of Cobden, as Cobden knew, was only half done. He freed England from the tribute of the Corn Tax to the landlord. He did not succeed in liberating it from the tribute of an unjust rental. Successive Acts for the establishment of Small Holdings have merely nibbled at the problem. The Act of 1907 is the best, but it has served mainly to reveal the true nature of the difficulty. Valuation and taxation on true value are the two formulæ necessary to salvation. The question before the electors is whether urban land is to remain the treasure-house of the rich, and rural land their pleasure ground, or whether the land is to be at the disposal of the people—not through violent measures of spoliation, but by the fair insistence on equitable taxation and the pre-eminent rights of the community—whether in the towns it shall furnish its due quota to the cost of social progress, and in the rural districts the means of livelihood to a vigorous rustic population.

Fourthly, the question before the electors is whether they shall be free to work out their own social salvation. The definite campaign against poverty has been instituted by the present Government, and the problem of the aged is in a fair way of solution. The problems of childhood, of helplessness, of sickness, of invalidity, of unemployment, lie in the immediate future, and the Budget provides the basis for a concerted series of legislative Acts aimed, no longer at the relief, but at the abolition, of the destitute. This great plan the Lords have brutally rejected, because some provision for it comes out of their own pockets. Posing as the enemies of unemployment, they refuse a way out for unemployment, just as, posing as patriots, they refuse to pay for "Dreadnoughts." We need but the free hand which the abolition of the Veto provides us, and we shall give to the working-classes a security such as no other nation has yet enjoyed.

Lastly, the question is between the ideal of peaceful industrialism and the reign of the soldier. More and more clearly the leading spirits on the opposite side are leaning to compulsory service, and the German panic, engineered at the moment for electoral purposes, will, if by a miracle it should succeed now, serve its turn later on in forcing the country to submit to German military discipline. In our opinion, Mr. Balfour, still the titular leader, should be strongly pressed for a definite declaration on this all-important point. There is none other that comes home so closely to every father and mother of sons throughout the land. They say that every country gets the government that it deserves. If the British people elect to surrender their political freedom, to let the Lords tax their food, to maintain the land monopoly, to leave the problem of poverty untouched, and to submit themselves and their sons to the yoke of conscription, then truly the day of their greatness is over, and they deserve the fate that awaits them.

THE GAME OF THE OPPOSITION.

For the old, old game of counting one's chickens before they are hatched the Unionist Press is substituting the new and more astute policy of discounting the chickens of their rivals before they are hatched. They apparently anticipate a victory for the people, and they are already going about to deprive that victory of its significance. The "Times" has discovered that Tariff Reform is, after all, a secondary matter. Tariffs can be imposed to-day and taken off to-morrow, but a real old crusted House of Lords is the slow growth of centuries. To produce the fine flower of a Curzon or a Duke of Sutherland is not the work of an Act of Parliament. It needs centuries of domination, generations of unchecked arrogance, long periods of family aggrandisement. Sir Wm. Anson, whom we imagine busily engaged in re-writing his Law of the Constitution, is already anticipating a second General Election. It is not enough for him that Mr. Asquith, having appealed in the most unmistakable terms ever used by a Prime Minister for a popular mandate on the constitutional issue, and having declared for himself and his colleagues that he will not resume office without the requisite guarantee for the effective execution of that mandate, should obtain from the people the vote of confidence that he demands. This apparently unconscious champion of the plébiscite already demands a second election to compel the Lords to give their assent to the verdict of the first. If the second election were in preparation, we suppose that Sir W. Anson would begin preparations for it by demanding a third. Lastly, "Historicus," admitting with Sir W. Anson that there are precedents for over-riding the veto of the Lords by constitutional methods, announces his preference for the more forcible ways of 1832. Birmingham demonstrations—and shall we add Bristol riots?—rather than the threat to create peers were the true determining factors, according to this authority, in the victory of the first Reform Act. After the expected victory of the coming election, he will appeal from the House of Commons to the street. We are not sure that this ingenious gentleman has taken so prudent a course, from his own point of view, as that of the constitutional lawyer.

These tactics must be met with firmness from the outset. Fortunately, there is no doubt upon the main practical point. Mr. Asquith's worst enemies do not accuse him of obscurity, and he formulated the appeal of the Liberal Party to the electors with even more than his usual clearness. That appeal may be put in general terms in a single question. Are we to govern ourselves through the House of Commons, or are we to be governed by the House of Lords? If we are to continue to govern ourselves through the House of Commons, two guarantees become necessary. The first is that the veto of the Lords on finance, as set up for the first time on November 30th, shall be wholly swept away and the exclusive power of the House of Commons restored. The second is that the veto on legislation, tolerated until it has been pushed to the intolerable point, shall be reduced to such dimensions as will ensure the ultimate supremacy of the popular will. Both these guarantees will require legislation, and it is sanction from the people for such legislation that Mr. Asquith demands. A majority in his favor, be it great or small, will be a majority for the specified constitutional reconstruction.

But, our opponents remark, this legislation will itself require the consent of the House of Lords, and how is this to be obtained? When the necessary Bill is sent up to the Lords, they will, we are to suppose, reject it, and what then? Sir Wm. Anson would have us fall back on a second election. But to what end? If the Lords ignore the plain result of one election, why should they treat a second election any better? The question resolves itself into a contest between the House of Commons, backed, on the present hypothesis, by the people, fresh with all the authority of a popular mandate, and the irresponsible House. In case of absolute obduracy, there remains nothing for it but to put into force the weapons, cumbrous, but nevertheless sufficient, which the Constitution provides. "Historicus" seems to think that the creation of new Peers is an appeal to force. It is rather one of those ultimate devices of the Constitution by which the appeal to force may be avoided. We do not believe for a moment that the Lords will force us to flood their benches with some hundreds of new Peers. But if anybody is offended by such creations, it need not be the mass of the people. It will just be the Peers themselves, whose social prestige, already lowered by their own public appearances, will be further diminished by the cheapening of the title. There is nothing in this cheapening to give us pause as democrats. We may have to create more Peers, but we scotch the peerage in doing so. Nor do we need any further popular mandate for the purpose. This election, if it gives us a majority, is our mandate.

It may be said that the power so to deal with the House of Lords will be withheld from the Liberal Government. In that case once again we know from Mr. Asquith's speech what the attitude of himself and his colleagues will be. They will decline to resume office. The Liberal Party goes into permanent Opposition until the Constitutional grievance is redressed. It is an alternative which we shall deeply regret. We only prefer it to the unreal tenure of power. Nor do we think that the days of Opposition would last long. Powerful forces are at work in the democracy. New hopes have been kindled, and have caught the imagination of the people. They will not cease from those demands which Mr. Lloyd George has helped them to formulate, and the time will come when they will renew their assault on political privilege and the land monopoly with redoubled vigor. Politics will become not less, but more, democratic, and though it may take us longer to make a beginning with social reform, we shall act more swiftly when the time comes.

There remains the possibility of compromise, of which "Historicus" hints. On the point of principle there can be no yielding. We shall tolerate, if we get our mandate, no "reform" of the House of Lords which would leave it as conservative and one-sided as ever, though a little more modern in appearance. Any changes that we can accept must be such as to secure the supremacy of the people—not in the insincere sense which enables a Second Chamber to wear down an attack by insisting on successive elections on every single measure that it dislikes, but in a sense which will at least hold the scale even between progress and reaction. If the Conservative leaders have any proposals to put forward in this sense, we have no doubt that they will be attentively considered. But any such proposals must accept the primary principle that the deliberate decision of the people, now to be expressed in the clear-cut issues presented by Mr. Asquith, must be taken as a definite and conclusive reply. The nation is not to be compelled to speak twice.

THE VINDICATION OF FREE TRADE.

A MORE triumphant vindication of Free Trade than the ordeal of the last two years could not have been devised. For the finances of the country have been subjected to the severest strain by a conjunction of economic misfortunes and the malicious devices of an unscrupulous political campaign. First came the waves of commercial depression set in motion by the financial collapse of the great Protectionist nation of the West. Following close in the wake of the depression came bad harvests, shortening the supplies and raising the prices of food and of some of the raw materials of our staple manufactures. Though the sufferings of the working-classes were definitely worse in Protectionist countries like Germany and the United States than in this country, the unemployment and distress of our workers in the last two years have been eagerly exploited by our new Protectionists. In the misfortunes of their country, these "patriots" thought to find their opportunity. They have seized every chance to retard the recovery of trade, and to embarrass the public finance. The whole case for Tariff Reform has been built up on a malicious libelling of British trade. They have painted Britain as a doomed country, filled with decaying industries and unemployed workers, robbed of her foreign markets by abler and more enterprising nations, a mere dumping ground for the surplus goods of her more prosperous neighbors. No sane, well-informed business men, Lords Rothschild and Revelstoke inform us, will any longer look at English investments. Two years ago trade was threatened, now it is the foundations of property that are sapped! To this commercial and financial scare our Protectionists have added the infamous contrivance of a war panic. This wicked device was adopted for three reasons: first, to wear down Free Trade finance by a new demand for enormous expenditure on armaments; secondly, to divert the nation and the Government from a popular policy of social reform; and, lastly, to enforce the necessity of entrusting the guidance of the State to a party that believed in force alone.

A Free Trade that has survived all this foul weather may surely claim to be a sound conservative finance. For, in spite of all the campaign of lies, the steady revival of our foreign and domestic trade is bearing ample testimony to the ability of a Free Trade Budget to meet all the needs of our national expenditure. But, though the preservation of the State is the first object of Free Trade finance, it is not the only object. Our Budget is not only conservative, but progressive, finance. It has sown new seeds of taxation which will, in the years to come, yield a constant and a growing increase, securing for the first time to the public service some considerable share of the unearned wealth which flows in abundant streams from the toil of the workers and the needs of a growing population into the laps of the favored few. The valuation of land and the registration of super-wealth, which are the instruments of this progressive finance, are hated objects to our Protectionists, who rightly recognise in them the frustration of their dearest hopes. For it is hardly credible that a people who shall once have experienced the facility with which all ordinary increases of national expenditure can be met by recourse to these just and fruitful expedients, will ever be misled into the crooked path of food taxes.

The finance of the Budget is, however, not only conservative and progressive; it is directly productive. Mr. Asquith and Mr. George have, in their recent speeches, reinforced this aspect of their policy. The Budget is to be taken as inseparable from the Development Bill, and both are organically related to the fuller scheme of industrial and social reform which Mr. Churchill in recent speeches has unfolded with so much eloquence and prescience. All the proposals for insurance against invalidity and unemployment, remedies for pauperism and destitution, and the expansive doctrine of the national standard of work and wages, as embodied in Wages Boards and other provisions against sweating, the whole of the new constructive policy connected with small holdings, and the development of neglected natural resources, the provision of ampler, better, cheaper transport—all this new social and industrial policy rests on the finance of the Budget. Hitherto Free Trade was too closely linked with laissez faire, a refusal of the State to take its share, along with individual enterprise, in the development of national trade and the provision of economic opportunities. The first steps in this new Liberal policy have already been taken in the Small Holdings Act, in Old Age Pensions, Wages Boards, Labor Exchanges. These are not mere promises, but actual achievements, and they commit and impel every future Liberal Government to enlargements of these constructive reforms.

Such is the evident, tangible case for our new Free Trade finance. What have our new Protectionists to offer in reply? A mere wilderness of contradictory speculative promises, as futile of fulfilment as the Old Age Pensions they kept dangling for fifteen years before a deluded electorate. Every day, as the election draws nearer, more and more responsible leaders are led to utter ever wilder extravagances as to the efficacy of this panacea. Out of the product of their gentle tariff they are willing to guarantee Old Age Pensions on a more liberal scale, freehold farms for all who want them, with cheap State credit for their working, an unemployed and a Poor Law policy at least as expensive as any we propose, and a naval and military equipment which will cost many millions a year more than we spend at present. All this is to be done without any of the "predatory" taxes upon land or licences or the monstrous super-taxes upon incomes or estates, and without increasing the existing burden of taxation for the workers. A trifling duty upon foreign foods, a little more upon foreign manufactured goods, grave Conservative statesmen have the effrontery to assure the electorate, will provide all the additional revenue required for the service of the country. We are to accept the assurance of Lord Milner that the foreigner will pay, of Lord Curzon that import duties will not increase the costs of production in our industries, while Mr. Balfour has been goaded to commit himself to the statement that by a tariff we can not only "increase the total of the income there is to distribute," but that "Tariff Reform, if reasonably carried out, will increase and greatly increase employment for the working classes of this country." What these gentlemen will not vouchsafe is any intelligible explanation of the actual processes by which these wonderful results are to be achieved. Mr. Churchill, using the best and latest official figures, has expressly challenged them to show how a tariff upon their proposed scale of charges can provide a sum even approaching the current requirements of the State. No answer is vouchsafed, nothing but empty, rotund, dogmatic asseverations. To these, and to the lying placards which deface the hoardings, they apparently trust for deceiving the electorate. But their contempt for the working-class intelligence, even in London, is misjudged. Working-class voters will not tread delicately amid the mazes of economic problems concerning the incidence of taxes. But they will bring their rude instinctive judgment to bear upon the situation. Where they see this brave array of lords, landowners, brewers, and all the men of wealth and privilege, shouting for food taxes, and for a big army and navy to fight Germany, they will reckon up the business with sufficient accuracy. The working-classes will elect this House of Commons. Now there is not any one important working-class leader in this country, or any working-class organisation, that is not solid in its adhesion to the Budget and its rejection of Protection. This knowledge gives us confidence in the issue of the election.

THE CHARACTER OF THE INDIAN POLICE.

To most of our readers the evidence which Mr. Mackarness has furnished in two letters to prove that torture is still used by the Indian police must have seemed, were it not for the documents he cited, wildly improbable, or typical at the most only of some exceptionally backward region. Englishmen who eschew the excesses of patriotic self-praise are not prone as a rule to indulge in extravagant optimism about the merits and successes of our rule in India. The discontent of the educated classes is now a fact which no one can ignore; the lack of sympathy between rulers and ruled is generally admitted; our failure to undertake the work of elementary education is widely recognised and as widely deplored; the burden of armaments and the pressure of taxation have vexed and preoccupied generation after generation of governors and viceroys. But in most of our minds the belief that we have assured peace, banished internecine war, established regular justice, and built up a massive structure of order and law, figures as the justification for our original conquest and our continued rule. It rests on force, but force at least has brought such blessings as strength can give, security, discipline, and a civilised administration. A vast work remains to be done, but the foundation—such is the common view of educated and liberal minds—stands broad and firm, and the structure may, after this week, begin to rise visibly before us. That is not an uncritical optimism, but to even this chastened satisfaction the facts which Mr. Mackarness has cited are calculated to administer a shock. There is work enough for the teacher, the statesman and the economist to achieve; but they labor in vain if the basic and elementary functions of the police stand in need of civilisation. For our part, the revelations in these letters are not wholly a matter for surprise. Some ten years ago we chanced, in a cursory reading of an unimportant book of travels, upon one of those accidental illuminations which are apt to be so much more impressive than any deliberate exposure. The writer, an English lady who had no interest in politics, and professed no sympathy for the natives, related quite casually how in camping among the hills her jewels were stolen. One of her servants was suspected, and in order to obtain a confession the Indian police resorted, apparently as a matter of course, to torture. Shocked and surprised, the lady questioned her Anglo-Indian friends, and was assured by them that in dealing with Indians it was unfortunately necessary to adopt Oriental methods. But it is quite superfluous to search for casual avowals. The defects of its police have been for generations well known to the Indian Government, and as frankly admitted. In 1832 a Select Committee found that the subordinate members of the Company's police were "corrupt, inefficient, and oppressive," and that their superiors exercised no adequate supervision. In 1855 it was necessary to appoint a Special Commission to deal with the flagrant scandal of torture in Madras. A fresh and comprehensive reform was attempted in 1861. But it was left to Lord Curzon to appoint the Commission which in 1903 signed the most pessimistic and comprehensive report of all.

There are few more candid and depressing documents in all the literature of blue-books than this Report. It is such an indictment as one might expect from a young revolutionary Government reporting on the abuses that had flourished under the despotism it had overthrown. One would have felt no surprise if one had come upon it in the Italian archives, and discovered that it was a report made to Cavour on the condition of Lombardy or the Papal States at the moment of their incorporation in the new kingdom of Italy. It is not an exposure of a few abuses, of certain defects in organisation, or of the backwardness of individual provinces. It is a comprehensive condemnation of the whole Indian police, men and officers alike, on grounds the most elementary which could be alleged. It begins by citing the opinion of the late Sir John Woodburn, that the police of the province of Bengal, which he governed in 1901, is in round terms "dishonest and tyrannical." It avows that this is the general opinion of officials and natives alike all over India, and it boldly adopts that opinion as its own. The rank and file are ignorant, underpaid, totally unfit for the detective duties which they are none the less set to perform, brutal in their handling of the people, and shamelessly and almost universally corrupt. Grade by grade it extends the same condemnation, with hardly a reserve, to the native officers. Every complainant must pay them a fee; more money is extorted as the investigation proceeds, whole villages are laid under tribute, and the pressure is kept up by threats of evil consequences to the victim and his women, and by "severe and degrading measures of restraint." The "illicit gains" of some police stations are described as "almost incredible." Charges, we are told, are "bolstered up by false evidence," and the people very naturally "dread the police," and avoid so far as possible all contact or co-operation with them. The few English officers are honest, and occasionally they are efficient. But they rarely know the vernacular; and in dealing with natives they are "not accessible or even courteous," and they are "too often inclined to support their subordinates in an unreasonable manner." On the special question of the use of torture the Commission was a little less positive:—

Suspects and innocent persons are bullied and threatened into giving information they are supposed to possess. The police officer, owing to want of detective ability or to indolence, directs his efforts to procure confessions by improper inducement, by threats, and by moral pressure. Actual physical torture is now rarely resorted to; but it is easy, under the conditions of Indian society, and having regard to the character of the people, to exercise strong pressure and great cruelty without having recourse to such physical violence as leaves its traces on the body of the victim.

The evidence which Mr. Mackarness has produced inclines us to suspect that on this one point the Commission, so unsparing and so critical in all else, has understated the facts. What is serious is not so much that recent and cruel instances of the use of torture to procure confession have been brought to light. The grave evil is rather that when they were exposed by the independent judges of the highest courts in the land, the police authorities and the Executive set themselves to frustrate the investigation, and to whitewash the police. If, even in so grave a matter as this, the officials at the head of the police are disposed to "support their subordinates in an unreasonable manner," we lack guarantees against the occurrence of torture and the impunity of those who use it.

When the Police Commission reported in 1903, the political crisis had hardly begun. To-day it is obvious what part this uncivilised police must have had in aggravating the unrest when agitation became acute. To the average native of India the Government is not the impartial and honest Englishman at the head of the machine, the magistrate or collector, who reckons his subjects in fractions of a million. The Government is to him primarily the harsh and venal policeman, who levies bribes upon him, threatens his women, lays tribute on his village, fabricates evidence, and holds in reserve the weapons of degrading imprisonment and, in the last resort, of torture. The science, the power of organisation, the prestige, the personal honor, of his white rulers are so many assets which render the unworthy rule of the native subordinate possible, while they do not succeed in making it tolerable. When once the agitation had become formidable, it was on the eyes and ears of this police that the Anglo-Indian Government has had to rely for its information. By its evidence summary trials have been conducted, and on its information the leaders of the advanced parties have been deported untried. The Commission proposed many reforms in discipline, education, recruitment, and procedure. But it was left to its unofficial native member, the Maharaja of Darbhanga, to insist once more on the single indispensable reform which can alone give security for justice in India—the separation of the magistrature from the executive. So long as the magistrate in any degree directs this police, shares responsibility for its defects, and prepares the cases which he or his colleagues must judge, there can be no independent check either in criminal or in political cases upon the shortcomings of his venal and prejudiced subordinates.

In a crisis when the purity of the tribunals which have to try educated men for political crimes is all-important, this reform ranks second only to the establishment of the beginnings of representative government. A failure in our judicial procedure may well contribute to a vindictive resentment which may set in motion a campaign of terrorism. The assassination of Mr. Jackson at Christmas has come nearer to causing a panic in Anglo-Indian opinion than any of the earlier crimes of the extremists. Yet there is for this outrage an explanation which makes it at least intelligible. Mr. Jackson, an official who combined executive with judicial duties, had to judge an Indian writer, Mr. Savarkar, accused of publishing seditious poems. He passed on him, a young man, the sentence of imprisonment for life, with the confiscation of all his goods. Had public opinion or his superiors intervened, the tragedy might have been averted. But Mr. Jackson was singled out for promotion. It was then that the friends of the young man whom he had condemned to a living death for a crime of opinion made their cruel and vengeful protest. How can we appeal with hope to moderate opinion in India to support order and civilisation against terrorism, unless we first take measures to separate the administration of justice from the associations of the police? There is no case for censure or recrimination. The system which our generation has inherited in India is the heirloom of a haphazard conquest, and the legacy of a long neglect. Lord Morley, with a bold and statesmanlike conception of his task, has hitherto fixed his attention on the larger and more obviously political aspects of the problem. Habit, prejudice, and the clog of finance stand in the way of this judicial reform. Already a beginning, and a very promising beginning, has been made in the work of freeing executive officers from judicial duties. The misfortune of Lord Morley's position is that swift reforms in a tangle so complicated are hardly possible, and that he inherits a task which inert predecessors too long neglected. But in the present temper of India the evils of swift action are less evident than the manifest disaster of delay. An autocracy, even if it must postpone the whole work of organic reform, has at least the power to anticipate some of the benefits of reconstruction, by a stern resolve to impose its will upon subordinates, and to punish officials who show a tenderness towards the worse abuses of an uncivilised police.

THE HUMBUG OF "TARIFF REFORM."

It is only possible to establish Protection by whispering into the ear of one class of producer a pledge which is at once broken by a pledge to another class, or, as Mr. Churchill well puts it, "by seeking to buy the vote of one district by selling the industry of another." In other words, it is a proposal, not to protect national production, but to protect some national industries and workers at the cost of others, and it is through the selection of protected businesses and the exclusion of sacrificed trades that the corrupt warfare of interests called "Tariff Reform" proceeds. We have just come across a concrete example of this falsehood which exposes in a flash the general working of the process. A few months ago a seat was won for Protection at Ber-mondsey by a promise to tax leather, Bermondsey being a constituency where the leather trade flourishes. To-day, in addition to a second contest waged in Bermondsey, an electoral battle is being fought in Norwich, which has no leather trade, but has a large industry in boot-making. The Tory candidates at Norwich are "Tariff Reformers," who make the stock complaint that English markets are being "flooded with the manufactured goods of foreign nations." As it happens, the three special kinds of manufactured articles with which Norwich is "flooded" for its own good are leather, paper, and wire. As the "Eastern Daily Press" points out, the more sweeping the tide of importation the busier these Norwich industries become. Having been made unpleasantly aware of these facts, the Protectionist candidates proceed to qualify. "We fully recognise," they say, "the need for care and caution, especially in framing a tariff in the case of partly manufactured goods," and, they add, "proposals likely to prejudice any Norwich industries would be utterly inconsistent with the whole object of Tariff Reform."

In other words, these gentlemen propose to exempt imported paper, wire, and leather, especially leather, from all taxes, because they know that without this pledge thousands of Norwich operatives, moved by the commonest instincts of self-preservation, will vote against them. But when they say that the taxation of such articles is contrary to the whole object of Tariff Reform, they state what is not true. This will immediately appear should the result of the election be the return of two Protectionists for Norwich and one Protectionist for Bermondsey. In that case the coming Parliament will at least contain two members of the Tory Party pledged to exempt leather, and one member of the Tory Party pledged to tax it. The Bermondsey representative would at once be snowed under. The vote of one Norwich Protectionist would be neutralised by his Bermondsey colleague, and the general issue whether the leather trade or the boot trade should win would depend on the respective lobbying power of the two interests. Mr. Churchill, in his letter to the Liberal candidate for Leicester, shows that the 10 per cent. tax on leather for which the Bermondsey Protectionist votes, will mean an addition of £200,000 to the Leicester manufacturers' bill for cost of material, and 3s. a week on the wage of the average Leicester operative. Norwich can work out the corresponding sum for herself. We have no doubt that on hundreds of Tory platforms to-day one set of local Protectionists is thus giving away the case of another set. But when in one breath these deceivers of the people proclaim their intention to tax the foreigner, and in another propose the exemption of special industries dependent on foreign supplies, they show their knowledge of the fact that in truth it is the home industry which is taxed.

HOW IT STRIKES A CONTEMPORARY.

It is possible to-day, with the aid of canvassing results, to supplement the always uncertain guide of public meetings; to estimate "How the Election strikes a contemporary": the issues, the appeals, and counter-appeals as they affect various classes of a mixed East-End constituency.

The first thing to notice is that here, as I expect elsewhere through London, the illusion of the reference of the Budget to the people has already vanished. The Conservatives never mention the Budget, and, so far as is possible, refuse all discussion of the House of Lords. "A Voice" sometimes brings them back to realities: but for his disconcerting influence their sole topics would be the weakness of the British Navy, the strength and determination of Germany, "Work for All," by a tariff in which taxes on imported motor-cars loom larger than taxes on bread: combined with roseate pictures of Germany and America as the working-man's paradise, and dolorous pictures of the decline and fall of Great Britain. Unfortunately for them, however, "voices" seem maliciously determined that they shall explain why the Lords threw out the Budget: and this is a difficult explanation, to a working-class audience.

Amongst the skilled artisans the tide is running full and strong against the Lords and in favor of the Finance Bill. Here opinion is certainly more solid, united, and enthusiastic against the Tories, even than it was four years ago. I doubt if the constitutional distinction between the rejection of a Finance Bill and the rejection of an ordinary Bill counts for very much. It is anti-Lord feeling in general: a kind of contemptuous anger against the hereditary Chamber. It is very far from content with the abolition or limitation of the "Veto." It wants to sweep the whole affair away—lock, stock, and barrel. It regards the Lords as the enemies of the people. This feeling must have been deep in the blood before this manifestation, for the Election is merely setting match to tinder. It does not in the least fear Single-Chamber Government. It will acquiesce in a Second Chamber so long as that Chamber is elective. But it will have nothing to do with an hereditary Second Chamber, and its only doubt is due to some uncertainty whether, as a matter of fact, the Liberals mean business in the matter.

All this feeling is, of course, greatly assisted by the utterances of Lord Curzon, Lord Milner, and others, in the claims they are making against the Commons. The defenders of the Lords have been a godsend to the lovers of progress.

A certain number of Conservatives, and more of the "doubtful" working-class voters, have come into the Liberal ranks on this Lords question. This reinforcement is not confined to the artisans, but includes also some of the middle classes. I find, for example, two foremen in a local factory who pronounce themselves keen Tariff Reformers, with faith undismayed, but who to-day are voting for the Budget and against the Lords. Here is a letter from another convinced Tariff Reformer:—

"Land taxation and the imposition of tariffs are two new and different principles of taxation; and it is quite possible for an elector to be in favor of both principles. My own belief is this: whichever party gets into power in 1910. Tariff Reform will come into operation within five years, unless some great international upheaval takes place in the meantime. On the other hand, land taxation and the reduction of the power of the Lords is the chance of a lifetime. Its 'opportuneness,' giving as it does the chance of establishing once and for all the power of the Democracy, makes it of such importance that it transcends all other considerations whatever."

With the unskilled laborer, amongst whom there is much unemployment, the constitutional question does not bulk so largely. He has been so accustomed to assume that neither Lords nor Commons can help him in the least, or, indeed, have any desire to help him, that he does not distinguish between the supremacy of the one or the other. Here was the class which I thought might be gained by Tariff Reform, with its promise of more employment. But I find that any gain from such a promise is more than balanced by fear of the food taxes. I find here the same fundamental, persistent, immovable condemnation of a tax on bread. It is not produced by argument. It cannot be shaken by argument. It lies in the mind and conviction of the man, and especially of the woman, in a region beyond and behind argument. It is probably some inherited conviction, beaten into the fibre of the mind by the experience of Corn Law Days. Manipulate statistics as much as you please, promise to take off compensating taxes on sugar or tea or tobacco, assert that the foreigner pays: It is all no good. "You didn't ought to tax bread," remains as a kind of ultimate bedrock of belief.

That belief will always save England from so-called "Tariff Reform."

One great surprise to me has been the enormous popularity of the Old Age Pensions—the gratitude to the Government for the Old Age Pension system. I should have expected that in the country. I did not expect it in the towns where the chances of survival to seventy are so small, and where the pensioners who actually exist are lost among the crowd. This is not a selfish feeling, a personal satisfaction at a gift of income assured to the individual after the age of seventy. It is far more a general emotional sense that something good at last has come to the weak and helpless, that Government, for the first time in history, has really taken upon itself to look after those who have no other friends. The profound hatred of the Poor Law, of inspectors of all kinds, of Charity Organisation and all the apparatus of grudging and scrutinising aid, has made this boon more than usually popular. The universality of it is the feature that touches the imagination—that every old man or old woman over seventy without means of support shall receive it as of right is just the kind of liberality which the workman approves. He is always generous and reckless in charity. He goes surety for a friend and is sold up next day; he lends when he has nothing of his own; he gives when his own table is bare. Posters were issued from authority exhibiting a vision of a village scene with an old couple sitting outside the cottage door in the light of the setting sun. I ordered but a few of these, as I thought they would be more congruous with rural than with urban realities. I found that most of those who chose posters to exhibit—and our electors chose their own posters—wanted this particular picture. The spectacle, hanging in the windows of dingy, mean, narrow streets, overshadowed by the fumes of the factory, of this vision of a remote countryside and a tranquil ending to labor, excited feelings at once pathetic and triumphant.

I believe also that it is a real fact, and not mere idle flattery, that the bulk of the working-men are quite willing to spare the extra halfpenny they pay on tobacco, when they know that it goes to the Old Age Pension scheme. I have heard no complaints at all of the tobacco or whisky tax, nor have such been reported by canvassers. The Tory attempt to make rather ignoble capital out of these "burdens" has altogether failed.

The smaller traders are very largely in favor of Tariff Reform. That is one of the curiosities of this election: for they would seem to be the classes under any conditions least likely to benefit. But they are being very severely hit by competition amongst themselves and by competition with big business and co-operative concerns, and they seem to feel a vague idea that some kind of benefit might result from some kind of change. They are inclined to be afraid of developments along "Socialistic" lines. So many of them fall back upon the general if inexplicable hope that "Better Times" may be given by a tariff, and some of the increased prosperity flow into their store.

The "Naval Scare" seems to have fallen absolutely flat. I am not aware of a vote that will be changed by it. If Mr. Blatchford had written out his terrors in any other paper but the "Daily Mail," he would have been listened to. But the combination of the two seems more than even the Socialists can stand, and his name is received to-day with groans. And the Naval Scare has been killed by the rejection of the Budget. The workmen openly scoff at a body of panic-mongers who first demand "Dreadnoughts," then refuse the money to pay for them, then demand more. They believe that if really the upper classes were as much afraid as they appear to be, they would have passed super tax, death duties, land taxes, and all the rest of them, sooner than let the "Dreadnoughts" be unbuilt. They cannot understand the parsimony and selfishness (as it appears to them) on the one hand, the wild call for endless expenditure on the other.

"Talk Unemployment" was the advice given by one of those frantic journalists who have been egging on the Tory Party to its destruction. "Talk Unemployment" is the advice which I would give to every speaker at every meeting during the next fortnight. The Government's national scheme for the settlement of the unemployed problem is far the most popular item in its whole policy. Explain the apparatus of alleviation as outlined in the Government programme—the Labor Exchanges for registering and finding work—the Development Grants adjusting remunerative Government work in times of scarcity—the insurance pay in the scheme. Explain how this may operate, in answer to the question, "What is a man to do who is willing to work, and can't find work, and doesn't want to fall to charity?" Explain that the Budget would have launched this scheme with three millions of money, and that money has been refused by the Lords. You will see a unanimous enthusiasm, you will find a new note of anger in the attitude towards the Lords: you will see the vague promises of Tariff Reform, smeared with the food tax, melting into air—into thin air. This, and the Pensions, and the promise of the sickness insurance, are responsible for a new attitude of the working people towards the governing authority—an attitude of gratitude, confidence, hope.

Villadom all round London will largely vote Tory, except where Nonconformity spreads enlightenment and a freer spirit, or where voters have repudiated the domination of the "Daily Telegraph" and the halfpenny yellow papers. I may be quite blind in my estimates, but I cannot see why any other part should go from us. Every morning I read the frantic ravings of the Tory Press, daily more shrill in screaming, like the prophets of Baal crying and cutting themselves with stones, leaping on the altars which they have made. Every afternoon in acres of poor streets, I find "no voice nor any that regarded." The Lords have committed suicide, and have dragged down the Tory Party with them to a common ruin. They have no case which can be stated to a working-class audience. They seem to be choked alike by their virtues and their vices. To-day I feel to their advocacy as Mr. Henry James felt to the Confederate States when he visited Richmond. Before I came I knew there was a cause which had lost. After I left I knew there was a cause which could never have won.

C. F. G. MASTERMAN.

A SURVEY OF THE CONSTITUENCIES.

BY ONE WHO HAS BEEN ROUND THEM.

ON the eve of a general election prophecy speaks with the tongues of Babel. From Highbury we learn that we are engaged in a fight in which Tariff Reform is certain to win; from Whittinghame that we are on the threshold of a fight in which Unionism must win—sooner or later. A bookish journal of indeterminate politics sees in its dreams a clear Unionist majority of at least a hundred. Other witnesses—and these of the most unspotted Toryism—predict either a milder cataclysm or else none at all. Some are even of opinion that the Opposition may come back still an Opposition. Others, while admitting that the Government may and probably will survive its plunge into the cauldron, hope to see it emerge as something less than a Government—that is, in a condition so maimed and crippled as to be at the mercy, not, indeed, of its foes, but of sectional groups of its friends. Seldom can conjecture have been at once so diversified and so lop-sided. It all hinges on the question of how many Liberal seats are to be lost, never for a moment on the counter-question of how many Tory seats are to be won. The polls, we may be sure, will adjust the balance on a more equitable principle.

In this election, it may be urged, the Opposition have nothing to lose, and you cannot unclothe the legs of a Highlander. No; but, failing the garment, you may hew off the limbs. All Oppositions, whether vigorous or feeble, have invariably suffered a certain amount of damage in general elections. Usually the factor is dismissed in advance, as one of no fixed value, or as otherwise negligible. Doubtless Mr. Gladstone had so dismissed it when, in his calculations for the election of 1892, he arrived, as Lord Morley has told us, at a comfortable Liberal majority of from eighty to a hundred. By the accepted canons of the prophetic game Mr. Gladstone was not only right but almost miraculously right. He gained eighty seats, and if only the process had stopped there his majority would have been ninety-two. Unfortunately the other side gained seats as well—as many as twenty-six—and owing to this unlooked-for check the rotund ninety-two dwindled into a meagre forty. The truth is that the other side, whether Liberal or Tory, always does win seats. Even at the last election, in the high flood of Liberal prosperity, the Unionists snatched fourteen such trophies from the victorious party. In 1895, a year of Liberal eclipse, the consolations of the vanquished included as many as twenty prizes wrested from the Tory victor. And in the abysmal Khaki election of 1900 the discomfited Liberals actually won almost as many seats as their assailants—for in that election, it will be remembered, the Government of the day were the attacking force. In the end the difference between the rival parties in seats lost and gained was only two, Mr. Chamberlain's captures numbering thirty-eight and Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman's thirty-six. As with Mr. Gladstone in 1892, so in 1900. Mr. Chamberlain had been counting only his own chickens. When these came to be hatched they were to yield "not an ordinary, but an overwhelming, majority." Up to a point the ambition was gratified, and all would have turned out as planned but for the intrusion of what one may call the law of electoral compensation.

Here, then, is a factor that must clearly be taken into account in any forecast of the election of 1910. A Minister was pointing out the other day that even if the Opposition won the hundred seats on which they had set their hearts they would still be in a minority of 150. So they would if this were a net win. If, on the other hand, the calculation is one-sided—and most of the estimates that have hitherto appeared have borne that appearance—then the true inference is that the Opposition are reckoning on being in a minority of nearer 200 than 150. Of course they will win a certain number of seats, and undoubtedly they will lose a certain number, equal, in all probability, to at least a fifth of their gains. A survey of their holdings in the expiring Parliament shows their tenure to be precarious in more than a score of instances, extending from Scotland to Devonshire. Seats are to be won by the Government, not only in the Glasgow district, but also in the East of Scotland, in several of the Northern Counties of England, including Yorkshire, Lancashire, Durham, and Northumberland, in the Western Counties, in London itself, and in one or two of the Home Counties. Possibly, too, Ireland may send some slight reinforcement to its enigmatic Liberal representation. Only in Wales can the Opposition say with certainty that they have all to win and nothing to lose.

Meanwhile, the signs everywhere seem to be pointing to a Liberal triumph so emphatic that the little less or the little more may fail to be of much account. An experienced observer recently predicted that the election would reveal a "rush" one way or the other, but probably in favor of the Government, or, rather, against the House of Lords. This was before that body had committed itself to the destruction of the Budget. Till then, feeling in the country had appeared to be poised rather tremulously between the rival parties. All that was wanted to tilt the balance was the slightest touch, certainly not such a jolt as that of which we are now witnessing the consequences. British conservatism might have reconciled itself to one innovation; it might even have acquiesced in Tariff Reform as an experiment. The capital error lay in the attempt at a double innovation—in the endeavor to carry a fiscal by a constitutional revolution. For there can be no doubt that the constitutional question now stands out as the master issue of the elections. Especially is this the case in the great urban centres. Next to the mercurial shifts and dodges with which the men who provoked the quarrel have sought to obscure their own action, the most striking feature of the struggle, to those who have been watching it at close quarters, has been the iron tenacity with which the mass of electors have insisted on keeping our titled contortionists to the point. Perhaps it is in the North that the wave of resentment has reached its height, more particularly in Yorkshire, though almost to an equal degree in Lancashire. South and West and East the wave beats more fitfully, yet still with a gathering momentum, which old electioneering hands can only compare to the roaring sluices of 1906. As in that fateful year, so again in 1910, Birmingham seems likely to serve the purpose in the Midlands of a Unionist breakwater. There our new revolutionaries "sit secure in their fastness and listen to the wind upon the hill till the waters abate." It is the one part of the country to which the Opposition are looking with unshaken confidence. Of London they are at once hopeful and fearful, but in Birmingham, as they imagine, they can put their trust without reserve. And, indeed, much may turn on the extent to which this Unionist Gibraltar proves to have enlisted the allegiance of its surrounding territory. Its captains predict that it will carry with it as many as seven counties.

Elsewhere such losses as the Government may suffer will be due, as Unionist prospectors agree, mainly to local or personal causes. It would be difficult to pick out a Liberal seat supposed to be in jeopardy and cite it as an example of the unpopularity of the Budget or the popularity of the Lords. A three-cornered fight, neglected organisation, a long tradition of Toryism, some exceptional depression of trade, a weak candidate—these are the sort of points on which stress is laid in most of the instances given by the Opposition of constituencies which they hope to capture. For the rest the sweep of the tide is plainly with the Government, and if any doubt lingers as to the result it is chiefly because of the far-reaching and sleepless enmity of the drink interest, reinforced in the rural districts by a system of feudal intimidation, which is being pushed in this election to unexampled extremes.

Life and Letters.

OUR LOST ROMANCE.

DURING the last few weeks the Peers have done the people a wrong more irreparable than the stoppage of supplies or the breaking of the Constitution. We are a romantic people. From earliest childhood we have been nurtured upon the chronicles of court and castle, the pageant of past ages has been wrought into our imagination by the glorious deeds and the majestic figures of noblemen who, by their pre-eminence in war and government, by their patronage of learning and commerce, appear as the saviours of their country. No equalitarian sentiments were allowed an entrance into this romantic history: it was undiluted hero-worship: princes, dukes, and lords by right divine and personal ascendancy moulded the destiny of the common people. The glamor of feudalism has never been expelled from our emotional system. The magnificent heritage of our poetic literature has gone to feed it: our popular theology, under the same lordly patronage, has planted the same feudal sentiments in Heaven and Hell, summoning the next world to support the inequalities of this. Think of all that Spenser, Shakespeare, Milton, Scott, have done to inform and ennoble this romance. Nor has it lacked more spontaneous popular support. The heart and imagination of the people responded to the appeal of the court chroniclers and troubadours in their home-spun ballads and folk-tales. The drab life of our people has always cherished this relief. Gallant lords and gay ladies, decked in glorious sheen, emerging from their parks and pleasantries in visible magnificence, have always stirred our feelings. Shallow cynics have often derided the snobishness of this worship of rank: paradoxists have played with its prevalence by feigning that no one loves a lord like "your Radical." But if the essence of snobishness is, as Thackeray declares, "mean admiration of mean objects," the charge does not really lie. For the nobles we have fashioned for us from our chronicles, our drama, and our fiction, are not mean. They are great and radiant beings, stronger and braver than ourselves, their women more beautiful and better dressed, they are even wiser in counsel and more expressive in their speech. The disillusionising influence of education has doubtless gone some way to sow scepticism among the middle classes. Ouida's noble guardsmen and Disraeli's duchesses no longer ring true for the high-school girl of to-day. But for the masses the glamor still remains. Nay, there is some reason to believe that the new-found liberty of reading print has served among the town-bred workers to give fresh vigor to the romance of aristocracy. Two generations of "Bow Bells" and the "Family Herald," with their more recent congeners, have not wrought in vain: no rationalism, no Radicalism, no realism, has gone far to dispel the fascination of high life as it appears in the sumptuous setting of this novelette.

In rudely dispelling this protective atmosphere of romance, our lords do not, we fear, quite recognise the shock they are inflicting, or the new danger they incur. A sudden plunge from so elevated a romance into a realism so sober—or, shall we say, so sordid?—is at least a risky proceeding. Romance never claimed from the aristocracy a standard of conduct inhumanly high, or morals that were immaculate. On the contrary, our "barbarians" were always accorded a barbarian licence: it was even part of the enjoyment of the romance to attribute to them lapses or irregularities which among ordinary citizens were highly reprehensible. The tamest dog has left in him some kick against the shackles of "conventional morality": though he may not indulge in such recklessness or impropriety himself, he is not unwilling to acknowledge a class of "super-men" to whom these things are permitted. So we have always agreed that there are faults, vices, even crimes, which seem appropriate to the romance of aristocracy. The Duke of Cœur-de-Lion or the Marquis of Steyne might, nay, should, have mysterious blots upon his past; the Marquis of Bagwig may keep his mistresses, not too openly, and be "none the worse," Lord Glenlivat or Lord Nozoo may gamble away the family estate over horses or cards, and it is a natural episode in the life of a member of this decorative order. The term "decorative," perhaps better than any other, describes the modern setting of the peerage in the popular imagination. We do not now seriously look for deeds of personal prowess, and though willing easily to accord them leadership in politics, we do not demand scientific statecraft. The consent of the people to the existence of a House of Lords, as to the retention of feudal landlordism throughout the country, has in modern times rested on this sentimental and traditional regard for a decorative fringe to the common life, something that should give color, leadership, and spectacle. To get this, they were prepared to sanction opulence and extravagance, without inquiring into "origin of income." Their noses kept close to the grindstone, the people have wanted to see some easy living, and some open-handed generosity. They liked to think of these bright beings, as of sporting dogs or pedigree mares, the families of ancient or imputed lineage, licensed to a life of sport, luxury, and pleasure. John Bull could afford to pay for this sort of thing, and he chose to do so, so long as he got his money's worth in sentimental enjoyment. If here and there among them was a "black Earl," or a spendthrift Marquis, the order did not really suffer in his estimation: secretly, he felt rather proud of the spirit which ran to such excess. That a Duke should bifurcate in his domestic life was quite allowable, provided it was not formally made public, and it is not long since "drunk as a lord" carried with it a distinct note of admiration.

One thing only these lords of romance must not do: they must not descend to the common level of reality. We love to think of them as scions of a fighting, hunting, gambling, sporting race. We are not particular about the origin of their illustrious house. We like to hear how in some dim earlier age some service of love or war rendered by ancestor or ancestress to an English monarch raised them to their high estate, though we readily condone the more sordid services to throne or party which in later and degenerate days form a more useful origin. Until the last few weeks the fabric of this romance was not seriously impaired. All of a sudden its owners have by their own reckless act brought it to ruin, and they stand to-day within its bare walls stripped of all the armor of illusions which served so well to maintain their power and privileges. While they stood upon their honorable pedestals, no one thought of looking at their feet of clay. Dim rumormight associate them with the ownership of city slums or village death-traps, the wealth they squandered might have continued to flow from taprooms, sweating factories, and the ill-requited toil of thousands of those whom we never really reckoned as their fellow men. They stood so high aloof from the world; even the underlings and agents of a Duke or Marquis were men of consequence who touched the sordid details of trade and industry through a chain of lesser men. All this intermediate support has now suddenly collapsed. The House of Lords debate showed us some eighty jug and bottle lords, directors and shareholders of breweries and distilleries, gathered round their chairmen to defend their right to batten on the degradation of the people. Several hundred rent-receivers gathered there confederate, to dodge their contribution to the upkeep of the State which had at any rate always served them well, some scores of financiers and rich manufacturers were voluble with sophistry to spare their well-filled purses at the expense of their customers or victims. What a lifting of the veil! These heroes of romance were all out for cash, it would appear, land speculators looting the public purse by supplying sites at inflated prices, driving hard bargains with little shopkeepers or agricultural laborers, speculators in "tied" houses, or "something in the City"—anything but the magnificent idlers we mistook them for. In this realistic attitude they took their stand, not for the privileges of their order, not for the right to feed the reverential spirit of an admiring multitude, but for hard cash. Had they stopped there, all might not have been lost. Audacious orators among them might have saved at least some shreds of dignity for the Peers of England. In their House, at least, they stood in the collective glory of their sacred order. The commonalty were not yet made familiar with the very human nature of a lord. The full process of disillusionment began when peers by scores stood on the schoolroom platform airing their English undefiled before the amazed ears of tradesmen and artisans. Insolence, a mere bravado of defiance, might have been consistent with a certain dignity at least of bearing; argument, had they been able to sustain it, might at least have served some educative purpose. Had they left the setting of their case to their few trained statesmen, recovery had still been possible. But dozens of wild peers, making a free exhibition of their stable-talk and their Eton manners coram populo, bandying epithets with voices from a crowd, and getting their facts and arguments punctured by the shrewder wit of a bucolic hearer—this is surely the death-knell of our romance. Never again shall we utter with bated breath the name of a duke; a marquis will in future be little more than a man: and earls and barons will hardly be distinguishable from Dick or Harry. How completely the invaluable asset of romance has been squandered by these weeks of common selfishness may, we think, be tested by the instinctive grin which would appear on the face of the dullest citizen who was invited by Lord Salisbury to accept his description of the House of Lords as "an independent body—with a great sense of responsibility—doing its utmost to interpret and consider the wishes and views of the country."

THE BEATEN PATH.

WHEN the Oriental king foreboded woe to him who praises his friend, "rising up early and praising him," he revealed a fine insight into the essence of the early riser and the bore. The depreciation of others is at all hours welcome, since to hear of people no better than oneself flatters a pleasing sense of equality; but listening to another's superiority proclaimed before breakfast, when vitality is at its lowest, is an intolerable aggravation of the morning light. Indeed, the whole subject of friendship is rather repellent, at all events to the English nature. It is not merely that essayists have worn it threadbare as khaki, and through the vast commonplaces of Ciceronian Latin it has extended a tedium over our schools, until the very word is frigid. But talk about friendship is one of those things we instinctively avoid, just as no Englishman ever mentions love, except to his lover, without a certain shame. From which reserve the foreign philosopher argues an incapacity for emotion. But that interpretation is harsh; for the utterance of our emotion is only checked by an abhorrence of fuss and scene, and we are a peculiar people, if not, as some have supposed, a chosen race.

Certainly, Mill may have been right in thinking us in danger of stifling our feelings till they die, and if Bacon held that no receipt opens the heart like a true friend, it would seem that the dose in our climate is seldom taken strong enough. For it is a constricted organ that nods the British greeting after years of absence, or repeats a casual "Good luck!" on departure to the world's end. Yet here is Mr. Arthur Ransome collecting for Messrs. Jack a stalwart "Book of Friendship," and though some of it is from the Latin, and some from the French, and a line or two from the Chinese or Arabic, by far the greater part was written in our own reserved and unemotional tongue, and some of that part is true and profound in feeling. To be sure, Montaigne has surpassed all writers in that well-known outburst when, speaking of Steven de la Boetie, he suddenly rose above the limits of himself:—

"If a man urged me to tell wherefore I loved him" (so run a few of the familiar sentences) "I feel it cannot be expressed but by answering: Because it was he, because it was myself. . . . We sought one another before we had seen one another, and, by the reports we heard, I think by some secret ordinance of the heavens, we embraced one another by our names. . . . Since it must continue so short a time, and began so late (for we were both grown men, and he some years older than myself), there was no time to be lost. . . . Our minds have jumped so unitedly together, they have with so fervent an affection considered of each other, and with like affection so discovered and sounded, even to the very bottom of each other's hearts, that I did not only know his as well as my own, but I would verily rather have trusted him concerning any matter of mine than myself. Let no man compare any of the other common friendships to this."

From one of which sentences the modern epigrammatist appears to have borrowed his final line:—

A truce, a truce to questioning:
"We two are friends" tells everything.
Yet if you must know, this is why:
Because he is he, and I am I.

But, supreme as Montaigne is, our English Sir Thomas Browne comes near below him:—

"I never yet cast a true affection on a woman," he says, "but I have loved my friend as I do virtue, my soul, my God. From hence methinks I do conceive how God loves man, what happiness there is in the love of God. . . . I love my friend before myself, and yet methinks I do not love him enough; some few months hence my multiplied affection will make me believe I have not loved him at all. When I am from him I am dead till I be with him; when I am with him, I am not satisfied, but would still be nearer him. . . . Another misery there is in affection, that whom we truly love like our own, we forget their looks, nor can our memory retain the idea of their faces; and it is no wonder, for they are ourselves, and our affection makes their looks our own."

Montaigne had also denied friendship with women, and Heine draws the distinction that friendship begins where love comes to an end. Aristotle had defined love in almost the same words as Browne uses for his friendship—a longing of the absent for the absent. Tolstoy, in "War and Peace," has noticed the peculiar difficulty we all have in recalling the looks of an object of love. Such parallels and repetitions seem to prove that the nature of friendship, as of love, remains almost unchanged from age to age of man's history.

And yet it is not so. There are very few Englishmen who would now care to write of friendship as Sir Thomas Browne wrote. To most of us it would appear excessive—too much like that parting of David and Jonathan, when, as we read, "they kissed each other and wept one with another, until David exceeded." The conception of the matter does, in fact, change, as Mr. Ransome points out in his introduction:—

"The rich old Hebrew interpretation, followed by the sterner Roman, has passed gradually through the Elizabethan heyday of witty good comradeship, the grave seventeenth century of Milton and Cowley, and the social seventeenth century of Congreve and Gay, the polite teaching of the periodical essayists, the solemn heartiness of Dr. Johnson, to the closer examination of Hazlitt, and so to the more spiritual friendships of Carlyle and Emerson, the essay of the latter seeming, perhaps more nearly than any other, to express the finely shaded companionship we share to-day."

How different is Emerson's tone from Sir Thomas Browne's desire to be always nearer his friend! In Emerson there is a certain aloofness, a deliberate distance kept, a careful defence of personality. As where he writes:—

"I hate, where I looked for a manly furtherance, or at least a manly resistance, to find a mush of concession. Better be a nettle in the side of your friend than his echo. . . . Why should we desecrate noble and beautiful souls by intruding on them? Why insist on rash personal relations with your friend? Why go to his house, or know his mother and brother and sisters? Leave this touching and clawing. Let him be to me a spirit. A message, a thought, a sincerity, a glance from him, I want, but not news, nor pottage.

How admirable is the dignity of such a conception! And admirable, too, in their degree are all the familiar sayings on friendship collected in this book—as the saying of the Preacher that, as iron sharpeneth iron, so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend; or that of Blossius, who said he would even have burnt down the Capitol if his friend Tiberius Gracchus had bade him; or that of Bacon, how a crowd is not company, and faces are but a gallery of pictures, and talk but a tinkling cymbal, where there is no love; or that of Hazlitt, how he is little short of a hero, who per-severes in thinking well of a friend who has become a butt for slander, and a by-word; or, conversely, that of Rossetti when he spoke of a calumniator as one of his most intimate enemies.

Nevertheless, in all this excellent discourse, the present writer misses something, nor throughout the whole book has he yet discovered a true fibre of the relation which, for him, has always been the root of the matter. No doubt, many others have fully explored it, but for the moment only two little sayings of Goethe's occur to his mind. One is in prose: "Die Arbeit macht den Gesellen"—"Work makes the comrade," or, if the other possible translation, that work makes the apprentice, be taken, let us turn to the more definite verse, which may be thus rendered:—

"That friend of friends I call the best
Who shares my warfare at my side;
But if he bids me pause and rest,
Silently out of his reach I glide."

There you have it; in simple truth, work makes the comrade, and warfare the friend, nor is there any other means under heaven by which the best of friendship can be secured. That is why Society that does no work has no comrades, and comfortable people who never fight no friends. It has been a commonplace with moralists, from Cicero downwards, that the basis of friendship is virtue. Yet between men who have stood side by side under fire there is a peculiar tie, though they may not share half a virtue between them; and among the Boys of the Old Brigade there lives an abiding affection, though "some are in the workhouse, some are in the gaol," as the East-End song boldly answers to the tender West-End inquiry as to where those Boys may be.

The bond of work in common is strong, even where nothing but the work is shared; and strong is the bond of common danger, even at a shilling a day. And stronger still is the friendship that springs from high and dangerous enterprise, such as that for which the two Athenian friends hid their swords in myrtle boughs. But the strongest bond of all unites those who maintain prolonged and persistent warfare for some deep and absorbing purpose, compared to which reputation and livelihood and life appear secondary affairs. By people thus united, the ordinary grounds of friendship given among philosophers, such as harmony, conformity, a clubbable nature, or virtue, are seen not to count for much. All passive and negative conditions are licked up and consumed by the living flame. In the strife for such a purpose, the barriers of custom, property, and education fall away, and among the servants of that purpose the accepted qualities of friendship are transfigured with a sudden brightness. Only those who are not with them are against them, and if anyone bids them pause and rest, they glide silently out of his reach.

THE SEA IN MUSIC.

IN simple and primitive societies it was at one time expected of a minstrel that he should be blind. Homer, to be sure, has become for modern criticism a composite and multitudinous personality. But one fact about him no scholar will abandon. Homer was undoubtedly blind—a proposition which must be interpreted in the light of modern knowledge to mean that all and each of him were blind. How else should he have built up his rhythms and his cadences, his resounding lines, his melodies that dance upon six feet? His case suggests an important reform in the education of modern musicians. It is, to be brief, that, at an early period of their spiritual development, they should all be blinded, painlessly, if possible, but still effectively. Eyes are useful in music for the purposes of study. But at the first sign of a real talent for composition, the regrettable, but indispensable, operation should be humanely performed. Delay it even for a year, and the most promising musician may be lured away by the pride of life, and the beckoning of a too interesting visual world. It was the hearing of some of the work of M. Debussy the other day which suggested this painful conclusion. Let no one think these sentences hasty or unjust. M. Debussy was plainly visible when he conducted his symphonic suite, "The Sea," on an earlier occasion at the Queen's Hall. He is not blind. The result must have convinced every unprejudiced mind of the necessity of this drastic reform. M. Debussy has written three long movements about the sea, and he has written them with his eyes.

It was purely sensuous work, sensitive, strange, and very clever, but in its total rejection of every intellectual element in music so nearly wearisome that one's thoughts went straying as one listened. What sea, one asked, was it that Debussy was describing? It was no real sea at all, but more probably a seascape painted in a studio by some modern impressionist for a Paris Salon. It had waves and it had atmosphere. It had a changing sky. The dawn crept up across it, and the noonday sun lay over it, placid and cloudless and bright. It was, in short, the sea of the eyes, the sea which makes in us all a visual excitement, and sends us, if we have the skill, to our canvases and palettes. He had taken this visual sea, and tried to render it by little intricate rhythms and chromatic passages, to translate the world of sight painfully and elaborately into the world of sound.

The musician who tries to rival the painter by describing external things, is a magician who has thrown aside his wand to wield a quarter-staff. The relations of the two arts to the emotions which call forth their exercise are fundamentally different, and music has the incomparable advantage in its freedom and in its scope for the expression of personality. A painter has a subject which interests him—an expressive face, a landscape which reveals some rare and arresting play of light, a scaffolding in process of erection, like those amazing creations of Mr. Muirhead Bone's, where ropes and poles and heaps of ruin tell of the miracle of human energy. The scene has made in his mind a ferment, a powerful visual excitement. So far his experience does not differ from the musician's. Each is, no doubt, dependent, though in very different degrees, upon external stimulus. To the painter this is always something seen. To the musician it may be an event, a personal experience, an historic moment, or even some actual sound. The painter goes home, and his task is to render upon canvas not so much his own excitement as its cause. He selects, he emphasises, he idealises, and he adds the element of achievement and craftsmanship. But still his main business is to record in color and line, not his emotion, but the outward thing, which was its occasion. The musician, on the contrary, starts beyond his stimulus. He need not dally with it, nor seek to reproduce it. His business is entirely with the emotions and the audible excitement which it has stirred within him. He sings not battle, but the joy of battle; not death, but the terror and majesty of death; not the sea, but the mystery and grandeur of the sea. His medium, be it never so elaborate, is a development of song and dance, of rhythm and melody, of pure emotional expression, and not of the arts of reproduction and imitation. His impulse, once given to him, matters nothing to his hearer. The prattle of children, the stir of springtide woods, the riotous merriment of birds—all may excite him, but his work when it is finished will express only his sympathetic joy, his emotional reaction and response to these various incitements. It matters nothing to his hearers whether in fact it was child or bird or wood which gave him his starting point.

They say that the startling and emphatic phrase which opens Beethoven's Fifth Symphony had its origin in a knock upon his door. But who cares to ask whether the knocker really beat to that rhythm? What matters is the suggestion of surprise, and the development of the phrase until it comes to have a world-shaking significance, and to express the breaking of the outer world of force and destiny upon the seclusion of the soul. What matters even more is the smooth-flowing phrase, begotten of no external incentive whatever, in which the soul appears to give its tranquil answer to the world. There is a movement in the Pastoral Symphony which Beethoven himself labelled "The Brook." It does not describe a brook. It renders rather the gentle flow of spirits which the monotonous murmur of a brook may occasion. If Beethoven had been impressed, as Strauss was, by the spectacle of a baby in its bath, he would not have tried to reproduce the noise of splashing water. He would have rendered his own humorous excitement in rollicking rhythms and truncated melodies. If he had been impressed, as Strauss was, by the sight of a flock of sheep, he would not have made his orchestra bleat for three minutes on end. One might wager that he would have written a figure to express the excitement of multitudinous motion and pattering feet.

The intelligent partisan of "absolute" music will complain, not that Debussy went down to the sea, watched the sun rise and the frolic of the waves, or heard the wind in rude argument with the waters. His complaint will be rather that Debussy stayed there, that he settled down as a painter might, with a camp-stool and an easel, and was content to try to reproduce in sound a sort of parallel to the sights which moved him. His sea, in consequence, is a literal and a purely external thing. It is the sea that tosses and undulates, that glints and darkens. It is that and nothing more.

A blind musician would have cared nothing for the sea as an independent object. He would have drawn from it, as Debussy does not, its emotional significance. He would have felt and rendered the excitement that comes from the wind and the salt spray upon one's cheeks. The sea, after all, is not mere water. It is a state of the skin. It is the scene of shipwrecks and battles. It is full of dead men's bones and the floating wrack of Empires. It is a call of the blood, a tradition from the past. It is not an inhuman, an external thing. Much more is it anti-human, at once enemy of life and yet to the brave the mother and lover of men. The painter may regard it as a mere phenomenon, the foreground of dawns, the mirror of noons. The musician, if he knows the limitations and the possibilities of his art, will see it rather as the most stupendous factor in the emotional life of mankind, the symbol of all its conflicts, the analogue of its perpetual warfare with a fluctuating, yet indomitable, world. He will hear, in short, what Sophocles long ago heard on the Ægean, when it brought into his mind "the turbid ebb and flow of human misery."

THE ROBIN.

WE spread some crumbs on a suburban lawn, and in a short time there came for them sparrows, starlings, tits, blackbirds, and the robin. Dowdy, tumultuous sparrows that snouted the crusts about as long as there were crusts, starlings that walked round and round and dragged at the tender side of a lump of fat, blackbirds that just looked in between two courses of worm, tits that demanded and got a cocoanut to swing upon—and the robin.

There is nothing plural or multitudinous about the robin. He is a bird alone and apart, never in winter condescending to the company of any other of his own or any feathered species. As we write, the great tits have the monopoly of the cocoanut. The bird that hangs there and takes plunges half out of sight for the woody white meat is magnificent in his blue-black setting to the Gladstone collar beneath the eye, in his saffron waistcoat opening to show a black stock within, and in his bright indigo back, shot at the edges with coppery green. But you could not in justice take his portrait without including also that of his mate waiting close below and pushing him from the cocoanut before he has quite finished his turn. But beyond them, on some upstanding mound in the newly turned garden, on the spade-handle, or the barrow-shaft, sits the familiar red-breasted robin. It is his garden. He sits in it where he will. His man dug it while he watched, and he likes to spend a good deal of his time among the clods, the purpose of which he alone of all the birds understands. Every now and then he comes to the lawn and clears away the rabble gathered there at their ignoble feast. The sparrows eat for eating's sake, but the robin, when he has driven them away, merely pecks at the food for possession's sake. You can never say that you have seen the robin "on the feed." He is never pressed for time like a hen sparrow, that sits and gobbles as though for dear life; he never condescends to struggle with his food like a blackbird with a worm, or a thrush hammering out a snail; nor does he hunt a wall or minutely search a tree-trunk for grubs like a tit. As he dances about, intent, to all appearances, only upon the dance, his bold eye is aware of some morsel small enough to be eaten with decency, and in the midst of a figure he takes it, checking less than did Atalanta when she stooped in mid-course for a golden apple. Napoleon, von Moltke, Frederick the Great, Charlemagne, and the other conquerors, we may be sure, had the same kingly control of appetite. Our robin, at any rate, could not be the king he is without it. If he should go and guzzle like some common sparrow in a corner of the garden, in that instant the rabble would gain a footing from which even his imperiousness could not dislodge them.

We may be sure, too, that the robin owes his ascendancy over the other birds a good deal to his winter bachelordom. You cannot for ever keep in order your own flesh and blood. The most docile of wives would sometimes take the crumb before permission was accorded, or obey a command with less than perfect alacrity, an example that might be driven to almost any length by those revolutionary sparrows. So not even his spouse may be allowed within the four corners of the winter sphere of influence. She has somewhere or other her own sphere, which she rules with the same relentless vigilance. Or is it that some convention against nature has separated the robins, and that their impatience of other bird rights is the result of unhappiness? Is he in winter like a rogue elephant, his hand against everyone, because the world seems all out of joint? Cause and effect have no doubt alternating rôles in this, as well as other respects. Who shall say, for example, whether the unique coloring of the robin is the cause or the result of his aloofness among birds? The red of his breast is neither that of the chaffinch, the bullfinch, the carmine of the goldfinch's cheek, or the fire of the goldcrest. It is, of course, a thrush's red, for the robin belongs to that tribe. There is a little of it under the wing of the redwing, and something a little like it on the lower part of the red-start's breast. It may be that if you could separate out the colors of the nightingale, the back would be left greenish orange like the robin, and there would be obtained enough of the right kind of red to color his throat and chin. The first robin had a mere chin-fringe of red; his own sense of uniqueness started the race on the course that has made it now the most aloof and the most distinctly colored of all our birds.

In the invigorating days of autumn, our robin came little nearer than the other birds. He deemed it, however, much more important than they to keep us under view. He liked to see, or perhaps to smell, the brown earth as it was being turned over, and he would follow us or precede us as we went from one end of the garden to the other. That is the charming way with the robin. Wherever he is, round the house or far out in the woods, he is always on the look-out for some human friend. He nests as near to some path or frequented road as he can, so that he and his mate may see men go by. Perhaps they get a benefit more tangible than even the inspiring sight of our noble figures. We have heard of a pair that came and fetched a man with plaintive, beckoning cries, because a rat had broken into their nest. Often must our steps or the trail of our scent make nervous some marauder that would otherwise have found and eaten the young robins. The robin has even its own peculiar smell, perhaps moulded on its perception of ours, a fascinating subject that we dare not pause to pursue.

When we first offered our robin a mealworm he seemed offended. Determined to begin with a very thin end of the wedge, we put it on the path and went away to our digging. The bird, knowing that we had put food for him, nevertheless came after us and sat on the wall as much as to say: "It isn't your grubs I want, but you." But he could not keep it up, and just had to go and get his grub, and then come back to the digging. Many a mealworm has he had since. First he came to the bird-table, and took them as we stood near, then he took them from the box while we held it in our hand. Lastly, he dispensed with all formality and took his food from the fingers, as all robins should. He knows the box, and he knows the whistle that always accompanies the offer of the delicacy. He comes to us wherever we happen to be, and, when we are not outside, he comes and looks into the windows to see where we are. Still, he does not come into the house after us, as did the robin to a friend, using the letter-box when the door was shut. Just now, in fact, our robin is rather shyer than he has been. When we had got him up to the last pitch of friendliness, the weather broke; the frost went out of the ground, bringing edible things to the top; gnats and small moths began to fly again, so that mealworms out of a tobacco box are no longer indispensable.

The white man must have his robin wherever he is. Oliver Wendell Holmes laments for the American because his robin, instead of being a domestic bird that feeds at the table, is "a great fidgety, jerky, whooping thrush." It is, indeed, no better than a fieldfare, gregarious, chattering, predatory, and migratory. The last word damns it worse than all the rest. The robin must share our climate cheerfully all the year round. He must cheer us on the darkest day with his tinkling song which is to that of the nightingale as the cold and greyiness of December are to the brilliance of May. If there were no robin we would choose in his place for domesticity the hedge sparrow, which sings just a little shivery winter song, evidently admires man at a distance, and could be induced to make close friends. On some other grounds we would go to the stone chat, as ruddy of breast, with the added glory of black head and white collar, an all-the-year-round bird that comes to the homestead in winter and will accept a winter pension. He would never, however, come to our suburb, and if he did, would not crack jokes at frost and snow like the robin. The stone chat seems to sit on one post with his shoulder feathers hunched round his neck, all through the dreary time till the gorse bushes are warm again. There is no bird for the winter garden, for the Christmas morning song, or for our Christmas cards but the robin.

He is our own particular robin. Always in the garden or ready to appear there at a moment's notice. We know that he is also the particular robin of several other gardens, or that he persuades each of the owners that he is that one's own particular Christmas guest. But he never comes flying from afar like the sparrows and starlings. He just appears on the nearest wall or on one of his favorite tree perches. He might as well rise out of the earth, so mysteriously does he incarnate. "You needn't call as though I was in the next parish," he seems to say. "I've been waiting here for the last half-hour." Towards evening he begins to get rather more distant. If he comes for food, it is with just a "tick" of his alarm note, and then, when a shade or two of twilight have fallen, he begs to be excused while he attends to some of his private affairs. He would not for worlds let you know where he sleeps. Most birds are shy about that, though we do know as a matter of fact where the sparrows have their crowded dormitory and where the blackbird sleeps fitfully. The robin retires far later than they. He is "tick-ticking" about after the lamps are lit, and in the dusk his olive green livery is nearly invisible. At last, the little moth-like shadow melts into the gloom and does not reappear. Somewhere or other, apart from the rest of the bird population we may be sure, the robin tucks his head under his wing and sleeps.

Art.

THE ACADEMY WINTER EXHIBITION.

STICKLERS for the artistic unity of a picture exhibition may find cause for complaint in the miscellaneous character of the works that are now on view at Burlington House. It may be urged that too many schools are represented; that the juxtaposition, say of the Italian rooms and the Dutch room, is calculated to spoil the average appetite for the latter, on the principle that it is difficult to be satisfied with a parlor when one has just come out of a palace; and that miscellanies are better left to the permanent collections. There is something to be said for this point of view, and in favor of making the Academy winter show the exposition of one man's work or that of one school, more especially since it is some years—if we except the somewhat unhappy experiment with the McCulloch collection—since this has been done. On the other hand, one must recognise that to fill half a dozen rooms with a really representative display of a single master, or even a single school, is a very difficult task; and that should the attempt fall short of completeness, the failure is a particularly dreary one. By giving one room and the best part of a second to Italian pictures, one to the Dutch, one to the late Sir E. J. Gregory, and the remainder to as good an assortment of British, Flemish, and French works as can be conveniently obtained, which is what the authorities have done in the present instance, the exhibition may lose in unity, but its educational value is hardly lessened, and its attractiveness is enhanced in the eyes of a variety-loving public.

The exhibition just opened is certainly an argument in favor of miscellaneousness. Whether by reason of special care having been devoted to its organisation, or of a spirit of rivalry engendered by the success of the loan exhibition at the Grafton Galleries, or by accident, the various sections are wonderfully complete and interesting. It is not that they are filled with world-famous masterpieces; we should be inclined to say that there are fewer of these than usual. However, the greatest works of a painter or a school are not as desirable in an exhibition of this kind as the typical works, and the latter are certainly not wanting in any one of the sections. Take the Italian rooms, for instance. The examples of the fifteenth and sixteenth century painting that are shown are mostly those which criticism has declared reputable rather than of the highest repute, and some of the greatest names in Italian art—Raphael, Michael Angelo, Piero della Francesca—are not represented at all. Yet there is not an insignificant picture on the walls of these rooms; and there are certain "features" that will make the exhibition memorable beyond its kind. Witness the illustration of artistic descent afforded by what may be called the Botticelli group. Of Sandro himself there is but one example, a very characteristic one, in Mr. R. H. Benson's "Virgin and Child." But, not far from this, is a rendering of the same subject by Botticini, a tondo which, despite the absence of that peculiar linearity which distinguishes the master, and the presence of an un-Botticellesque glory of color—the blaze of its gold and rich scarlet and ultramarine is one of the first things to catch the eye as one enters the room—has yet sufficient likeness to provoke comparison and arouse a fresh interest in one of Botticelli's less known followers. As in the "Assumption" by Botticelli in the National Gallery, which is notable for the beauty of its landscape background, and in the Botticini tondo the landscape is a conspicuous feature of the composition. Another work in which it is even more interesting to trace artistic descent from Botticelli is the "Virgin and Child, with St. John and Two Angels," of Raffaellino del Garbo, less colloquially known as Capponi. This artist was not a pupil of Botticelli, but only of Filippino Lippi, who worked in Sandro's bottega. Yet the influence of the master is unmistakable in type, in composition, and, to a certain degree, in color, the individuality of the painter being displayed chiefly in a suavity of sentiment that differs from Botticelli's tenderness, and allies him with Raphael or Bernardino Luini.

The last-named master is amply represented, principally by the series of small panels illustrating the history of three martyrs—SS. Sicinio, Martino, and Alesandro. Then we find an "Intercession" by Cosimo Rosselli, a "Susanna" by Lorenzo Lotto, two compositions and a man's portrait by John Bellini, and many "ascriptions" that are likely to employ critical tongues for some time to come. It may be a personal fancy, but it seemed to us that in the matter of ascriptions a greater care than usual had been exercised. Certainly it was a commendable cautiousness that declined to label Mr. George Bradley's "Judith and Holophernes," in the second gallery, even with the name of a school, for this extraordinary work combines with much of the sombreness and mystery of the Spanish school traces of Venetian coloring, and high lights dashed on with the bravura of a modern impressionist. It is one of the artistic puzzles of the exhibition. Mr. Laurie Frere's early Velasquez, "Our Lady of the Immaculate Conception," is another—in a different sense. For this picture is clearly one that is recorded by Justi as having been acquired at Seville at the beginning of the nineteenth century by J. Hookham Frere, the British Minister at Madrid, but which was pronounced "untraceable" by so painstaking a Velasquez student as Señor A. de Beruete, owing to its having recently passed out of the possession of the Frere family! Has it, then, returned again to Mr. Frere's family? It would appear so. As a work of art, it is perhaps more interesting than beautiful—a Murillo subject with all the hardness of Velasquez's first manner, instead of the vaporous softness of the younger artist's maturity—a curiously materialised Murillo. The later Venetian masters are well represented in this gallery by a modest-sized, but beautiful, "Entombment" by Tintoretto, a sketch of the Louvre "Susanna and the Elders" by Veronese, and three Titians, of which only one, "The Daughter of Herodias," is claimed to be other than hypothetical.

For the British School and for the best of the Van Dycks one must look to the third and fourth galleries. Here, again, the note struck is one of reputable average rather than startling brilliance, of the typical rather than the best. Recent Academy winter exhibitions have produced a deluge of Reynoldses, Romneys, Gainsboroughs, Turners, Hogarths, Raeburns; and, since the number of best is limited, and repetition is, if possible, to be avoided, one is not surprised to find here works by these masters that are content to do them justice and not much more. Of the twelve Reynoldses the most interesting, because the most intimate, examples are the small portrait of the painter, executed seemingly at an earlier age than either of the portraits in the National Gallery, and the unfinished study of the Countess Spencer and her daughter Georgiana, afterwards Duchess of Devonshire. The large picture of the Beaumont family, significant of the painter's real skill in grouping figures on a grand scale, is the most important Romney; the rich-colored Gainsborough "Landscape" in the fourth gallery makes more appeal than any of the large portraits, though one must not omit a reference to the imposing "Sir Charles Morgan"; a middle-period "Sheerness," and a last period Venetian picture are sufficient to quote of Turner; and, of Hogarth, "The Lady's Last Stake" is the best-known of three pictures that represent both the virtues and failings of his genius. The Raeburns are rather apart. There is the fine "Sir John Sinclair," which the catalogue informs us was painted about 1790, but which, according to Mr. James Caw, a well-known authority, should be dated five years later. The beautifully lighted portrait group of "Sir John and Lady Clerk" was painted in 1790, and it is only necessary to compare the two pictures to be convinced of the development in style that took place between these dates. The "Sir John Sinclair" is of a piece with Van Dyck's equestrian portrait of the Duke d'Arenberg, which hangs at the far end of the large gallery, in the domain of heroic portraiture.

If it was not necessary to include John Russell, R.A., in the distinguished company of this room—he is represented by a portrait of Miss Chambers, which evidences a conscientious compromise between a Reynolds and a Romney—no one will quarrel with the portrait group by Jordaens, a Fleming who until a few years ago was totally neglected in this country. Even more typical of this painter is the magnificent "King of Twelfth Night," one of the "Epiphany" pictures that one finds in profusion in the Belgian galleries. Located in Gallery V., this particular example is one of a very miscellaneous collection indeed. It confronts an exquisite little Lancet, the "Portrait of a Little Girl," a less exquisite Greuze, and a Van Loo picture of the Pompadour, of meretricious brightness; its robustness is oddly at variance with the sentimentalities of a Vigée Le Brun and an Angelica Kauffmann; and Nathaniel Dance, represented by a portrait of Mrs. Wheeler, and George Barret are hardly less poignant contrasts to this sturdy follower of Rubens. Which reminds us that there are four Rubenses in the collection, though nothing of much note. The Dutch pictures, which include some German and Flemish, are housed mainly in the water-color room. We find here a brilliant Hals in the Portrait of Hille-Bobbe, the famous fish-wife of Haarlem; a "Portrait of a Man," ascribed to Rembrandt; a "Portrait of Jane Lane," by Sir Peter Lely, which is of historical interest; a very dainty interior group of "A Lady and Gentleman," by Terburg; a "River Scene," by Jan van Goyen, eloquent in its brown and grey harmonies, and suggestive of the power of a strictly limited palette; and a likely Hans Holbein in the portrait of Mrs. Anne Roper. We have no space for particularising the Tenierses and Wouvermans, van der Velde, van der Capelles, De Hooghes, Maesses, and others that stand for the big names in Dutch art; neither can we do more than refer in the briefest manner to the works of the late E. J. Gregory, which, in accordance with the custom followed by the Academy of so honoring its recently deceased members, have been gathered together in the Black and White room. We may say, however, that the vivacious handling of some of the artist's earlier efforts may surprise those who only remember him as the painstaking painter of precise genre at the Academy, the Institute, and elsewhere, and that the exhibition does justice to his undoubted skill as a water-colorist.

Letters from Abroad.

THE "INSURGENT" MOVEMENT IN THE UNITED STATES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your Tory champions, in support of their argument for a tariff instead of a land tax, keep citing the United States as a country flourishing under Protectionism, and they imply that this prosperity is so pronounced that Protectionism must be permanent there.

Neither the so-called fact nor the implication is true. The contrary may be seen by the most cursory glance. Protectionism bears such evil fruits that a very active movement in the Republican Party—the party of Protection—threatens either strongly to modify the policy of that organisation and force marked changes in the law, or else to rend and destroy the organisation and make new party lines. This is known as the "insurgent" movement.

To make the matter clear, it should be explained that President Cleveland, the first Democratic President after the Civil War, struck the first heavy blow against what might be called modern Protectionism by a message to Congress in 1887. During the four years just preceding the war, the tariff had been cut very low—to about 19 per cent. It was a period of great industrial and commercial prosperity for the country. But the necessities for extraordinary revenues during the life and death struggle of the Republic soon after brought heavy tariff duties, and the chief beneficiaries got control of the machinery of a party which could claim at the close of the war that it had put down the rebellion and had destroyed chattel slavery. By flapping the "old flag" and shaking the "bloody shirt," the Republican Party could carry presidential elections, and its managers could get what they liked at Washington. And what they liked chiefly were higher and higher tariffs.

But in 1884, in the arrogance of their power, these managers put up for the Presidency a man with a scandalous reputation in public affairs—James G. Blaine. He was beaten by a bolt of Republicans to the Democratic candidate, Grover Cleveland, who, largely owing to a factional quarrel in New York State, had been elected to the Governorship there by a very large vote the year before.

President Cleveland's most notable act in the White House was his brief, direct, and vigorous message to Congress against the high tariff. In doing this he courted the enmity of the small, but, at that time, powerful Protectionist wing of his party, which had its chief strength in coal and iron Pennsylvania, under the leadership of Samuel Randall and "Pig-Iron" Kelly. Despite the efforts of Randall and Kelly, the Mills' Bill, making the practically insignificant reduction of 4 per cent. in the tariff, was got through the House of Representatives, but was held up in the pro-tariff Republican Senate. Hard upon that came the national elections, and the Democrats, unable to get themselves into line in so short a time, lost both the House of Representatives and the Presidency, Mr. Cleveland being the nominee of his party for re-election.

The Protection rings and monopolies, again having the Presidency and both branches of Congress, repaid themselves for the scare Mr. Cleveland had given them. They passed the McKinley Bill, which sent the tariff a number of pegs higher. But this, instead of smothering the anti-tariff sentiment, only inflamed it; so that the Democratic Party lined up enthusiastically behind the tariff issue in the Presidential fight of 1892. The Radical, tariff-abolishing wing of that party showed the greatest educational activity in the history of the country, one feature being the circulation of one and a-quarter million copies of a cheap edition of my father's book, "Protection or Free Trade?"

Mr. Cleveland, now a third-time candidate for the Presidency, was elected triumphantly. The Democrats also carried the House in Congress, McKinley, father of the reprobated McKinley Bill, and many of the other Republicans active in the passage of that measure, being beaten, and Democrats sent from their districts.

But although the campaign had thus unmistakably been fought and won on the tariff issue, Mr. Cleveland, on taking office, deliberately chose to raise another question. After naming the members of his Cabinet, his first official act was to call a special session of Congress to amend the currency laws, which, he said, were the primary cause of the checked production and depression in business from which the country was at that time suffering, although the country itself had emphatically declared, by electing him, that the chief cause was the high tariff.

If Mr. Cleveland had studied the wishes of the Protection interests, he could not have acted more to their liking. The anti-tariff proposals had drawn and held his party together; the currency question immediately smashed it to flinders. The West was for silver; the East for gold. The tariff-reducing Wilson Bill, which the Democratic House, following the currency legislation, put through, was emasculated by the hold-over pro-tariff Senate. The country's attention had been shifted from the tariff to the currency, and the tariff interests could have their way. Under the currency and other stalking horses, they not only beat Mr. Bryan, who led the Democratic Party in three successive Presidential fights, but they put two new layers on top of the high McKinley wall—the Dingley Bill and the Payne Bill. The Payne Bill, however, was got through by a trick, and in face of a serious insurrection in the Republican Party, for the day of protest had arrived.

The insurrectionists were mainly from the trans-Mississippi River country. They represented the great farmer element, which was beginning to realise how it was being fooled. It was being compelled by the tariff to pay more and more for clothes, machinery, and practically all the things it had to buy, while it got no benefit whatever. True, the tariff managers, with sublime impudence, went through the form of "protecting" the farmers, and for a long time actually did hoodwink them. High duties were put on wheat, corn, rye, oats, barley, potatoes, butter, eggs, milk, cattle, horses, hogs, wool, and everything else the farmer produced. They were told, and for a time appeared to believe, that but for such duties, foreign farm animals and produce would pour in and destroy them. Yet the fact was that, with the exception of wool, the United States had been a tremendous exporter of all these things. It has, since 1890, exported annually more than $150,000,000 worth of wheat and flour alone.

But when the Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, and other farmers through the great corn belt asked for a reduction of the tariff on the things that they had to buy, and found themselves tricked by the Payne Bill, which put the tariff further up, instead of down, the insurrection in their section of the Republican Party became indeed serious. They were not prepared actually to break away from the party, but a number of their representatives at Washington, at a special session of the new Congress—a session called by President Taft after his inauguration, to amend the tariff downward—entered upon an understanding with the Democratic caucus to change the rules of the House so as to take the Tsar-like power out of the hands of the Speaker—and, behind the Speaker, of the monopoly interests—and to vest that power in the House itself.

These insurgent votes, with the Democratic votes, would have overcome the Republican majority in that body. But the alert monopolies, seeing the menace to their rule, made reprisals. By exercise of their subtle craft, they induced most of the Democratic members from the cities of New York, Chicago, and Boston to desert when the balloting came, and to vote with the regular Republicans. In this way the House rules, which were, at bottom, for the use and benefit of the monopolies, were re-adopted, and things went on monopolywards as before.

But many signs indicate that this will continue only for a brief season. Collisions between the regulars and the insurgents have occurred in this new session over resolutions to institute an inquiry into the increasing cost of living. It is certain that there will be bitter fights this fall in the Republican primaries and at the polls over the tariff issue; while as sure signs are given that the Democratic members who sold the pass in the rules fight will be called to account by their aroused and angered party. The war on the monstrous American tariff is on.—Yours, &c.,

HENRY GEORGE, JUN.

Communications.

THE TROUBLES OF A SOCIALIST ELECTOR.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The melancholy uncertainty of Free Trade Unionists as to how they should influence the coming election has a pathetic interest for me, as a Socialist, owing to the astonishing developments in Socialist tactics during the past few weeks.

My dilemma is this. I am a keen politician, holding a profound conviction of the necessity of Socialism as a cure for poverty. On the other hand, my confidence in the Socialist leaders has been rudely shaken in latter months. The Social Democratic Party has preached opposition to Liberals and Tories, or abstention from support of either party. Now, Mr. H. Quelch, at Northampton, has seemingly reversed that policy, and some modus vivendi has been arrived at with the Liberals. The Social Democrats have usually argued that Liberal Governments and Tory Governments were equally bad; it was a case, as the Spaniards say, of "Los mismos ferros con diferentes collares." This intelligible but unintelligent policy has at last been abandoned, but no explanation has been offered.

Next, Mr. Robert Blatchford has produced his programme as a Cabinet Minister. This programme has earned the astonished approval of the Duchess of Somerset (another Socialist?) among other eminent persons. It demands £50,000,000 for the Navy, when poor Mr. Lloyd George cannot get enough for the eight that won't wait; a Compulsory Service Bill, which will cost another twelve millions; a Bill for military training of all schoolboys over ten years, which would involve an expenditure of at least three millions per annum; a large increase in Secret Service expenditure—say a million; Protection and an anti-foreign employment agitation. These suggestions would fasten on England an additional £75,000,000, at the lowest estimate, of unproductive expenditure. All this money would be an economic drain on the trade and resources of the country.

The argument for compulsory service is apparently founded upon some ocular comparison between the well-fed appearance of soldiers and the miserable state of unemployed workmen. This line of reasoning is worth developing. The Duchess of Somerset's footmen look much more prosperous than unemployed workmen. Why not a "compulsory service as footmen Bill," compelling all working men to serve two years as footmen, so as to teach them obedience and civility, two qualities in which the working classes are seriously deficient?

The "Clarion" has vigorously denounced any rapprochement between the Liberals and Socialists. Will my friend, Mr. Grayson, tell me why it is a crime to support the Budget, but not a crime to stand on Lord Northcliffe's paper platform? My nominal leader, the only one for whom I have any political respect, Mr. H. M. Hyndman, has attacked the Budget as a sham. His "panic" exhibition, in 1908, when he competed with Mr. Blatchford in working up a Jingo unrest, was as bad as Mr. Blatchford's. Mr. Hyndman also regards the anti-Lords campaign as a dishonest move to confuse the issue.

The Labor Party and the I.L.P. afford me no refuge. I belong to the Fourth Estate, and, therefore, I am that scorned person in those parties—"a middle-class intellectual." I am useful as a subscriber to election funds, perhaps, judging by the appeals for subscriptions lying before me on the table; but, otherwise, the place assigned me is outside the gates which lead to the sacrosanct council chamber of Mr. Keir Hardie, Mr. Ramsay Macdonald, and Mr. A. Henderson. In any event, the atmosphere of such a council chamber would hardly suit one who is proud of a somewhat independent spirit.

The Socialists urge me not to aid the Liberals. Yet I cannot join in the quartet, playing in varying notes from fortissimo to dolce, of Jingoists and conscriptionists like Mr. Blatchford, Mr. Hyndman, Mr. Quelch, and Mr. Victor Grayson.

The I.L.P. would permit me to help them on the admirable principle of "Heads we win; tails you lose"; but that is a bargain into which my self-respect and sense of self-preservation forbid me to enter.

Ah! but there is the Fabian Castle [The Fabian Society has gone straight against the Lords.—Ed., NATION], that stronghold of intellectuals. Alas! this castle is a castle in the air. What remains of the Fabian Society has become a branch of the Women's Social and Political Union. The resourceful energies of the male section of the Fabian Society have been swallowed up in the Committee to Break up the Poor Law. Neither of those movements can command a support which was gladly given in the better days of the Fabian Society. The husk of the Fabian Society is a remainder of some interesting hard nuts, just as the ruins of Carthage make one reflect on the decaying influences of Time.

There remains the brilliant figure of Mr. G. Bernard Shaw. Much as I revere him personally, I cannot follow him. It is impossible. Have any of your readers tried to catch a will-o'-the-wisp? It is the easiest of tasks when compared with the hopeless pursuit of a political Bernard Shaw. Politics are the science of practical affairs. My agility, mental and physical, cannot cope with the political jugglery of Mr. Bernard Shaw, so mental and physical weariness has forced me to abandon any part in his energetic game of political hare-and-hounds.

According to Mr. Blatchford, Socialism has ceased to stand for the nationalisation of the means of production; but Socialism represents conscription, vast naval armaments, Protection and fiscal warfare, an Anglo-German conflict, conscription for children, and an alliance with Lord Northcliffe. The I.L.P. and Labor Party are out for the rights of labor. That is a just claim; but their domination by mere labor ideals of a class character excludes them from the realm of my active sympathies.

One fact is clear in all this tangle. Conscription and Protection are most powerful obstacles to any industrial and humane reforms in those States which have already submitted themselves to the Trust or Kartel and Militarism. These two schemes cannot advantage the industrial classes or the liberal humanists in England.

Why not vote for the Liberal candidates? I am a plural voter. Here is the difficulty. To my mind, it is absurd to call the Budget a Socialist Budget. It is a financial advance necessitated by the growth of expenditure and the fall in certain kinds of revenue. The Socialists and Liberals are still far apart. English Socialism is much nearer to commercial Toryism than to Liberal humanism. The Socialist societies are controlled by political bureaucrats. Whether the bureaucrat be Mr. Sidney Webb, Mr. Bernard Shaw, Mr. Keir Hardie, Mr. A. Henderson, Mr. Hyndman, Mr. Quelch, or Mr. Blatchford matters not. They are the top dogs, and there they intend to stay, and who will say them nay?

Yet there is a long catalogue of Liberal misdeeds which make me somewhat lukewarm towards them. The Denshawai and Natal executions and floggings were very bad. The Egyptian and Indian political deportations may be precedents for political deportations in England. At any rate, the principle of injustice is the same. The handling of the woman suffrage agitation has been ludicrously tactless and injurious. The "indeterminate sentence" strikes at every human right; it is a complete upsetting of the balance of "the social contract." The trend of foreign policy has been bad without redemption. The Licensing Bill had the trail of Puritanism over it.

To be balanced against this Socialist criticism is the large number of excellent reforms, such as the Trades Disputes Act, Old Age Pensions Act, the Patents Act, the Indian Councils Act, the Housing Act, the Criminal Appeal Act, the Labor Exchanges Act, the Workmen's Compensation Act, the Trade Boards Act, parts of the Children's Act, the Development Act, the Irish Land and Universities Acts, and many other measures. To this fine record has to be added the social increment of the Budget.

On the whole, I hold that Socialists might vote for the Liberals at this crisis; but ought Socialists to help, either financially or personally, Liberal candidatures? I cannot conscientiously support the Socialists, whose Socialism when scratched reveals itself as Militarism and Jingoism (or the Labor and I.L.P. Parties, who have merely the class interests of their clients at heart), against the Liberals. After much mental tribulation, such has been my conclusion. The one question remaining—and upon this I sorely need enlightenment—is, can I assist the Liberals as against the Socialists apart from mere voting; that is to say, ought I to aid the Liberals, financially and personally, giving to them what I should have offered, under ordinary circumstances, to the Socialists? Or must I join Lord Balfour of Burleigh (to keep strange company) in his flight to the woods?—Yours, &c.,

SADLY PERPLEXED.

December 26th, 1909.

Letters to the Editor.

THE DEEPER CRISIS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Setting aside the practical, is it not true that the theoretical difference between the great opposing measures of Free Trade and Protection is, in reality, the difference between two fundamental points of view—between two opposing conceptions, held by Englishmen, of themselves and their destiny?

Given the "Insular view," from which the Empire is seen as a glorified island, independent, self-sufficing, then Protection follows, logically enough, a matter of expediency or in expediency merely. But, given the deeper "Imperial" view, from which the island that has grown of its vitality to be an Empire is seen an Empire still, but an Empire of world service rather than that of world ownership, then Protection is impossible, and Free Trade an inevitable condition of life and work.

For what does "Empire" mean? What do might, majesty, dominion, and power mean but responsibility? And responsibility implies service.

Cannot the Englishman, who turns in his fear to Protection, see that he comes near to selling his birthright? Cannot he see that the process of utilising our markets, unchecked, by the traders of the world, is, in truth, part of the same process as the utilising of our blood, our brains, our language, our laws, by the races of the world, the result of which process has been the formation of the Empire?

The Free Trader who declaims that his country is different from other countries is not too far from the truth. Where he fails so often is in the true differentiating. He does not recognise that the measure of his country's trade is not the measure of the nation's prosperity, but of its vitality. And this vitality, unchecked and at no premium, is the English quality, on which other nations have traded for centuries. Seen from this point of view, Protection means the protecting ourselves against the natural results of our manner of life and work, and Free Trade, not a piece of idealism accidentally stumbled upon, but an inevitable condition of our development, as inevitable as the free giving of our life and strength and work throughout the world.

Protection implies enmity. Through the years of this century perhaps, men will gradually realise that enmity and jealousy between nations avail nothing, that neither successful arms nor successful tariffs constitute "power" in a nation, but rather its innate vitality, its power of taking responsibility, of doing work. Protection is needful for weakness, for old age, but for a grown nation, with eyes not blind to the future of the world, it is an anachronism.

I write as one of an unpolitical class. If this view appears rather transcendental, to emphasise it can do no harm at a time when political parties throw dust between each other and go to the people with promises of material gains and little more. Also, I cannot think that the consideration of the spiritual can detract from the efficiency of the practical side, in any question.

One of George Meredith's heroes had a great "Idea" that recurred to him on the night of a large political meeting where he was about to speak. It was this: "The English have power to rise to spiritual ascendancy, and be once more the islanders heading the world of a new epoch abjuring materialism."

Is there no Parliamentary candidate who, on this ground, will complete the great speech that Victor Radnor left undelivered.—Yours, &c.,

H. BAGENAL.

3, Moris Garden, Cheyne Walk.

December 30th, 1909.

THE TIME FOR PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The time seems to have now come when in all seriousness we should put some of our religious theorisings to the test. We have read and we have repeated the words of the Master often enough. But have we, until now, been confronted with the chance of putting them into practice? The words I particularly refer to are "How hardly shall they that have riches enter the kingdom of God," and, again, "It is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom." For the sake of these words, many a man has laid aside his wealth. Yet his distribution of superfluity has often failed to justify his action. But here and now there can be no mistake.

The operation of the Budget, while it may absorb certain superfluities of income, will, as unquestionably, apply the money thus obtained to purposes which are, without any possibility of contradiction, for the benefit of the country to which we belong, and the people who dwell therein. How often and often has the pulpit declaimed against the false Christianity which has prevailed and is prevailing. How often with half-hearted earnestness have we longed with Lessing, after "two thousand years of Christianity, for a hundred years of the Master Himself." Now is our chance. For once, we have had a Government in which and by which Labor and the workers have been more or less fairly represented.

After all, where does our wealth come from? No one can deny the fact that the poor man is the foundation stone of all our wealth, of our social fabric itself. It is time that his voice were heard, and his way smoothed, and the awful uncertainty of his living removed, once and for all. We have prayed with countless reiteration, "Give us this day our daily bread." It is a prayer that falls idly on the ears of one who has a thousand a year. It is a very real prayer for one who has to earn that daily bread and support wife and children as well. The disparity between rich and poor, between the "us" and "you" of the story of Dives and Lazarus is too awful a gulf to contemplate with equanimity.

This Budget promises a way out. It will not bring in a millennium, it will not heal the sores of a thousand years of civilisation so-called. But I believe it is a step in the right direction. Therefore, as we voted for Mr. Gladstone in 1880, let us vote for Mr. Asquith to-day, and let us heartily wish God-speed to Mr. Lloyd George and his Budget.—Yours, &c.,

F. G. MONTAGU POWELL

(late Vicar of Pembroke Dock, S. Wales).

Foxlease, Southbourne,
January 4th, 1910.

SHOOTING A TAME STAG.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In "The Times" and other newspapers of December 17th last, there is reported a case of "shooting a tame stag," which came before the County Court at Salisbury on the previous day. In that case the defendants were sued for damages for shooting a stag which had escaped from the plaintiff's park, and it was argued for the defence that this stag, "being a wild animal, was the property of the original owner only so long as he held possession," and, further, "that gentlemen in the exercise of sporting rights were justified in shooting it"; and I opine that had the deer in question been an animal ferae naturae this contention would have prevailed (see the case of Threlkeld v. Smith, L.R., 1901, 2 K.B., 531). The plaintiff's counsel, however, argued that the stag, having been brought up by hand from birth, was not a wild animal, but was "the absolute property of the owner"; and of this opinion, it appears, was the judge, who awarded damages to the plaintiff.

Now, sir, it occurs to me to ask, what would have been the position if some evil-disposed person had cruelly ill-treated this stag after its escape from the plaintiff's park? The Acts for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals protect "domestic" animals only, and, according to the best legal opinion, deer, even when home-bred, and carefully tended from birth, in park or paddock, so that they have ceased to be animals ferae naturae, are, nevertheless, not "domestic" animals in the eye of the law. In fact, this stag seems to have been in just the same position as the animals habitually employed in the hunt of the carted deer, of which the recent case at Cambridge has given the public such an illuminating example. Therefore, I presume that the cruel treatment of such an animal could not be made the ground of a prosecution, unless the case fell within the provisions of the Wild Animals in Captivity Act, 1900. But, in the present instance, the stag was not "in captivity or close confinement," and, therefore, that Act was inapplicable. It seems, therefore, that the Acts would have afforded him no protection at all. He is neither a "wild" nor a "domestic" animal, but a miserable tertium quid.

But here another question arises. The hunters of carted deer claim that the "stags" which they hunt are animals ferae naturae. If so, may I not lawfully kill one of these deer, should it come on my land, or capture and refuse to surrender it? For if these animals are "wild," they are not the subject of property. If they be not "wild," then, seeing that they are not "domestic" animals, we must say that the stag-hunter's beast of chase is a tame animal, which is his "absolute property," but which, nevertheless, is not protected against cruelty by the Acts of 1849 and 1854.

If such, really, be the law of the land, I venture to think that the law sins both against humanity and common sense, and merits a worse epithet than that bestowed upon it by Mr. Bumble.—Yours, &c.,

G. G. GREENWOOD.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF CONVERSION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have read with great interest the article by Mr. Sidney Low in the current number of THE NATION. I have not yet had the pleasure of reading Mr. Harold Begbie's book, of which the article in question is a criticism, but as stated in your editorial note, both book and criticism raise many points of real interest and importance. Mr. Sidney Low wisely points out that the observed phenomena of conversion are not only common to almost all forms of religious belief, but are also in parallel with similar phenomena obtained by accredited practitioners in Hypnotism, Suggestion, and the many varied cults of Mental Healing. On further inquiry into these phenomena one is at once struck by the fact that similar results are obtained from widely different causes, and one is led to inquire whether there is not in every case some common factor which determines the result. It is considered by most psychologists that the common factor can be found in one definite attribute of all human minds, Suggestibility. In normal states of mental equilibrium the Suggestibility of any individual, i.e., his reaction to the stimuli of his environment, is to a very large extent under the control of his reasoning and critical faculties; but in most individuals states of increased Suggestibility can be induced by a variety of methods, in which the response to the stimuli of environment is contrary to, or in excess of, the normal response which would be obtained in normal conditions. In conversion a state of increased Suggestibility is induced by the appeal to the emotions, just as the hypnotist induces similar states by passes, fixed gazing, and suggestions of sleep. In both cases a similar result is obtained, the suggested idea is received and acted upon, although the actions, determined by the reception of the suggestion, may be contrary to all former experience of the individual. From the point of view of the social or religious worker, it is all important that he should realise that the immediate results of conversion, equally with the immediate results of suggestion given during hypnotic trance, do not depend upon the inherent truth of the suggested ideas, but upon the abnormal receptivity of the mind acted upon. For the effects of conversion to be permanent, a reasoned willing acceptance of the suggested ideas must confirm the change induced during a state of abnormal mental activity; the suggested ideas will otherwise cease to become determining factors in the life of the individual. I am at one with Mr. Sidney Low in believing that the applications of conversion as a means of moral regeneration are limited, in the great majority of individuals the appeal to the emotions fails to elicit the necessary response.

In treatment by Suggestion the field of usefulness has no such limitations. The mode of producing the state of increased Suggestibility is on entirely different lines, and in almost any normally constituted individual some result, some acceptance of the suggested idea can be obtained. Mr. Sidney Low leads one to infer that because Professor Charcot's successes were mainly obtained in hysterical women, the field of Suggestive Therapeutics is therefore limited to hysterical and neurotic subjects; for the past twenty-five years all psychologists who have devoted any attention to the study of hypnotic phenomena have discarded Professor Charcot's work in this domain, his deductions are realised to be fallacious for the very reason that his experiments were confined to a few hysterical subjects.

The development of present-day theories was initiated by the Nancy School, and it is now generally recognised that states of increased Suggestibility can be induced in a very large percentage of normal individuals. Mr. Sidney Low holds that we may believe in miracles, but ought not to expect them. The study of the psychology of conversion comes into the domain of Psycho-Therapeutics, and in this domain I hold that one may not only believe in miracles, but also expect them. One may confidently expect results which, in the present state of our knowledge, are apparently out of proportion to the means employed. Theories of Suggestibility and of the influence of the Subconscious Mind give one the best working hypothesis by which we can explain these apparently miraculous results, but we have not yet passed beyond the domain of theory, and are still far from a full knowledge of the limitations of the power of Suggestion or of the power of the Subconscious Mind. Any inquiry into the psychology of Suggestion is of very real interest beyond that of its therapeutic uses; a wider knowledge of the subject will give to every one a deeper insight into his own mentality, and will open out possibilities of a very real power within himself. The present restricted use of suggestion as a therapeutic agent and as a means of mental and moral regeneration is due not so much to its limited field of application, as to a lack of knowledge of its power, and a deep-seated prejudice against any unbiassed inquiry into the domain of psychic phenomena.—Yours, &c.,

MAURICE B. WRIGHT, M.D.

33, Wimpole Street, London,
January 7th, 1910.

ENGLAND AND GERMANY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am very loath to intervene in the sphere of party politics; but the circulation, gratis, for electioneering purposes, of Mr. Robert Blatchford's articles in the "Daily Mail," now published in pamphlet form for 1d., induces me to offer one or two observations.

I pass over the technical points respecting the relative strength of the two navies of Great Britain and Germany and the building power of the two nations; for these topics have been sufficiently dealt with by the officials responsible for the state of the Navy, who know the actual situation far better than any outsider can do. Further, several of Mr. Blatchford's statements tend to refute his main thesis, as when he says, "the Pan-Germans menace the honor and the liberty of the British, and the French, and the Danish, and the Dutch. All Europe is to be Teutonised." Surely such a mad scheme, if it exists, may be left to work out its own destruction. All Europe will unite to crush the Power which makes the attempt. Again, when Mr. Blatchford says, "Germany is hungry for trade and for influence in distant seas; Britain holds fortresses and coaling stations all over the earth," does he not see that the possession of these fortresses and coaling stations by us, and the want of them as felt by Germany, confer on us an enormous advantage in naval affairs over our rival?

In truth, Mr. Blatchford admits that Germany's naval position, considered strategically, is weak; for in Article VI. ("Armageddon") he states that "the problem of British defence is the defence of France"; and he implies that Germany cannot well attack us until Holland, Belgium, and the North of France are in her power. According to Mr. Blatchford, this is the heart of the problem of British defence. In the same article he skims very lightly over the fact that, in that case, "Russia, France's ally, might attack Germany on the Eastern frontier." But he unfolds to our enthralled vision the following portent:—"Then if Austria and Italy came in we should have Armageddon." Finally he pictures a German Empire embracing "Holland, Belgium, Austria, and perhaps Turkey, and having ports and fortresses at Calais, Cherbourg, Trieste, Antwerp, and Amsterdam." He concludes that the British Empire would then go under. And well it might.

Let us examine this forecast in the light of recent history. By the Franco-Russian Treaty of 1895, which has since been renewed, Russia and France bound themselves by a solemn compact that each would come to the assistance of the other, with the whole of its military and naval forces, in case that ally were attacked. It is therefore not the case that Russia might attack Germany, if the latter assailed France. In such an eventuality Russia must in honor attack Germany. Further, even if that compact were not binding, she would most certainly act in the same way; for her people, who dislike or fear the Pan-Germans as much as Mr. Blatchford does, would not stand still and see Europe "Teutonised."

Take Mr. Blatchford's next sentence. In his Armageddon he figures both Austria and Italy taking the side of Kaiser Wilhelm. This is an impossibility. Italy (ever mindful of the days of Garibaldi and Palmerston) would be far more likely to take sides against the two German Powers than with them. Moreover, the Austro-German compact, which is the only solid part of the Triple Alliance, is purely of a defensive character. Therefore, if Germany sought to crush France, Austria would not be obliged to draw the sword. Here, again, self-interest tends to reinforce treaty obligations. Patriotic subjects of Franz Joseph (least of all the Hungarians) do not wish to see their Empire annexed, either altogether, or in part, to Germany.

We are now in a position to be able to reconstruct Mr. Blatchford's Armageddon. Instead of Germany walking over the French without let or hindrance, she will be assailed on her weakest frontier by an army fully as large as her own, that of Russia. The attitude of Austria would be problematical. Thus, if Germany sought to acquire the northern dockyards of France, as naval bases far better than those which she now possesses, she would court ruin from a conflict with three great Powers, each of which is nearly her equal in strength. Certainly on the sea she would be at once overwhelmed.

In point of fact, England's position has been enormously strengthened during the past five years. Thanks to the late Prime Minister, South Africa is no longer a menace to the stability of our Empire. The entente cordiale with France releases us from all fear of hostility from a Power which, as Mr. Blatchford sees, could assail us with far more advantage than Germany can. Our good understanding with Russia is another diplomatic success, no less hopeful for us than disquieting to Germany. If Kaiser Wilhelm has always aimed at our destruction, why did he not seize the opportunity afforded by the early disasters of the Boer War? During the last ten years all has changed. At that time we were isolated. Now it is Germany that lacks outside support; for the help of Austria must always be uncertain. In truth, sir, British diplomacy has of late been almost too successful; so that, if any Power need to feel nervous for the future, it is Germany, almost isolated as she is, and weighed down by financial burdens which she can scarcely bear. The German nation needs to be re-assured, not threatened.

On one point I completely agree with Mr. Blatchford: that our coast defences need strengthening, especially on the east. A long study of modern wars has convinced me that the theories of the "Blue Water School" are a dangerous delusion. England needs a second line of defence behind her fleet; for the fleet may often be called away on needful operations, and the vital points on our coast need to be safeguarded during its absence. Thanks to numerous scares, John Bull is becoming a nervous creature and wants to see certain important points, especially on the East Coast, secured against raids. Further, forts do not threaten Germany, while the multiplication of "Dreadnoughts" appears to do so. In my judgment the expenditure of the cost of one or two "Dreadnoughts" on coast defences is a matter of urgent importance.—Yours, &c.,

J. HOLLAND ROSE.

January 6th, 1910.

THE ART OF SPENDING.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your admirable article on "The Art of Spending" you say that there is, in your opinion, perhaps only one way of spending money that is worse than indiscriminate giving in the streets, namely, that in which Mr. Kessler wasted his £2,000, and you quote the "Economist" as asking if the Charity Organisation Society has not taught us to do better than that.

As there are many people who think that the C.O.S. has a merely negative policy, of "going to see what Tommy is doing, and telling him he mustn't," may I, as a member of that society, say what we really try to teach? We believe in charity, and, above all things, insist that it should be personal. We are always anxious to meet with persons who will give their time and service to work in its cause. There is so much that might be done if only we had more fellow workers.

But to those who cannot give personal service, we say, "do not give to beggars in the streets"; the better way is to send a contribution to one of the many societies (such as the Society for the Relief of Distress, 78, Jermyn-street, S.W., or the Invalid Children's Aid Association, Denison House, Vauxhall Bridge Road, S.W.), who will use it in trying to prevent people falling into destitution and misery before it is too late.—Yours, &c.,

CLEMENT F. ROGERS

1, Vernon Chambers, Southampton Row, W.C.

January 3rd, 1910.

THE INDIANS IN THE TRANSVAAL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your issue of January 1st, you refer to the interest taken by the Indian Congress in the Transvaal Indian question in the following words: "Meanwhile the exclusion of Indians from the Transvaal continues to evoke intense feeling."

I would beg to be allowed to point out that it is not so much their exclusion from the Transvaal as the manner of effecting that exclusion which has given offence and aroused so much bitterness. An open door to Asiatic immigration is not claimed in respect of the Transvaal or any other Colony. The right to regulate immigration and the character of the would-be immigrants is generally conceded, but the Transvaal, in dealing with Indian immigration, has taken a quite unprecedented step. Other Colonies and Dominions have employed legislation general in its application to all countries and races, thus inflicting no insult upon any particular people. It has been left for the Transvaal colony specifically to class the whole 300 millions of India with paupers, criminals, lepers, procurers, and other undesirables, and to exclude them, irrespective of culture or property qualifications, on the score of their race and color.

If this be the new Imperialism, one may, perhaps, be pardoned for feeling some small concern as to where it will eventually land us.—Yours, &c.,

L. W. RITCH,

Hon. Sec., South Africa British Indian Committee.
5, Pump Court, Temple, E.C.

January 4th, 1910.

ULSTER LIBERAL UNIONISM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The Ulster Liberal Unionist Association has issued its manifesto, in view of the General Election, and it would be well for the electors of Great Britain carefully to study it, and thus see clearly what "forces" are behind this pronouncement "on the most momentous electoral contest since the days of the Revolution Settlement of 1689." In the first place, who are the Ulster Liberal Unionist Association? They are a body of men, formerly Liberals, who are mostly members of the Ulster Reform Club, from which the manifesto is issued. This Club is admittedly non-political, and embraces among its members Liberals, Home Rulers, and Tories. From the walls of this non-political club the portrait of Mr. Gladstone was stealthily removed in 1886, and, at a later date, the portrait of Mr. T. W. Russell, M.P., formerly the most respected member of the club. Within recent years the club has been used for entertaining such pronounced Tories as Lord Londonderry and Mr. Walter Long, M.P.

A few years ago I, as a member, received a printed document from the then President, stating that the club was non-political, and asking me to join the Liberal Unionist Association, which, as a Liberal, I declined to do.

At the same time the Committee was offering for sale to the members pamphlets in favor of Protection, without any attempt to distribute those in favor of Free Trade. A few years ago a discussion on Tariff Reform was held in the Reform Club, and I then publicly accused one of the speakers, whose name is appended to the manifesto, as honorary secretary, of deliberately misrepresenting John Stuart Mill, as being an authority in favor of Protection; and, although Mr. Martin, the gentleman to whom I refer, was then present, he refrained, like Mr. Balfour when charged by Mr. Ure with a false accusation, from offering any apology for the misrepresentation.

I shall not attempt, but leave your readers, to measure the "Liberalism" of the Association by the following statements in their manifesto. "An efficient Second Chamber is a necessary defence against arbitrary, ill-digested, tyrannical legislation of the popular Chamber." "Every professing Unionist who is in favor of the abolition of the Lords' veto is in effect a Home Ruler." "The proposal is really revolutionary. It makes our Second Chamber a sham, and effaces it as a legislative institution." "Instead of our present broad and democratic Constitution, we shall have Single Chamber rule, which, in plain English, means government by the oligarchy called the Cabinet." In one place the manifesto speaks of "the oligarchical Cabinet controlled by a Single Chamber," and in another place of "an irresponsible Single Chamber, dominated by an autocratic, and, it may be, vindictive Cabinet." Again of the Budget it says, "Its effect will be beyond question to render poor men poorer." "The mischievous Socialism of the present Government and its misguided followers."

I hope that this swan-like song of Ulster Liberal Unionism is the precursor of brighter and happier days for Ireland and its people.—Yours, &c.,

S. SHANNON MILLIN.

January 4th, 1910.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—A gentleman who acknowledges his ignorance of the existence of a party (until they are so unfortunate as to incur his wrath, or rouse his jealousy) might hesitate to write of them in terms of wholesale and unqualified abuse, as Mr. Sullivan did recently in your columns. But permit me, in all fairness, briefly to assure your English readers, who do not know the facts, that Irish Liberals do exist, and have no need to seek testimonials of character or intelligence from a new-fledged K.C.

I cannot tell what members of his profession or creed he had in his eye when he wrote, or whether it was from them he drew his large inferences; but of this I am sure, Irish Liberals have a right to expect protection from such an attack in THE NATION.—Yours, &c.,

NONCONFORMIST LIBERAL.

Dublin, December 29th, 1909.

A CASE OF "MALICE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—You demurred to the assertion in my previous letter that the militant suffragists are being pursued with a cold and deliberate malice. A Government which finds itself compelled in the interests of order to imprison its political opponents, will, if it is magnanimous, take care to respect their courage and their personal dignity. It would not inflict physical humiliations. It would not keep them in gaol a day longer than the strict letter of the law required. In dealing with venial offences, it would remember the maxim, "De minimis non curat lex." The refusal of first-class treatment for offenders who used no violence was the first great violation of these principles. Forceful feeding was the second. The special evidences of malice to which I referred were these: (1) That Miss Charlotte Marsh, though she had been forcibly fed for over two months, and though she was suffering (and is still suffering) from pain and weakness, was not allowed the usual advantage of the period of "remission" commonly granted to ordinary offenders; (2) That after an interval of four months, the Home Office expressly ordered the prosecution of Miss Florence Clarkson for breaking window panes valued at 6d., knowing full well that to avenge this infinitesimal injury it was consigning her to prison and all that prison now involves for these women.

I now commend to your notice a third and more recent case. Miss Selina Martin and Miss Leslie Hall, charged at Liverpool with slight acts of disorder which involved no actual assault, were remanded for a week for inquiry, and refused bail. There was no mystery and no need for inquiry; suffragettes always avow what they have done. But, above all, there was no excuse for refusing bail. The authorities have now dealt with about 450 suffragette prisoners. Not one of them has ever escheated her bail. Yet the refusal of bail is now a common occurrence, and when it happened to my own wife and others at Newcastle I was officially informed that it was by the orders of the Home Office. The sequel is even more painful. Miss Martin and Miss Hall, feeling that they had been unjustly used, protested, as the Chartists used to do in similar cases, by smashing their cell windows, and by refusing food. I have seen their own accounts of what followed, written in the police station a week later, while they were waiting for "Black Maria." Miss Martin states that she (an unconvicted prisoner) was dragged to a punishment cell, kept all night in irons, and next day "frog-marched" up a stone staircase to the doctor's room, her head bumping on the steps. She was there forcibly fed, handcuffed, and flung down the stairs once more. Miss Hall was kept in irons for two-and-a-half days. I believe these statements to be true, and I blame the Home Office, because in former cases of special brutality it has omitted to punish the guilty officials. To the authorities of Strangeways Prison (Manchester) where Miss Davison was assaulted in her cell by a fire-hose, it has even addressed a special letter of commendation. I have mentioned the Chartists. But there is a difference. When Thomas Cooper protested in prison by even more violent methods against the refusal of literary facilities, public opinion insisted that the rights of a political prisoner should be respected. Our modern Liberals have forgotten that tradition of generosity.

—Yours, &c.,

H. N. BRAILSFORD.

32, Well Walk, Hampstead,
January 5th, 1910.

[The facts which Mr. Brailsford alleges are disputed. But without going into them, we confess ourselves unable to justify the refusal of bail, though this is not the act of the Home Office, and we would appeal to the authorities to discountenance—as we cannot but think they would discountenance—the slightest approach to vindictiveness or ill-temper on the part of the prison authorities. We regard this as vital.—ED., NATION.]

Our Younger Poets.

I.—W. H. DAVIES.

I.

ANGRY.

My Love sits angry—See!
Her foot shakes in the light;
Her timid, little foot,
That else would hide from sight.

Her left hand props her cheek;
Its little finger plays
Upon her under-lip,
And makes a harp-like noise.

Her lips' red manuscript
She has unrolled and spread;
So I may read ill news,
And hang my guilty head.

My Love sits angry—See!
She's red up to her eyes:
And was her face flogged by
The wings of Butterflies?

Her right hand's in her lap,
So small, so soft, so white:
She in her anger makes
Five fingers hide from sight.

Two golden curls have now
Dropped out of their silk net:
There they must stop, for she
Will not restore them yet.

My Love she is so fair,
When in this angry way,
That did she guess my thoughts,
She'd quarrel every day.

II.

THE KINGFISHER.

It was the Rainbow gave thee birth,
And left thee all her lovely hues;
And, as her mother's name was Tears,
So runs in it thy blood to choose
For haunts the lonely pools, and keep
In company with trees that weep.

Go you and, with such glorious hues,
Live with proud Peacocks in green parks;
On lawns as smooth as shining glass,
Let every feather show its marks;
Get thee on boughs and clap thy wings
Before the windows of proud kings.

Nay, lovely Bird, thou art not vain;
Thou hast no proud, ambitious mind;
I also love a quiet place
That's green, away from all mankind;
A lonely pool, and let a tree
Sigh with her bosom over me.

III.

MAN.

I saw Time running by—
Stop Thief! was all the cry.
I heard a voice say, Peace!
Let this vain clamor cease.
Can ye bring lightning back,
That leaves upon its track
Men, horses, oak trees dead?
Canst bring back Time? it said.
There's nothing in Man's mind
Can catch Time up behind;
In front of that fast Thief
There's no one—end this grief.
Tut, what is Man? How frail!
A grain, a little nail,
The wind, a change of cloth—
A fly can give him death.
Some fishes in the sea
Are born to outlive thee,
And owls, and toads, and trees—
Man is no more than these.
I see Man's face in all
Things, be it great or small;
I see the face of him
In things that fly or swim;
One fate for all, I see—
Whatever that may be.
Imagination fits
Life to a day; though its Length were a thousand years,
'Twould not decrease our fears;
What strikes men cold and dumb
Is that Death's time must come.
Who knows what Life is for?
Some hold it still, with awe;
Some rattle it for noise—
But no man knows its use.

WILLIAM H. DAVIES.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE following is our weekly selection of books which we commend to the notice of our readers:—

"The Liberty of Prophesying." By H. Hensley Henson, B.D. (Macmillan. 6s.)

"Plays, Acting, and Music." By Arthur Symonds. New and Revised Edition. (Constable. 6s. net.)

"Memorials of Old Yorkshire." Edited by T. M. Fallow. (Allen. 15s. net.)

"Recollections." By Washington Gladden. (Constable. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Henry Fielding: A Memoir." By G. M. Godden. (Sampson Low. 10s. 6d. net.)

"Warriors of Old Japan." By Y. T. Ozaki. (Constable. 5s. net.)

"Black Sheep." By Stanley Portal Hyatt. (Laurie. 6s.)

"Garryowen." By H. de Vere Stackpoole. (Unwin. 6s.)

"L'Europe et la Politique Britannique, 1882-1909." Par E. Lémonon. (Paris: Alcan. 10fr.)

* * *

AMONG the new books expected to appear in 1910 will be the "Life of Father Tyrrell," by Miss M. D. Petre. Owing to a large amount of interesting matter derived from correspondents and friends of the late Father Tyrrell, this biography is likely to be of extreme interest. Miss Petre will write, to a certain extent, with authority as to Father Tyrrell's ideas, for she was one of his intimate friends and was appointed by him in his will as his literary executor. Miss Petre has already produced "The Soul's Orbit" (written in collaboration with Father Tyrrell) and "Catholicism and Independence," volumes of essays bearing indirectly on the questions at issue of recent years within the Roman Catholic Communion.

* * *

THERE comes an announcement from America that two volumes of Swinburne's essays are to be published in the near future. One of these will deal with the Elizabethan dramatists—a theme upon which Swinburne always wrote with enthusiasm—while the other will contain some of his uncollected papers, including the "Quarterly Review" article on Dickens and an introduction to "Oliver Twist," written by Swinburne for an American edition of Dickens.

* * *

SOME time ago we mentioned that Mr. Frederic Harrison had almost finished writing his reminiscences. The book is now in the press and will be issued in two volumes by Messrs. Macmillan on October 31st, the day when Mr. Harrison enters his eightieth year.

* * *

IN addition to the books which Messrs. Macmillan have held over from last season—Lord Acton's "Lectures on the French Revolution," the concluding volume of Professor Courthope's "History of English Poetry," Dr. Silvanus Thompson's "Life of Lord Kelvin," and the last two volumes of Mr. Fortescue's "History of the British Army" are the most important of these—their first spring list contains a number of fresh announcements. Under the title of "The Bridling of Pegasus" Mr. Alfred Austin has collected a number of prose papers on poetry, while Sir Norman Lockyer and Miss Winifred Lockyer have collaborated in "Tennyson as a Student and Poet of Nature." Another important work is "The Law and the Prophets," by Professor Westphal of Montauban, which has been translated and adapted by Mr. Clement du Pontet, one of the assistant masters at Harrow.

* * *

TWO new books by Mr. Chesterton appear on the spring lists. His "Life of Thomas Hood" is to be included in the "English Men of Letters" series, and is likely to prove a valuable piece of criticism, for Mr. Chesterton is at his best when writing discursive biography. The other book is called "What is Wrong." It expresses the same general views as "Heretics" and "Orthodoxy."

* * *

WRITERS in search of a biographical subject on which to employ themselves might take a hint from a couple of articles contributed by Mr. W. P. Courtney to recent issues of "Notes and Queries," and give us a book on "George Bubb Dodington and His Literary Circle." Mr. Courtney tells us that Thomson and Young were the two chief poets in Bubb Dodington's friendship, though many of the poets of the day were hospitably entertained at Eastbury. Mr. Courtney does not speak of H. P. Windham, who edited "The Diary of the Late George Bubb Dodington, Baron of Melcombe Regis." Windham rightly describes himself as "a very extraordinary editor," for he says of the "Diary" that, "although it may reflect a considerable degree of honor on his Lordship's abilities, yet, in my opinion, it shows his political conduct (however palliated by the ingenuity of his own pen) to have been wholly directed by the base motives of avarice, vanity, and selfishness." The introducer to the public of a volume of reminiscences is not usually so candid.

* * *

SOME interesting letters of Ibsen are printed in English for the first time in a book called "Speeches and New Letters of Henrik Ibsen," which has just been published in Boston. The first of the speeches was made at Rome in 1865, at the unveiling of a memorial to P. A. Munch, and the last at the festival of the Norwegian Women's Rights League, at Christiania, in 1898. The letters are addressed to Jonas Lie, Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson, Clemens Petersen, Ossip-Lourié, Julius Hoffory, and others. From some of these letters it appears that Ibsen was much more sensitive to criticism than was generally believed.

* * *

THE novels promised for 1910 include Mr. J. C. Snaith's "Fortune," a romance the scene of which is laid in medieval Spain; "The Adventures of Polly," and a novel of English political life by Mr. H. G. Wells; "The Call: A Tale of Two Passions" and "The Portrait" by Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer; "The Undesirable Governess," a story of English country life by the late Mr. Marion Crawford; a long novel by Mr. William de Morgan; and books by Mr. Conrad, Mr. E. V. Lucas, Mr. Barry Pain, Mr. Pett Ridge, Mrs. Mann, and Mr. Belloc.

* * *

ABOUT the middle of the spring season, Mr. Israel Zangwill will bring out a book of essays, called "Italian Fantasies," which he describes as "a joint from which one can cut slices at will." That Mr. Zangwill does not follow the beaten track may be judged from the fact that one of his essays bears the title "Icy Italy."

* * *

MR. H. C. CHATFIELD-TAYLOR, whose biography of Molière won for him the Cross of the Legion of Honor from the French Government, is at work on a biography of "the Italian Molière," Carlo Goldoni. Mr. Chatfield-Taylor has already been decorated by the Italian Government for his services in making Goldoni better known to foreign readers.

* * *

AMERICAN writers on literary history and criticism have a deserved reputation for thoroughness in research, so that many readers will be glad to hear that quite a number of monographs on literary topics are promised from the other side of the Atlantic for the coming season. Mr. Martin G. Brumbaugh, of the University of Pennsylvania, has finished a "Study of the Poetry of John Donne," which will appear through Messrs. Appleton. Dr. Jessopp's book on Donne is mainly concerned with his theology, and, though Mr. Gosse's "Life and Letters of Dr. Donne" contains much sound criticism, there is room for a fresh study of that difficult and artificial, yet attractive, poet.

* * *

FROM the University of Chicago Press we are to have "The Treatment of Nature in English Poetry," by Professor Myra Reynolds. The book is not confined to the subject suggested by the title, since it will include chapters on the art of landscape and on landscape in English portraiture.

* * *

DR. ROBERT M. WERNAER, of Harvard, has written a study of "Romanticism and the Romantic Movement in Germany," which aims at determining the place which romanticism and classicism have in German literature. The book is largely concerned with the historical aspects of the subject, and treats of "Romanticism and Symbolism," "Romantic Irony," "Romantic Conception of Love and Marriage," and similar topics.

Reviews.

THE RE-STATEMENT OF LIBERALISM.*

THE distrust of principle is a familiar pose in this country, and to none is it more familiar than the politician. One type of politician dislikes principle for obvious reasons. Another type, in which we are more interested, reasons somewhat after this fashion: "General principles are all very well as a weapon in argument, but the moment they are taken seriously as foundations of political action they turn out to be hampering and conservative in their tendency. What is valuable at one epoch is worthless and perhaps a positive hindrance at another. Times change, and social needs change with them. What is counted in a progressive party is the ever-living sense of the public good, and the practical perception of the possible lines of progress. We want not theory but practice. The liberty of the individual was a good cry in Cobden's day, but became a barren principle of stagnation to the Liberal of the 'eighties and 'nineties. It is by swallowing such formulas that a party moves forward with the times." To this indictment of principle it may be replied that all the great movements, from the French Revolution onwards, have been made under the direct inspiration of organic social ideas. The Rights of Man, the greatest happiness of the greatest number, the freedom of the individual in politics, in religion, and in commerce, the brotherhood of mankind, not only inspired but gave direction and cohesive force to great political agitations, bound men together in happy solidarity for the achievement of noble objects, and, each in its turn and under its own limitations, moved the world. Can the world be moved without ideas? To this question thinkers like Mr. Hobson reply with a clear negative. For them the thinker is no recluse but a man with a living and practical function. He makes no figure on the platform and is little spoken of in the Press, and he may seem to be dealing with words and themes and abstractions rather than the joys and sorrows of living men and women. In truth, in proportion as he can grope his way towards some of those great underlying conceptions which, once clearly grasped and proclaimed, "make all things new," he is exercising a deeper and more lasting influence on the destinies of the race than the "able editor" who popularises bits of his teaching or the Cabinet Minister who is ultimately destined to embody some fragment of it in a Bill. It is true that the progressive idea of one age is often a worn-out and perhaps an obstructive formula in the next. The greater the need for an apostolic succession of thinking men who will constantly re-state political principles in terms of the living needs of each generation. Liberalism in our day has suffered not more from the lack of a Gladstone than from the lack of a Mill.

The task of Mill is that which Mr. Hobson takes up anew in a spirit worthy of the master. It was Mill's life-work to adapt the Benthamite teaching which had inspired the Radicalism of the 'twenties to the wider thought and enlarged horizon of the early and middle Victorian era. T. H. Green, had he lived, would have continued the work of Mill for the close of the Victorian age. He died, and no one was found to fill the gap. To this lack of thinkers, as much as to the complex social causes which divorced the intellectual classes from progressive sympathies, may be attributed the paralytic condition into which Liberalism fell towards the close of the century. More recent years have seen the beginnings of a reconstruction to which Mr. Hobson's writings have contributed perhaps more than any single intellectual cause. Mr. Hobson, particularly in his volume now before us, takes up a point of view at which what is most ideal in Liberalism and what is most practical in Socialism appear as converging tendencies, and it is on this convergence that the progress of the future must depend. He writes under the impulse of a keen sense of the misery of poverty, the disgrace of destitution in a land overflowing with the milk and honey of wealth, the disorder of competition, the Pharisaism of comfortable beneficence. But he is governed equally by a sense of historic continuity, of the limitation of practical possibilities of reform by the actual structure of industry and of the social order, and by a deep-rooted belief in the solid contribution of the older Liberalism and the value of personal initiative and individual choice. On the side of theory one may almost say that so far from abandoning the old conception of liberty, he makes the adequate definition of liberty the centre of political controversy and the touchstone of development in thought and action. The new conception required to vitalise Liberalism, he tells us at the outset, is "not Socialism in any accredited meaning of that term." It is not a brand new order in which the entire organisation of industry, and perhaps of marriage and the family, is to be taken over by a series of Government departments. No man is more free from the Fabian fallacy of conceiving the regeneration of society as the work of a handful of superior persons ordering the lives of a well-drilled population of lifeless units. "From the standpoint which best presents its continuity with the earlier Liberalism" what is needed "appears as a fuller appreciation and realisation of individual liberty contained in the provision of equal opportunities for self-development." Observe how it is impossible to restore the doctrine of liberty in the fullness which modern experience requires without importing the correlative notion of equality. And there is yet another correlative: "To this individual standpoint must be joined a just apprehension of the social, viz., the insistence that these claims or rights of self-development be adjusted to the sovereignty of social welfare." All this may be taken as a comment on Green's text, that the function of the State is to supply the conditions of freedom, and that true freedom lies in the expansion of the "social personality."

The value of this mode of treatment is that it links the hopes and efforts of the present with the great emancipating movements of the past. The ideas of liberty and equality for which men fought and bled are not dismissed as old-world myths; nor, what is infinitely worse, hardened into formulae obstructive of present progress. They are shown to be still, as ever, the needs of our own time. They have a depth of meaning and value into which we have still to probe. Take a concrete case and see how they were transformed in Mr. Hobson's treatment. The old abstract formula of liberty is content with removing legislative barriers to individual initiative. The poor man is to have his chance. There are to be no hindrances to trade. Well and good, but the conclusion is that if he remains poor and sinks finally into want and destitution it is his own fault, and in the name of personal responsibility he must pay the price. So we get the philosophy of Charity Organisation which Mr. Hobson here submits to a masterly analysis. What is the true measure of liberty, he asks, which the man born to poverty enjoys? How far is it really possible that the mass of the submerged should escape from their limbo? Individuals can do it. Do economic conditions allow that the mass should do it? If the answer is in the negative, as Mr. Hobson insists, and as the facts compel us to believe, what is the line of progress towards true liberty? Not in leaving men to suffer, but in securing conditions, social, economic, educational, which convert liberty from a political abstraction into a reality felt in the actual life of toiling men. The first stage of freedom may be the removal of arbitrary and irrational checks. The full development is a far more complex structure, the final elaboration of which must be the work of generations. Every new step will open up further problems, for each solution that we obtain suggests deeper questions, and enlarges our view of the permanent problem of Personality in its relation to the social whole, which is the inexhaustible subject matter not merely of economics and politics but of ethics and religion.

A MASTER BIBLIOGRAPHER.*

THE London Library by producing a Subject Catalogue has illustrated Dr. Johnson's wise remark that a man is more likely to benefit his fellows by attending closely to his business than by any more showy system of philanthropy. By benefiting its proprietors the executive of the London Library has done a still larger service for the entire world

* "The Crisis of Liberalism: New Issues of Democracy." By J. A. Hobson. P. S. King & Son. 6s.

* "Subject-Index of the London Library, St. James's Square, London." By C. T. Hagberg Wright, LL.D., Secretary and Librarian. Williams & Norgate. £2 2s. net.

of books. These twelve hundred and fifty pages are a good touchstone for a bookish man. The born railroad man can enjoy his Bradshaw by the hour, and welcomes each new issue with as much eagerness as the frivolous traveller on his line welcomes the "Strand Magazine." So to the true bookman, a Subject Catalogue is a perennial fountain of life-giving entertainment, sparkling with the freshness of dewdrops, and the subtle perfume of the novel and the exotic. The true helluo librorum will pore over it far into the night, and will chase the baffling vision of the book-nymph through the mazes of the dawn. An index of any kind is a great educational test. Like a back staircase which has to be inserted in the plans after the completion of the main design, it subjects the whole structure to a new and incalculable strain. It brings all the parts into a new relation, and reveals many things that were hid. It brings the whole rooftop into a new scheme of proportion. A fortiori with a Subject Catalogue. A good library without a catalogue is, if possible, in a worse plight than a good book without an index, a city without a plan, a ship without a chart. As a matter of fact, however, uncharted libraries are the rule rather than the exception. A catalogue has so often been regarded as a thing "to work at," like a volume of the French Academy's Dictionary—a thing to work at indefinitely, but not on any account to consummate. The desert of learning is bleached with the bones of cataloguers. Explorers such as Nansen and Shackleton have described for us the aridity of the ice pack and the inordinate craving for fat which such aridity and frost generate. So with the small, gallant band of subject cataloguers, who have to wander through the abomination of desolation where no oases are. For five long years the idealists who made this book have been cabined as closely as a boat's crew, their vision confined to the long vista of columns at the end of which could be written conscientiously the magic word "Finis." Such work needs a strong will, a long discipline both of body and mind, public spirit, esprit de corps, a fearless leader, a powerful stimulus of public spirit, camaraderie and ideal faith.

Men who undertake and achieve this sort of work are necessarily few. Men without number are engaged upon such works as Mr. Casaubon's famous "Dictionary of all Mythologies." Such works receive no crown nor deserve one until they are completed. But the finishers of such books are in a sort of missionaries and martyrs. A prayer should be added on their behalf to the petitions of the liturgy. The minuteness of the individual stroke, the relative immensity of the aggregate effect, strike one as approximating to the miraculous. The individual indexer may be a person of no particular learning. His completed work will transcend the united efforts of a Firth, an Acton, or a Macaulay. What did the student do before the "Bibliotheca Britannica" was produced in 1820 or thereabouts? What could the publicist or the modernist contrive without the aid of "Poole's Index?" What could the harmless, necessary reader accomplish without his "B. M. Subject-Catalogue," or the man in the street without his "Sonnen-schein"? The contours of these hardy compiler-explorers should be modelled in bronze and adorn every rich man's library. Bibliography has now its own bibliographers; and Mr. W. P. Courtney has devoted years of diligent research to perfecting his "Register." Before the charts of these intrepid souls were brought to completion, we had to depend upon the mere hearsay of that great traditional character, the walking encyclopædia. The British Museum trained a dynasty of them. They held us with a glittering eye and poured out cabalistic lore in uninterrupted series. But what individual memory, however powerful, could inform us as to the latest works on plumbing, where to study the question of confession by telephone, or the law of nations as affecting dried raisins?

Such are the miracles with which we are rendered familiar by the manœuvre of the Index, and to prove that the cause has also had its martyrs it is necessary only to recapitulate the bleak destiny that attended every movement of Robert Watt from the moment he commenced bibliographer until his remains had long mouldered in an unhonored grave. Dr. Allibone puts the maxim of our greatest sage with pride upon its title-page, that "the chief Glory of every People arises from its Authors"; but he trembles with emotion and fear, as well he may, when he relates the grievous story of Robert Watt. Father and son both fell victims to their zeal for that stupendous "Bibliotheca," the slips for which are related to have filled sixty sacks. Many of these slips were burned by thieves. The completion of the work coincided with the bankruptcy of its publishers, before the unhappy family, or what survived of them, had been paid a penny for their labors. Miss Watt, the only surviving daughter of the greatest of British bibliographers, died miserably in 1864 in a Glasgow workhouse!

The gallant crew of eight cataloguers employed by the London Library, including four juniors, one boy, and a porter, appear to have been subjected to no such privations as those inflicted upon the unhappy family of Watt; but they must, in order to finish their work within four and a half years, have led self-denying lives, working industriously, obeying gladly. The work is said to have cost £5,000, and it is pleasant to know that all who took part in it have received recognition from the committee in some more or less substantial form. Two-thirds of the edition has already been disposed of, and there is no doubt whatever that the result of the enterprise has been satisfactory to all concerned in it. The inferiority of all aspirants to knowledge who do not possess the Subject-Index is cheaply purchased indeed at twenty-five shillings sterling. It is pleasant to know that the credit of the conception of this Index is due in the first instance to the fifth president of the institution,* whose "Hours in a Library" have given so much delight to thousands of readers of every degree of literacy. The London Library, Sir Leslie Stephen said, was just ripe for a Subject-Index. It was the right size and the right quality. All new books have to be sifted into their places through a committee of literary men—not wholly unconscious of one another's foibles. The indiscriminate voracity of a cetacean monster like the British Museum is thus avoided.

The Niagara of books at Bloomsbury is so overwhelming that the increase of five years alone suffices to fill pages and pages of subject-index with books on all the latest fads of humanity such as pedagogy, military science, the rights of women, and the observation of nature. A library should not, it is suggested, contain much above a quarter of a million books if the intention be to publish either an Author Catalogue or a Subject-Index of manageable size. The London Library fulfils this most important condition. Its books are representative. They are carefully selected. There are not enough of them to swamp the headings. So that if you want a book on Christian Science, on Fermentation, or on Pidgin-English, you will not be bewildered at the outset by an embarras de richesse. To make the headings and categories clear is an education in itself, and a cause of education in others. To people of an active curiosity a book like this is almost as good as an encyclopædia. It implies the application of machinery which has so completely transformed the life outside into the quiet domain of books. We have a prejudice against machinery, and have always had a lurking sympathy for the Luddites. But there is no stridency about the methods of the London Library. There is an agreeably plaintive air in the admission that "it has not always been easy to induce members to return the books held by them." Of the urbanity of the staff, however, it is quite superfluous to speak, for it has long become a by-word, and has rendered disobedience to the rules of the institution one of the highest forms of pleasure known to the world literary. This gentleness enhances our admiration for the severity of the work. To criticise the execution of it page by page would be highly flattering to the self-esteem of the critic. It is manifest, however, to the meanest intelligence upon a little reflection that such a task could be accomplished only by men fresh from the looms of some similar undertaking. The ideal critics for this Index would be the departmental editors of the new edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica." The time required for them to test it adequately would be about six months. They alone could illustrate its value adequately. Its utility, its protective value to such categories of men as journalists, booksellers, librarians, publicists, lecturers, students, and specialists of all kinds is a fairly elementary proposition. It is true that Mr. Cox has the whole of the work and perhaps a little besides tethered securely to his memory. To perpetuate and universalise the vast store of information embodied by the London Library issuing counter were a worthy raison d'être for any library catalogue.

* His predecessors were the Earl of Clarendon, Thomas Carlyle, Lord Houghton, and Lord Tennyson; his successor is Mr. Arthur Balfour.

A judicious arrangement of preliminary matters has left us very little room for illustration. Yet there are one or two headings to which we must call attention. Their educative value will serve to indicate the debt owed by the reading world to the book as a whole. Under "Acting," for instance, the list of actors' biographies supplies us at once with materials for a complete mythology of the British Stage. The Church History under the various countries, the suggestive entries under the headings of Conduct, Philosophy, and London entirely bear out the claim made in the Preface as to the enormous gain in manageability which accrues from the necessary limitation of the work. As it is, some of the headings run to enormous length—take France—Social Life, for instance. Among the most interesting and complete we have noted the headings, Napoleon, Navy, and Regimental Histories. As headings of unconscious humor—or, shall we say, sub-conscious philosophy?—may be cited the following: "Tarantism. See Dancing Mania: Woman, sub-heading Political Rights" and "Beauty: refer to Costume; Dress; Ornaments; Women." We have not hit up against a single misprint! As a few examples of familiar names failing to appear under headings where one would have expected to encounter them, the following may suffice. Under Birds we fail to discover the name of Hudson, under English History we have looked in vain for Thierry and Vinogradoff, under Dandies, Beaux, &c., for W. M. Thackeray, under Bookselling, Publishing, &c., for Vizetelly, under Alsace-Lorraine for Erckmann-Chatrian, under Mauritius for Leclerc, under Caricature for Broadley, under Alfred the Great for a reference to the "Cambridge History of English Literature," vol. I. The heading Military History astonished me rather by its brevity; the references to the volumes of the Hist. MSS. Commission are obscured by their curtness. The extended use of abbreviations would infallibly have shocked the "onlie begetter" of the undertaking, if that term may fairly be applied to Sir Leslie Stephen, a man of letters whose dislike for abbreviations approached the morbid, as may be seen by his complete avoidance of the tribe in the "Dictionary of National Biography." We are willing to believe that Mr. Wright has made a virtue of necessity. Yet the strain put upon the single small "s" (which stands alone for saint, secolo, sein, seit, series, ses, seu, siècle, since, sobra, son, sopra, sulla, sulle, sur) is almost more than necessity itself will stand.

The prolongation of such considerations of quasi-censure would be scarcely honest, still less fair. It is far more important to note the comprehensive success of the work and the extent to which this constitutes a great personal triumph for Mr. Hagberg Wright. When he was elected to his present position the three selected candidates were asked in turn how they would propose to catalogue "The Diversions of Purley." Two of them plunged disastrously by replying "Facetiae." It was by his diplomatic evasion of the direct issue that Mr. Wright first gave evidence of those qualities which have enabled him, first, to reconstruct the edifice, then the arrangement of the book-space, and finally the catalogues, both Author and Subject, of the St. James's Square Library. Chance and conduct, character and the capacity to command have alike marked him out as a Hercules of Bibliography. Such qualities should not be allowed to rust in disuse.

We would end, therefore, by pointing out labors that remain to be carried through by a man of his position and calibre. A subject-index of this kind almost necessarily precludes a proportionate attention being given to Belles-Lettres, Fiction, Memoirs. Fiction is already well cared for by librarians such as Dr. Ernest Baker and by a whole regiment of fiction specialists in America. What we badly need is an "Index Raisonné" of British Authors on the lines of Hugo Thieme's great work: the complete list of an author's works (such as that attempted in epitome by Mr. Farquharson Sharp) being followed in each case by a summary of the best critical sources carefully classified and dated. This work could be completed with relative ease with the resources at Mr. Wright's disposal. He could easily enlist a large unpaid staff among the members of the library. Another labor which might prove even more valuable, though it would need a larger permanent staff and would probably attain the fullest measure of utility if its manufacture were circumscribed in the main by the books contained in the Library, is a revision and condensation in a modern sense of Oettinger's "Bibliographie Biographique," so as to form a complete compte rendu of the Modern Memoir. This would be a task truly worthy in every way of the unique resources and capabilities at Mr. Wright's command

THOMAS SECCOMBE.

SINCERITY.*

MR. LAURENCE BINYON'S work now takes an acknowledged high place in our current literature. The great traditions of English poetry sound on in his verse, and the best of modern thought is the stuff whereof it is made. If we cannot reckon him as one of those forces that drive the contemporary mind, we can assuredly find in his poetry many of the loftiest qualities of the modern consciousness summed up in an excellent dignity of form. Moreover, the perfect sincerity of his diction and his inspiration alike brings his poetry frequently very near to greatness. There are no echoes in Mr. Binyon's work. He may have now and then a thought or a phrase that has been used before; what poet has not? But, in his case, the borrowing, if it has been a borrowing, has passed through his nature, and comes into his verse made his own and altogether controlled to his own special poetic purpose; but more probably the apparent reminiscence was required from the first and was invented by his originating idea. This, however, is but a small part of his sincerity. The main thing is that we cannot but feel, when reading him, how everything that occurs in Mr. Binyon's poetry has come from the ground of the heart, and how faithfully the words are fitted to the thought. It is easy to succumb to the temptation of gaining more effect than an idea's honest statement might obtain by means of some careful extravagance or verbal trickery; the more so when it is remembered that nine readers out of ten would not perceive that the idea did not quite fill the phrase. Poets the most famous have succumbed to this temptation. Indeed, paradoxical though it seems, it is rare that poets consumed by a fiery passion of inspiration achieve, as Milton and Wordsworth did, an invariable and perfect sincerity. The zeal does not always burn at the whitest pitch of flame; and when it is a little dulled, the habit of passionate phrase may very naturally attempt to conceal the lack. It is usually the more cautious, scholastic poet, like Matthew Arnold, that notably achieves perfect sincerity; and in this matter we should put Mr. Binyon with him.

Let it not be thought, however, that to classify Mr. Binyon as cautious and scholastic means any disparagement of him. We shall, perhaps, come nearer the truth if we attribute the origin of his poetry chiefly to his possession of an exquisite critical faculty, a power to choose, out of the pageant of the objective and subjective worlds, poetic theme and sentiment no less surely than poetic word and image. No one, of course, will contend that this power is not creative; the creation lies in the choice. This superlative critical faculty is one of the methods of poetic creation; rather, when we say that the poetry of Gray, of Arnold, or, as we think, of Mr. Binyon, has this origin, we mean that a process which enters, more or less, into the composition of all poetry is here paramount. The faults of such poetry will very seldom be positive errors; at its best, it will only lack those infinite suggestions which the god pours into his most favored instruments. But if the absence of faults were the most commendable feature in Mr. Binyon's poetry, it would not be worth much considering. In "England and other Poems," as in all his work, the poetry is very far from being merely faultless. Mr. Binyon continually reproves excessive theorising about the art he practises by giving us lyrics of such fine rapture and inexplicable melody as this from his latest volume:—

"O Love of my love, O blue,
Blue sky that over me bends!
The height and the light are you,
And I the lark that ascends.

* "England, and other Poems." By Laurence Binyon. Elkin Mathews. 3s. 6d. net.

Trembling, ascends and soars,
A heart that pants, a throat
That throbs, a song that pours
The heart out as it sings.
Lo, the dumb world falls remote,
But higher, higher the golden height!
Oh, I faint upon my wings!
Lift me, Love, beyond their flight,
Lift me, lose me in the light."

And punishment surely awaits the man who would analyse the tune and phantasmagoric, gleaming imagery of his perfect "Ricordi":—

"Of a tower, of a tower, white
In the warm Italian night,
Of a tower that shines and springs
I dream, and of our delight.

Of doves, of a hundred wings
Sweeping in sound that sings
Past our faces, and wide,
Returning in tremulous rings."

Verlaine could hardly do anything of more elusive charm; and the beautiful structure, as well as the thought, is terribly hurt by partial quotation.

No, there is no lack of freshness, of ecstasy, or of the unapproachable logic of imagery in this book of Mr. Binyon's. If there is a lack in it, it is of what he himself calls the "sea-like murmur of eternity." News of larger matters than those which occupy sense and intellect is given to us through his poetry. Yet we feel that these messages came to Mr. Binyon's mind in orderly fashion through the portals of his reason; they did not float in unasked at the windows of his mind, rumors of the "unexpressive nuptial song" carried on some vague breath of spirit. When, for instance, Mr. Binyon, looking on the glory of the stars, suddenly tells us that—"they are dead, all dead!

'Tis but the beauty of Medusa's head
Gleaming on us in icy masks, that stare
From everlasting winter blind and bare;
They have no answer for our hearts that yearn,
They have no joy in burning, only burn
Upon their senseless motion;"

we feel that we have been enlarged; he has taken us into the roofless infinite. It is a notable passage, and poetry is the richer for it. Yet it was Mr. Binyon, and Mr. Binyon's reason, that said it, not Apollo. Apollo would never admit that the stars, because they are what seems to us "dead," have therefore "no joy in burning." Nevertheless, we cannot help feeling that in this latest volume of his Mr. Binyon's inspiration is larger than it ever was before. If we do not catch "sea-like murmurs of eternity," we do, again and again, hear in his verses a bruit of the whole procession of humanity. Several times Mr. Binyon expresses a deep communal consciousness of the general kind of man, especially in two remarkably beautiful poems, "Mother and Child," and "Love's Portrait," in both of which the far-searching thought is mated to solemn music. But we shall find this best expressed in the poem from which we have already quoted, "Sirmione"; it is, we think, the top, so far, of Mr. Binyon's poetical achievement; a most memorable poem, full of ringing lines, and of things intensely perceived and profoundly felt. It describes a visit by night to Catullus' "eye of islands and all-but-islands"; and, standing where "the promontory bare Breathes all that wide and water-wandering air," the poet exults in the spectacle of the Southern heavens, "till the mind is brimmed and to all other being blind." This leads to fine poetry:—

"O, in Night's garden has a fountain sprung
That over old earth showers for ever young
A fairy splendor of still-dropping spray?
Or in mad rapture has enamored May
Through the warm dusk mounted like wine, and towered
And in far spaces infinitely flowered?"

Then comes the sudden revulsion of feeling in which he perceives that the stars are "dead, all dead"; but out of that arises a visionary mood in which the night becomes a vast symbol of "the unfathomed gulfs of Time," starred not with material suns, but with "bright peopling spirits." All the past of humanity is there, all those—

"From whose immortal ecstasies and pains Drops of red life run sanguine in our veins."

And all the future is there too, all the "unnumbered hosts to be"; and this last vision leads to a triumphant passage of which this is the peak:—

"Heroes that shall adventure and attain
What broke our wills in passion and in pain;
Sages, to find all that we vainly seek,
Poets, to utter all we cannot speak!
And they at last shall into strong towers build
The stones we bled to gather, the unfulfilled
House of our dream; what was but fable sung,
Or indignation on a prophet's tongue,
Made form or hue of life's own tissue, wrought
Into the rich reality of thought."

Necessarily, in analysing the poem, we have divided the thought into compartments; but in the thing itself, the continuity of the thought, and the gradual alternations between sombreness and serious ecstasy, almost reach the ideal condition of music. Mr. Binyon's "Sirmione" is, for its large vision and sounding dignity, not unworthy to be put in the same category as "Tintern Abbey." We have denied, perhaps, somewhat too hastily, that Mr. Binyon is a "driving force"; nevertheless, "Sirmione," with its passionate perception of the grand unity of mankind through all the ages, is immensely significant for those who would wish to know what species of thought will characterise the coming poetry. "Sirmione" is not only an admirable poem; it will also, we dare prophesy, become an influence in poetry.

The main thought of "Sirmione" occurs in various forms throughout the book. We find it even in a version of the Morgan le Fay legend. The fishing-lad whom she has enticed to her palace of beauty, feels desolate there and weeps; when his tears fall on the floor, the marble suddenly becomes transparent, and looking through, he perceives that the house of Morgan's delights is built on a mountain made of human agony. Had all of "Ruan's Voyage" been equal to this magnificent passage it would have been a noble poem; but as it is, the story is too much expanded. There are, however, in all these poems excellences too many to be mentioned. We may especially note Mr. Binyon's powers of observation. When it is nothing more than simply selective observation, it is charming, as here:—

"His mother calls. Now over thymey sod
The boy comes, yet he lingers; the flowers keep
His feet among them, clustering fair and deep.
Red crane's-bill shakes its seed; milk-campions nod,
By the rough sorrel little pansies hide;
Slim spikes of golden-rod
Above the honeyed purple clover flame;
And where the sheltered dew has scarcely dried,
Clung worts, close-leaved, each with its own wild name."

But we have much also of that intense imaginative kind of observation in which the poet's spirit possesses what he sees, as when, looking at the ruins of Château Gaillard, he says that—

"these pressing stones conspire
Toward a purpose past the strength of each,
As a man's deeds knit by one desire,
As a great verse out of casual speech
Forged in fire."

That is greatly said. Exquisitely said, too, and coming out of the same faculty, is it when the line of a face is made to surpass any "curve that wind breathed over snow." But we must have done. We can do no more than barely mention the "metaphysical" rapture of "The Crucible," the fine ode on Milton, "The Crusaders," the sane patriotism of "England." Mr. Binyon, certainly, is not a poet to be revered chiefly for his past achievements. His past is full of admirable things; but his present work is deeper, larger, and more beautiful than anything he has done heretofore.

IN THE HILLS.*

THE vast slopes and valleys, falling gradually into the plains from the summits of the Himalayas, are now almost the only parts of the world to retain the mystery and attraction of unknown lands. They extend from Afghanistan to the great curve by which the Brahmaputra enters India, and from end to end they are occupied by a diversity of ancient and little-known peoples. Those greatest mountains of the world have formed, as it were, a watershed of races, and among their recesses they still retain the immemorial springs from which so many nations of the world have flowed. In the Caucasus there seems to be a difference. The many races that lie in layers like strata up the lower and higher valleys and summits of the mountains there, appear to be relics of races driven further and further for refuge, and it seems almost certain that some of them came originally from hot and thirsty plains near Babylon; for they keep up Babylonish usages and even words, and their ancient songs tell the joys of shade and cool rivers. But in the Himalaya the movement appears to have been reversed. It was from the mountains that the peoples came down upon the plains; their most ancient songs tell of the joy of sun and warmth, and Mr. Tilak, famed equally as a scholar and the extremist leader of Poona, has maintained the belief that the earliest Vedas arose among a glacial people, dwelling, perhaps, even beyond the hills.

* "Sikhim and Bhutan, Twenty-one Years on the North-East Frontier: 1887-1908." By J. Claude White, C.I.E. Arnold. 21s. net.

Among the mountain states of the southern slopes the veil of mystery still lies over Nepaul, but in Cashmere it has almost disappeared, and eastward of Nepaul it has been lifted quite recently from Sikhim and Bhutan. Mr. Claude White was the man who lifted it, and in this book of his we have by far the most minute and accurate account yet given of the two countries and the peoples who inhabit them, so strange and primitive, and yet so far advanced in arts and customs of their own. It is true that other books have been written, the earliest English account going back 135 years. But these works were necessarily only stories of brief visits, missions, or expeditions. Mr. White speaks with the authority of twenty years, during which he was our Political Resident in Sikhim, and twice he was sent on important and difficult missions into Bhutan.

As he notices himself, one of the great errors of our recent administration in India has been the frequent transference of officials from one centre or province to another. The official does not trouble about the native language or customs when he knows he will be transferred before he can learn them; and the Indian does not trouble to work with the official when he knows another will soon take his place. But Mr. Claude White's position was, fortunately, of a different kind. Year after year he could devote himself to the same permanent and definite task, and each year he became more intimate with the people, and was regarded with increasing respect and affection. All the races of India yield very easily to kindly and sympathetic intercourse. As Sir William Wedderburn has often said, they are the easiest people in the world to govern, because they are so readily pleased with the smallest sign of friendliness. We will not lay too much stress on the lamentations and pathetic honors with which they take leave of every conspicuous man whom they like or respect. But we can well imagine that there was a deeper feeling even than usual in the sorrowful ceremonies with which the natives of these two States showed their grief at Mr. Claude White's departure little over a year ago.

The descriptions of the country, with its passes higher than the summit of Mont Blanc, its deep valleys, and the remains of enormous glaciers of the primeval world, are all admirably done, and description is aided by excellent photographs. But the best accounts of Nature tire, and are hardly intelligible, without the presence of man. So in these mountain States it is man who really interests us. Man's races there have been to some extent mixed, but the Mongolian type appears to prevail, as it does among the Gurkhas, too. The Tibetan and Chinese frontiers are close at hand, not much more difficult of access than the Aryans of India, though Darjeeling is only four days' march from the Residency in Sikhim. Perhaps the race type, or a shyness of Indian interference, accounts for the Buddhist form of religion which is maintained in both States, as in Nepaul; for it is one of the strangest facts of history that Buddha's great reform movement, which appeared in India and prevailed there for centuries, has almost vanished from its own country, though it is followed by the greater part of mankind elsewhere. Under Buddhism the mountain races enjoy the advantages (if they are advantages) of freedom from caste and a nearly omnivorous diet. They have also constructed the most picturesque monasteries and convents, piled among precipitous rocks, defying human intercourse, like the Orthodox monasteries in Thessaly, Athos, and parts of the Caucasus. On the other hand, they suffer under the idleness of the lamas, who are a heavy burden, though, perhaps, not heavier than the priests of most countries. On great occasions the lamas can so far shake off religious sloth as to dance for three days running—a wholesome exercise for the body. But the spiritual exercise of prayer is accomplished by wheels, usually worked by the abundant water-power of the Himalaya, though sometimes the turning is done by hand, as in the case of a great wheel in Sikhim, which contains four tons weight of prayers and is nine feet high.

The law of Sikhim is many centuries older than its religion, and its simple code appears to be still maintained. It consists of sixteen laws, of which the first two form a kind of "Red Book" of military usage, and most of the rest are rather observances than laws in the proper sense. It is comfortable to find there are only five great sins, of which three are the murders of mother, father, or holy men; the fourth is making mischief among lamas, and the fifth causing hurt to the good. The penalties for these and a few subordinate sins are primeval and drastic:—

"For the above offences punishments are inflicted, such as putting the eyes out, cutting the throat, having the tongue cut out, having the hands cut off, being thrown from cliffs, and being thrown into deep water."

But, though these penalties sound a little harsh, the greatest care is taken in carrying them out, and nothing can exceed the delicacy with which a culprit is deprived of his hands.

If truth cannot be discovered on oath, the ordeal by boiling oil or hot stones is ordained, and its efficacy is unquestioned. The marriage laws are not very stern, and polyandry within the same family is usual. In Bhutan the author witnessed a very remarkable ceremony which aims at ensuring a blessing on the rice fields:—

"A long, picturesque procession of men and women came winding down the hillside until the first rice-field, into which water had been running all the day before, was reached. The field below was still dry, and, turning in there, they all sat down and had some light refreshment. Suddenly the men sprang up, throwing off their outer garments; this was the signal for the women to rush to the inundated field and commence throwing clods of earth and splashes of muddy water on the men below as they tried to climb up. Then followed a wild and mad, though always good-humored, struggle between the men and women in the water, the men doing their utmost to take possession of the watery field, the women equally determined to keep them out. . . . Gradually the women drove the men down the whole length of the field. . . . This was looked on as a very propitious ending, as the women's victory portends fertility of the soil and increase among the flocks."

It is curious; it may be a survival of some old contest over a Women's Property Act, just as in Central Africa the field a woman tills is absolutely her own. It may be a relic of matriarchy. But the fertility of the crops and herds is as important to the men as to the women, and we wonder if they always fight their hardest.

There are many other points of interest in this remarkable book, equally valuable for its geography, its folk-lore, and its accurate accounts of the native arts, which reach a very high standard, especially in weaving and metals. But perhaps, after all, the chief value lies in the unconscious picture drawn of the best kind of British official—humane, intelligent, and absolutely devoted to the welfare of the peoples among whom he was stationed. We can only hope that under his successors the two States may still remain a monument of the author's life work.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

THERE are several passages in Sir Edmund Cox's "My Thirty Years in India" (Mills & Boon, 8s. net) deploring what the author considers the leniency shown by the authorities in criminal matters, and hinting that more drastic methods are advisable. This is to be expected from a retired Deputy Inspector-General of Police, though Sir Edmund Cox admits that the traditional idea of detection in the East is to get hold of the man who is suspected of the crime and torture him until he confesses. He holds that, as a general rule, the police are deterred from this practice by the fear of punishment, though his contention is weakened by his statement that "a heinous case is seldom sent up for trial

WERNER LAURIE'S

NEW BOOKS.

BLACK SHEEP. By Stanley Portal Hyatt, Author of "The Marriage of Hilary Carden." 6s.

THE UNCOUNTED COST. By Mary Gaunt, Author of "The Silent Ones." 6s.

MASTER JOHN. By Shan F. Bullock, Author of "Robert Thorne." 6s.

SPECIAL MESSENGER. A Novel. By Robert W. Chambers. Third Large Edition in Preparation. 6s.

EGYPT. By Pierre Loti. Translated by W. P. Baines. With eight plates in colour by A. O. Lamplough. 15s. net.

MY FRIENDS THE FRENCH. By Robert Harborough Sherard. Brilliant Parisian Reminiscences. 12s. 6d. net.

THE NIGHTSIDE OF PARIS. By E. B. D'Auvergne, Author of "Lola Montez." With 24 Full-page Drawings by Harry Morley. 10s. 6d. net.

THE GRIZZLY BEAR. The Narrative of a Hunter—Historical, Scientific and Adventurous. By William H. Wright. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.

PSYCHICAL SCIENCE and CHRISTIANITY. By E. Katharine Bates, Author of "Seen and Unseen," "Do the Dead Depart?" 6s.

CHATS ON ELECTRICITY. By Frank Broadbent, M.I.E.E. Crown 8vo. Fully Illustrated. 3s. 6d. net.

GILBERT WHITE AND SELBORNE. By Henry C. Shelley. Illustrated. 6s. net.

OLD ENGLISH TOWNS. By William Andrews. Fully Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

LOVE INTRIGUES OF ROYAL COURTS. By Thornton Hall. Illustrated. Demy. 12. 6d. net.

LOLA MONTEZ: An Adventure of the 'Forties. By Edmund B. d'Auvergne. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.

THE EDUCATION OF THE WILL. A Guide to the Development of Will Power. By T. Sharper Knowlson. 6s. net.

STORIES FROM THE GREEK LEGENDS. By C. Gasquoine Hartley. Fully illustrated. 3s. 6d. net.

WERNER LAURIE, CLIFFORD'S INN, LONDON.

BOOKS IN DEMAND

Published by STANLEY PAUL & CO.

THE DAUPHINES OF FRANCE

TIMES.—"The author is a lively memoir writer who has already, like many others, found in French history an abundant supply of bait wherewith to lure a greedy public."

SCOTSMAN.—"Carefully studied and gracefully written, it has much in it to interest readers who like true tales of the ceremonies and sorrows of royalty."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"Mr. Hamel has the right touch, and treats history in a mood of gay vivacity. The reader will find the various studies always animated, well informed, and excellently phrased. Certainly these stories make romantic reading, and Mr. Hamel handles his material with dexterity and force. In his glowing pages he seizes every opportunity for lively and impressive description."

STANDARD OF EMPIRE.—"Its four hundred large pages are full of racy, picturesque, anecdotal history of the inner life of the Courts of France—probably the most splendid and interesting of all the Courts of modern history. The period covered is extremely attractive, and a more genuinely suitable book for a winter fireside would be hard to find."

THE DAUPHINES OF FRANCE

By FRANK HAMEL.

Demy 8vo, Illustrated, 16s net.

OUTLOOK.—"Mr. Hamel has worked with much discretion, aided by a light hand, a fascinating manner, and an entire absence of pretentiousness. We have not met within the same compass so faithful and complete a revelation of the life of the royalties and of the noblesse. We are told what they ate, what they wore, and what they said; and we are told of their delight in pageants and processions and banquets, of their childish extravagance, of their ceremonial and etiquette. The portraits in this entertaining volume are instructive and admirably reproduced. The frontispiece is charming enough to be removed and framed on its own merits as a picture. On the whole a book suitable for presentation by uncles and guardians."

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"Miss Hamel is the first writer to bring together in one volume the fifteen Dauphines of France. Of each of the Dauphines Miss Hamel has given us a brief but finished study. If any gentleman is still hesitating over a seasonable present for the most intelligent girl graduate of his acquaintance, let him go forthwith to the bookseller."

MORNING LEADER.—"Miss Hamel does for French history what Miss Strickland did for the lives of the English queens. An admirable volume."

THREE GOOD 6s. NOVELS

LOVE BESIEGED CHARLES E. PEARCE

DUNDEE ADVERTISER.—"This active and finely emotional novel I have read with equal attention and admiration, and heartily commend it to those who are ready for a well-studied and sympathetic romance that without extravagance surrounds facts with the glamour of imagination and sentiment. I am putting 'Love Besieged' aside near at hand for a speedy re-reading, for its heroine and her regenerated lover are characters that one likes to keep company with."

TIMES.—"A well-written romance."

LIVERPOOL DAILY POST.—"Distinctively interesting, and the reader is not likely to lay the book down until he has read to the end."

BROAD ARROW.—"The love story is sufficiently dramatic to enthrall the most blasé novel reader."

TROPICAL TALES DOLF WYLLARDE

DAILY NEWS.—"The author's cleverness is unquestionable. We could scarcely imagine her writing a dull story."

GOLDEN APHRODITE WINIFRED CRISPE

MORNING LEADER.—"Very vivid and interesting."

DUNDEE COURIER.—"Runs without a dull moment; told with considerable literary power."

COUNTRY LIFE.—"The book has all the readable qualities of its predecessors, and can be recommended for a dull afternoon. The situations are excellent."

GLOBE.—"An attractive story in which the interest never flags."

LIVERPOOL DAILY POST.—"The situations which the problem produces are cleverly dealt with."

TIMES.—"Here we have a tense drama."

ABERDEEN JOURNAL.—"We make bold to say that every reader of this truly novel novel will lay it down after perusal with genuine satisfaction. A model of condensation."

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"A quite powerful story, well told."

OUTLOOK.—"A thoroughly feminine composition full of limelight effects."

STANDARD.—"A novel that demands serious criticism; by far the best novel Miss Crispe has yet written."

NO POLITICIAN SHOULD MISS THIS BOOK

THE DOOKS' DOOMSDAY BOOK

Includes "Weppys' Diary," "Dook Dulliver's Travels," "Fitz of O'Mark Hyam," "The Rime of the Smiling Chancellor," and many other parodies of well-known poems, nursery rhymes, and comic songs; and a host of other bright and breezy miscellaneous items. "THE DOOKS' DOOMSDAY BOOK" is Fully Illustrated. Sixpence. Sold everywhere.

STANLEY PAUL & CO., Clifford's Inn, London.

without a confession forming part of the evidence." Sir Edmund Cox's explanation is that these confessions are due to "the sting of conscience while still under the influence of the excitement connected with the crime," and that the subsequent denial of the confession and the charge of torture brought against the police spring from the fact that "old jail-birds get into communication" with the prisoner. Readers must judge for themselves of the force of this contention, though it is but fair to add that Sir Edmund Cox, who has personally investigated hundreds of cases, says he believes torture to be "extremely rare." The greater part of the book treats of the crimes, mostly of a non-political nature, with which the author has, in his official capacity, been connected. Sir Edmund Cox's standpoint towards the Indian natives may be judged from the following quotation. The Italian man-of-war "Vesuvio" visited Karachi in 1906 and the officers were entertained by the residents. "One of the Italian officers, after an inquiring gaze around the ball-room, said to me, 'There are many English, but how is it that there are no Indians?' As I have said, no one could have been on more friendly terms than myself with Indians, but the very idea of admitting them to a ball-room, to dance with English ladies, seemed to me a profanity."

* * *

THE "Fortnightly Review" has secured the serial rights of George Meredith's unfinished novel "Celt and Saxon," and the first three chapters appear in the January issue. In "Imperial and Foreign Affairs: A Review of Events," Mr. J. L. Garvin repeats his old assertions regarding the relative positions of the English and German navies. He again presses for "the new way of life." "We require a complete change of mind and habit, and it can only be brought about by training every boy and man in definite ideals of patriotism and in the efficient aptitude for national defence." If this means a demand for conscription we can only say it is a way of life to which it will be hard to convert Englishmen. Madame Maeterlinck writes on "The Later Heroines of Maurice Maeterlinck," and claims that the Aglavaines and Arianes differ from the women of the past in that, grown "more clear-sighted than man," they seem to look over his shoulder "to perceive what he does not yet descry on the horizon." Mr. Frederick Lawton discusses the fourteenth volume of M. Emile Ollivier's "Reminiscences." The article holds that, notwithstanding M. Ollivier's efforts to shield the Emperor and Empress, he cannot hide that the former had neither the will to make war promptly nor the skill to keep peace surely, but shilly-shallied between the two. As to M. Ollivier's own career, Mr. Lawton writes that "the worst that can be said of him is that he was over-deferential to maxims, precedents, and statecraft, which, in the second half of the nineteenth century, were out of date; the best—and this is much—that he voluntarily sacrificed a fine political reputation in a vain endeavor to save the régime to which his allegiance was sworn." Other articles in the number are "Liberalism and the Future," by Mr. Sydney Brooks, "Imprisonment for Debt," by Mr. E. H. Pickersgill, "Prince Ito: Patriot and Statesman," by Mr. Alfred Stead, and a short sketch of fisher life, "An Unofficial Divorce," by Mr. Stephen Reynolds.

* * *

IN the "Nineteenth Century" Sir Bampfylde Fuller writes on "The Indian Responsibilities of Liberal Politicians," and makes a thorough-going defence of Lord Curzon's policy. "Germany's Real Attitude to England," by Herr Charles Tuchmann is a valuable article showing that no sensible German has in view any attempt to gain naval supremacy over England. Herr Tuchmann is properly severe upon the scare-mongers. He states that they "appeal to the worst natures in both countries at the very moment when the official heads of both are holding out the hand of good fellowship." The Gladstone centenary is marked by a chatty article from Sir Algernon West. M. André Beaunier discusses "La Littérature Française Contemporaine." He regards contemporary French literature as opulent both in achievement and promise, but destitute of any directing impulse. Oddly enough he rather depreciates M. Anatole France, while he speaks in high terms of M. Jules Lemaitre and M. Maurice Barrès. Other articles to be noted are "A Self-Supporting Penal Labour Colony," by Miss Edith Sellers, "The Theory of Evolution," by Prince Kropotkin, and "The Making of a Poet," by Mr. Stephen Gwynn.

* * *

THOSE who want powerfully and clearly written accounts of the sort of people the Lords are, what they have done, and the powers they possess—to say nothing of the powers they claim—cannot do better than read the series of pamphlets by Mr. Stead, "Peers or People?"; "The Impachment of the House of Commons"; "For High Treason Against the Commons"; and "Why the Lords Must Go." The last pamphlet is priced at sixpence, but it is worth the money, for it gives a close and very instructive summary of all the Peers have done against democracy during the last hundred years. With regard to the present crisis, Mr. Stead's remedy is the withholding of the Writ of Summons. Our own preference is for the creation of peers, to which, we fancy, the country will be driven by the doubt as to whether an Assembly otherwise constituted would be a legal body.

The Week in the City.

				Price Friday morning, Dec. 31.		Price Friday morning, Jan. 7.
Consols	82 $\frac{7}{8}$...	82 $\frac{5}{8}$
Midland Def.	59	...	57 $\frac{7}{8}$
Union Pacific	209 $\frac{3}{4}$...	207
Mexican 1st Pref.	134 $\frac{1}{2}$...	134
U.S. Steel	94 $\frac{5}{8}$...	90

WAVERING STOCK MARKETS.

STOCK markets have shown a chastened spirit this week. At the end of December many jobbers and other professional operators were laying in a supply of stock to sell to a public which was expected to rush in to buy as soon as 1910 had dawned upon it; and, because a flood of buying orders did not come in with the New Year, weak professional bulls have made haste to lighten their books. It was rather unreasonable to expect that an outburst of public speculation should begin on the eve of a general election which is arousing very unusual interest, and if these professional operators have lost some money, sympathy with their misfortune can only be tempered by surprise aroused by their hastiness. That the prospects for the year are in many respects excellent is undoubted, and it is equally clear that if the course of trade is not interrupted by labor disputes or political complications, there should be a great revival of commercial activity, almost world-wide in its distribution. But to argue from these hopeful indications that the public would rush to buy Kafirs and Jungle shares and Home Railway stocks was a tortuous and misleading inference. The public certainly shows an inclination to speculate, but it is not in a violent hurry, and at present it is preoccupied with political matters.

WEAKNESS IN NEW YORK.

An uncomfortable sentiment has been very apparent in New York, and on several days the Wall Street market was in a condition verging on demoralisation. An ugly little scramble for money was accounted for by the lock-up of funds for dividend payments, but showed that the monetary resources of the big groups either have not been handled as skilfully as usual, or are not as ample as was supposed. The President is about to address Congress on the subject of Trust legislation, and Wall Street is consequently apprehensive; but its most serious fear appears to be that of labor warfare. Lord Rothschild has assured the Liverpool Tariff Reformers that, according to his observation, when the diamond trade is brisk there is little unemployment in America, and that during the last six months America had bought diamonds to an unprecedented extent. Of course, it ought to be very gratifying to the American working man to see his employers hanging ropes of baubles round their wives and daughters, but apparently they are perverse enough to think that the necessities of life are dear, and that they ought to have some share in the current prosperity. They are declaring war on the Steel Trust, and seem to be otherwise preparing for a contest which may seriously interfere with Wall Street's plans.

JANUS.

CHAIRMAN : To those qualities of fine flavour and aroma that one requires for real enjoyment in smoking it adds the unusual attribute of coolness.

Whether smoked much or little it is always cool, always pleasing and burns evenly to the last shred.

BOARDMAN'S is the same tobacco milder, and

RECORDER the same, but fuller flavoured.

6d. per oz. from all tobacconists.

R. J. LEA, MANCHESTER.

The Daily News

YEAR BOOK.

PREFACE BY

The Rt. Hon. D. Lloyd George.

ON SALE EVERYWHERE.

Price 6d. net.

LONDON COUNTY & WESTMINSTER BANK, LIMITED.

ESTABLISHED IN 1836.

CAPITAL - £14,000,000, in 700,000 Shares of £20 each.
Called-up Capital, £3,500,000. Reserve Fund, £4,250,000

Head Office : 41, LOTHBURY, E.C.

LOMBARD STREET OFFICE : 21, Lombard Street, E.C.

WEST END OFFICE : 1, St. James's Square, S.W.

Foreign Branch—80, Cornhill, E.C.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened on the usual terms. Facilities are given Customers at any Branch for the transfer of money to or from any other Branch.

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.—Sums of £10 and upwards are received on deposit at interest, subject to notice of withdrawal, or by special agreement, in accordance with the usual custom.

EXECUTOR AND TRUSTEE BUSINESS UNDERTAKEN.

PURCHASE AND SALE of Stocks and Shares effected.

DIVIDENDS, ANNUITIES, &c., received.

THE AGENCY OF FOREIGN AND COUNTRY BANKS is undertaken, and every description of Banking Business transacted.

FOREIGN DEPARTMENT.

CURRENCY DRAFTS, CIRCULAR NOTES and LETTERS OF CREDIT are issued, and TELEGRAPHIC TRANSFERS made to all parts of the world.

APPROVED FOREIGN DRAFTS are purchased, and Collections undertaken.

DOCUMENTARY CREDITS are established, and every facility given for the handling of Documents to or from Abroad.

The Officers of the Bank are bound to secrecy.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER. Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Spring Term commences January 14th.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.

BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.

(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

TETTENHALL COLLEGE,
STAFFORDSHIRE.

500 feet above Sea Level.

Headmaster—R. L. AGER, M.A. (Rugby and Corpus Christi College, Oxford).

FREE CHURCH PUBLIC SCHOOL.

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey, Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK.
K. M. ELLIS.

STRAMONGATE BOYS' SCHOOL, KENDAL.

A Boarding School for Boys.

Founded by the Society of Friends in Kendal.

A strong staff—leisure-time pursuits—school journeys—good games—gymnastics—a magnificent country district.

The school has doubled itself in the last five years.

Prospectus, School Magazine, etc., from WILFRED SESSIONS, B.Sc. Headmaster.

BOOKSELLERS.

A SHILLING ILLUSTRATED BIBLE.

This Bible is printed in clear Pearl type, and contains 16 Photographic Views, 16 beautiful Figure Pictures after Collier, Delaroche, Hoffmann, Reynolds, Titian, etc.; 2 beautiful Illuminated Title Pages and Maps; tastefully bound in crimson imitation leather, gilt edges, and round corners, 1s. 3d. post free, or 6 copies for 6s. 6d. post free.

Rev. ALAN BRODRICK, Broughton Gifford Rectory, writes:—"The Bibles are perfect books of art and cheapness."

The London Bible Warehouse, 53, Paternoster Row, E.C

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE
& BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

TOURS.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."

£12 12s. OPORTO, GIBRAULTAR, TANGIER, ALGIERS, PAERMO, February 15th.

£26 5s. PALESTINE, EGYPT, CONSTANTINOPLE, GREECE, March 3rd.

Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

£7 7s. —SKI-ING, SKATING, TOBOGGANNING TOURS, including Second-Class Return Ticket and Accommodation Hotel Aubepine, Ballaigues. Also Hotels at Mantana, Villars St. Beatenberg, Wengen, Lenzerheide, etc.—Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, London, S.W.

BANKING.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

PARR'S BANK, LIMITED.

Notice is hereby given that the Rate of Interest allowed by this Bank at the Head Office and Metropolitan Branches, on Deposit at seven days' call, is Two and a-Half per cent. per annum, until further notice.

R. W. WHALLEY, General Manager.

Bartholomew Lane, E.C. 6th January, 1910.

THE LONDON JOINT STOCK BANK, LIMITED.

Notice is hereby given that the Rate of Interest allowed at the Head Office and London Branches of this Bank, on Deposits subject to seven days' notice of withdrawal, is this day reduced to 2½ per cent. per annum.

CHARLES GOW, General Manager,

5, Princes Street, Mansion House. 6th January, 1910.

THE INDEX TO
VOLUME V. OF THE NATION

Is now ready, and can be obtained free on application to the Manager.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Bathrooms on every Floor,
Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading,
Billiard and Smoking Rooms.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) Single from 3/6 to 6/0.Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses: { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc.,
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) Hotel. Close Pier; 1st Class; moderate.SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week.BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.*BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.BRIGHTON.*THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.BUXTON.*ST. ANNE'S HOTEL. First Hotel.DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.*THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara.DEAL.*BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.EASTBOURNE.*CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House. Sussex Gdns. 5/- day.HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.EDINBURGH.*ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel.GREAT YARMOUTH.*MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day.GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.*THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.ILFRACOMBE.*COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 rooms. Facing Sea.KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCs.*CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments.LANCASTER.*BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh.LEEDS.*HOTEL METROPOLE. 2 minutes' walk from either station.LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANDUDNO.The WHITE HORSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea.LLANELLY.*CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LYNTON (Devon).ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres.MALVERN.*HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson.MATLOCK.*SMEDLEY'S HYDRO. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand.ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes).NELSON.*RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station.OXFORD (near).*SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boar's Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c., Lecture.PENTRE.*PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.SOUTHPORT.*KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment.ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas. Tel. 647ROCKLEY HYDRO. Electric and other baths; Excellent cuisine.
Lift. Near Golf Links. From 7s. per day. Tel. 422.HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclist's Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop.WHITBY.*WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

Your Week End
Is Not Complete

WITHOUT

The Saturday Westminster

(The Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette.")

It is the only Weekly Magazine Review of the kind.

"F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week.
An Unique page of "Problems and Prizes,"
Book Reviews and Special Literary
Articles by the best known Writers.

ONE PENNY. Post 6/6 per annum (home), 8/8 (abroad).

Offices: Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for
copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION
Office, 14 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION
PUBLISHING Co. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-
sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—
Gordon and Gotch.Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

THE MEDICI PRINTS

FOR 1910—FIFTH YEAR.

THE MEDICI SOCIETY exists in order to ISSUE THE MOST ACCURATE FACSIMILE REPRODUCTIONS, in the Colours of the Originals, which the most recently perfected methods of modern scientific photography are capable of producing, AT THE LOWEST PRICE COMMERCIALY POSSIBLE, and so to bring these Prints within the reach of all purses. All Medici Prints may be purchased singly subject only to the prior claims of Annual Subscribers.

The Burlington Magazine, Times, Nation, and all the leading journals may be quoted in support of The Society's contention that it has fulfilled both its pledges—to issue the best, at the lowest price.

The ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION of £3 (post free) has hitherto entitled Subscribers to receive copies of the Annual Series after the great Italian Masters only. Commencing with the New Year (1910), however, ASSOCIATE SUBSCRIPTIONS will be received—also of £3—entitling the Associate Subscriber to select a certain number of Plates from among the new Prints for the year without limitation as to subject.

Full particulars of both classes of Subscription will be found in the New Edition of The Society's Prospectus—post-free 3d. stamps, or containing some 100 Reproductions of the Prints, post-free 1s. stamps or P.O. [See also at foot of page.] Forms of Subscription post-free on application. No Subscription can be taken unless on these Forms, which bind the Subscriber to continue his Subscription (of whichever class) for a minimum period of Three Years.

 Among the New Prints for 1910 will be the first subjects from a considerable series of important masterpieces in The Hermitage, St. Petersburg. (For Particulars, see The Society's Prospectus.)

NEW MEDICI PRINTS FOR 1910.

(List and Prices subject to amendment):—

The following are SPECIAL Publications from THE NATIONAL LOAN COLLECTION, by permission.

CAINSBOROUGH - Gainsborough Dupont *17s. 6d.

 A limited number of Monochromes of this picture NOW READY, in the same size. Price 10/6: postage 6d.

LAWRENCE - Miss Georgina Lennox *17s. 6d.

GIORCIONE (?) - Portrait of a Man - *25s.

TITIAN (Sir H. Lane's Collection) Portrait of a Man - *25s.

* Maximum prices, likely to be reduced. Special Prospectus of above subjects post-free.

Subscriptions to the above Four Plates, payable on publication of the first, may be entered on the following terms:—By The Society's Annual Subscribers at £3. 3s. post-free; by the Public at £3 9s. post-free.

The following are the chief subjects (in addition to the above) proposed for issue in 1910:—

		s.	d.			s.	d.
GIAN BELLINI A Holy Allegory ...	25	0	R. VAN DER WEYDEN	St. Luke Drawing the Virgin	17	6
MICHELINO Dante and his Book ...	25	0	BROUWER The Gamblers ...	12	6
BOTTICELLI The Virgin Mother ...	17	6	VANDYKE Philip, Lord Wharton ...	—	—
GIORCIONE Concert Champêtre ...	21	0	PATINIR The Baptism in Jordan ...	17	6
BORGOGNONE M'na, Child and Saints ...	15	0	REMBRANDT The Old Soldier ...	—	—
CORREGGIO The Education of Cupid ...	17	6	LANCRET The Music Lesson ...	20	0
J. DE' BARBARI Portrait of a Man ...	15	0	FRAGONARD The Stolen Kiss ...	—	—
LUINI M'na of the Rose-Bower ...	17	6	NATTIER M'me Sophie de France ...	—	—
RAPHAEL Madonna della Tenda ...	20	0	HOLBEIN Georg Cloze ...	17	6
REYNOLDS Viscount Althorp (set 4) ...	17	6	CRANACH The Rest on the Flight ...	17	6
LELY (?) Oliver Cromwell ...	10	6	DÜRER The Virgin and Child ...	17	6
GAINSBOROUGH The Duchess of Devonshire ...	21	0	VELASQUEZ Infanta Margarita Teresa ...	17	6
HOLBEIN King Henry VIII, ...	10	6

And other Subjects: also THE POPULAR MEDICI PRINTS (price 6s. each).

 Some 60 Medici Prints have been published already.

CATALOGUES. Summary Lists of Italian, English, National Portrait Series, French, and Flemish Series of Plates; also of Popular Medici Prints, Prints after Originals in the National Loan Collection, &c.,—all or any post-free.

The Society's Complete Prospectus, with full details of ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION, Frames, &c., post-free for 3d. Stamps, or Completely Illustrated, 1s. stamps or P.O.

Drawings by Albrecht Dürer—Detailed List of 64 Facsimiles after these, post-free 2d. stamps, or with 64 Illustrations, 1s. stamps.

PHILIP LEE WARNER, Publisher to The Medici Society, Ltd., 38, Albemarle Street, London, W.

The Nation

VOL. VI., No. 16.]
Registered as a Newspaper.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 15, 1910.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., 4d. Abroad, 1d

CONTENTS.

	PAGE		PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK ...	625	The Manners of the Peers. By Stanley Wightman ...	643
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—		What it comes to. By A. A. Jack ...	644
The Old Cause and the New ...	628	Children's Care Committees ...	644
The Central Issue ...	629	By B. L. Hutchins ...	644
The Price of Mr. Balfour ...	630	The Administration of the Licensing Laws of England and Wales. By Hugh Edwards ...	644
Where is Imperial Preference? ...	631	OUR YOUNGER POETS:—
The Problem of Latin America ...	632	II.—Frederick Niven ...	645
Who Started the Class War? ...	633	WORLD OF BOOKS... ..
LIFE AND LETTERS:—		REVIEWS:—
The Dump-Shop ...	634	The Philosophic Despots ...	647
"Our Fathers have told us" ...	635	Fielding, the Man ...	647
The Roman Parallel ...	636	One Side of India ...	648
The School of the Zoo ...	637	The Enigma of Pascal ...	649
SHORT STUDIES:—		The Unsocial Pastime ...	650
The Basis of the Wage. By Charles Inge ...	639	"Madness from Within" ...	651
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—		BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
Liberals in Ireland. By A. M. Sullivan ...	640	The Cathedrals and Churches of Belgium ...	654
The Archbishops and the Election. By J. Fletcher-Little ...	640	Turkey in Transition ...	654
Richard Cobden on Women's Suffrage. By Mrs. Cobden Unwin ...	641	A History of Malta—1798 1815 ...	654
The Psychology of Conversion. By Harold Begbie, Professor Caldecott, C. F. C. Lyall ...	641	Our National Drink Bill ...	654
"What we are fighting for." By "A Mother of Sons" ...	643	The Court of a Saint ...	654
The Indian Police. By F. C. C. ...	643	Egypt ...	654
London Library Subject-Index. By a Member of the London Library Committee ...	643	Lord Kelvin's Early Home ...	656
		The Plays of Aeschylus ...	656
		THE WEEK IN THE CITY. By Janus ...	656

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

WE have never known anything like the cataract of lies and absurdities which has been poured down upon the British people during the last few weeks. We select a few. (1) Mr. Balfour and Mr. Chamberlain have both declared that food taxes tend to diminish the cost of food. (2) Mr. Blatchford's 28,000 new workers at Essen has been raised to 38,000, and made to figure in a Tory pamphlet to point the contrast between this miraculous draft of German workmen and the Liberal dismissals at Woolwich Arsenal. (3) The daughter of the Bishop of Limerick has written a pamphlet addressed to British Mothers, in which she says: "We are enriching Germany at such a rate that she is building rapidly, from money stolen out of our pockets, a magnificent fleet," with which we "shall be conquered and become the slaves of Germany." "Germany has spies all over England," and "in a couple of years' time" will "march on London and dictate terms to us." (4) We observe that in one constituency the local Tory leaders are using Mr. Blatchford's Atheism against the Labor candidate and his Jingoism to confound the Liberal candidate. These tactics were well described by Mr. Churchill (who gibbeted a certain admiral with the life-like description of Lord Charles Blatchford) when he said an Anglicised German was being used to raise the Socialist scare and a decayed Socialist to raise the German scare.—Our own propaganda has been far more truthful and scrupulous, but we think the talk of German black bread is overdone. The fault of bread in protected countries is not so much its quality as its price. Meanwhile, the whole Liberal Party is serenely confident of victory.

THE Prime Minister's Election Address, issued on Monday night, is a masterly statement of the central issue of the election, the veto of the Lords. The Budget, he said, having to meet the double call of social reform and national defence, proportioned its new charges amongst the luxuries, superfluities, and monopolies, leaving the necessities of the poor untouched. The Protectionists then "mustered and set in motion" "the formidable interests and influences" which they wielded to destroy it. This was a wanton breach of the Constitution, committed in order to save Protection "from a mortal blow." In addition to this, the Lords had set themselves up as an "insuperable obstacle to democratic legislation." A limitation of the veto was, therefore, the first and most urgent step to be taken.

* * *

SPEAKING at Ipswich, the Prime Minister made one of the most finely argued speeches of the campaign. He quoted against the nonsense that protective duties do not raise prices the memorandum of the German Government in 1902, that the raising of duties would benefit agriculture by equalising inland prices and the prices of foreign wheat. He showed that in Austria-Hungary, Spain and Portugal, and the United States, the same results occurred. At Salisbury, he again called upon Mr. Balfour to identify the items in the swarm of indirect taxes with which he now threatens the British people, and to say whether he would tax corn, meat, butter, maize, or bacon, or all of them.

* * *

MR. BALFOUR has followed up his prophecy that his party will win "sooner or later." Going from strength to strength, he has wagered that the Liberal majority of the next Parliament will be less than 330. On the economic side he has advanced some further steps in the direction of pure Protectionism, accepting the Protectionist maxim that the producer and, above all, the national producer, should be preferred before the consumer, which is another way of saying that labor is a less important element in industry than profit. At York he developed this position as far as to suggest that State burdens should, as far as possible, be transferred from direct to indirect taxation. The rich should be taxed on their "luxuries" rather than on their income and capital. He declared for corn taxes, which he had the audacity to say would lessen the cost of food, and "pledged" himself that the taxation of necessities should not be increased "proportionately to the general burden of taxation," whatever that may mean. Mr. Balfour is the most slippery of politicians, but his pledge would be worthless if he were one of the most steadfast. It seems, but only seems, to reject the second Chamberlain Budget in favor of the first.

* * *

ON Thursday, the Prime Minister delivered, at Bradford, a pungent reply to Mr. Balfour's loose and uninformed handling of the economic question, with its double threat of food taxes and a torrent of indirect imposts. What were the taxes on "luxuries" which Mr. Balfour would substitute for the taxation of profits and income and accumulations? Would he name a few? And what greater luxury could there be than the unearned increment of land? The Premier quoted against the new Balfourism that food taxes will not raise prices, the considered statements of the milling and baking trades, issued in formal contracts and notices to their customers, that a rise in the price of flour and bread, or a reduction in the size of the loaf, will immediately follow the imposition of an import duty on foreign corn. This notice, for instance, of the day of the little loaf, had been put up in sixty bakers' shops:—

The Millers' Association announce that should a duty be imposed on wheat, a corresponding increase in the price of flour will be charged to the baker. We, as bakers, hereby notify our customers that should a tariff be imposed the weight of our bread will be decreased in proportion.

The Prime Minister concluded with a fine appeal to his Yorkshire fellow-countrymen to strike a blow for the Constitution, for freedom, and for popular rights.

* * *

On the constitutional question, Mr. Balfour has gone near to the Curzon theories of hereditary power without quite endorsing them. At Glasgow, he justified the Lords for giving Tariff Reform a last chance and destroying the Budget, which Mr. Asquith described as the death-blow of Protection. He defended the hereditary principle on the ground that the Monarchy was based upon it, and thought it less dangerous than an elective Second Chamber co-equal with the Commons. For that reason he desired to see the House of Lords remain as it was. The Government's plan simply gave the appeal from the House of Commons to the House of Commons. Both its method and its aim in abolishing the hereditary veto were revolutionary. He admitted that he had used the House of Lords to kill the Education Bill of 1906. The Bill violated the principle of religious equality, "which," added Mr. Balfour, "I and my friends desire."

* * *

THE Chancellor of the Exchequer has delivered a series of speeches in the racy, defiant, unshrinking style which makes him at once the best loved and the best hated man in the country. The theory and practice of hereditary legislation have never been so trenchantly attacked since Mr. Chamberlain exchanged Radicalism for reaction. Woven in with the rhetoric and sarcasm have been bits of true eloquence. Thus at Cannock: "Do not put your liberty in pawn to the House of Lords; you will never get it back." And of the elector who would vote for the Lords—"It is your own sword that you ungird." Criticising at Wolverhampton Mr. Balfour's defence of the hereditary principle by a comparison between the King and the House of Lords, he showed that the King vetoed no measures, and signed Liberal and Tory Bills impartially; acting, in fact, as the neutral medium of party government which the House of Lords falsely pretends to be.

* * *

THE plot against the people leaks out a little at a time. Lord Lansdowne, in a moment of inopportune candor, has completely justified everything Mr. Ure said about the danger to Old Age Pensions involved in the return of a Tory Government. He was asked by Mr. Alfred Beesly practically to say whether he was in favor of an Act which, while it guaranteed the continuance of the pensions on the present basis to all persons now over seventy, would provide that future pensions should only be paid on a contributory basis. To this, Lord Lansdowne, who denounced the Pensions Act with unsparing vigor, replied, on the 10th inst., reserving in the clearest way the power of any future Government to "modify the conditions under which Old Age Pensions may, at a future time, be awarded." In other words, the Tory Party is prepared to make the old people pay for their pensions, and, as there cannot be two kinds of pensions, one contributory and one non-contributory, the whole class of pensioners lies in almost as much danger at the hands of Mr. Balfour and his friends as do the food, necessities, and comforts of the people. It seems to us that, under these circumstances, every pensioner should be called upon to vote Liberal or Labor. We see no other way of making pensions safe.

* * *

THE issues of this election are many, but those of peace are not the least urgent. We are glad, therefore, to note the vigorous, truthful, and pointed rebuke to Mr. Balfour, which comes from the National Peace Council, and bears the signatures of Lord Courtney and Dr. Spence Watson. "At the last moment," it says,

"a base attempt has been made to confuse your judgment by exciting fear and jealousy of a friendly Power, the German Empire, which is represented as being engaged in a conspiracy against our native land. On behalf of the united peace organisations of the country we ask you to dismiss all such appeals to ignoble prejudices and, when you are casting your votes, to give no mandate to any candidate who has taken part in this odious agitation. Everywhere the increase in the machinery of war is condemned by the awakening conscience of the time. The only danger lies in the fact that a minority on each side of the North Sea is endeavoring to wreck the new relations of friendship which all responsible statesmen desire to strengthen. We ask you to withstand, wherever you meet them, these dangerous enemies of the commonweal. We ask you to make sure that your candidates of whatever party will not only profess peace, but will, if returned, support all possible reductions of armaments, and all efforts to establish permanent peace by international agreement.

"The price of peace, as of liberty, is perpetual vigilance. We appeal to-day to the body of the nation, confident that its power, its moral and social progress, can be secured only through the maintenance of international peace."

* * *

OUR Paris correspondent writes:—"Every French progressive feels anxious about the result of the British election, for a Conservative victory would mean that England withdraws from the great European movement towards democracy, which has captured France and Italy, is advancing in Germany by leaps and bounds, and has, at last, permeated even Turkey, Spain, and Russia. It would not be in the true sense of the term a Conservative victory, but a victory for reaction—the suicide of representative government in its birthplace. Frenchmen have other reasons for anxiety. They cannot be disinterested in the relations between England and Germany, since France would inevitably be involved in the event of an Anglo-German war. The majority of them feel that a Conservative victory would make an Anglo-German war far more probable. Indeed, after Mr. Balfour's speech at Hanley, it would almost amount to a declaration of hostilities."

* * *

"THE people in France who want war with any country are a small minority, largely composed of those who claim to represent Christianity. France owes much to the teachers in the public schools, and they have no greater claim on her gratitude than their effective action in stamping out the militarist spirit. The triumph of that spirit in England, just at the moment when its supremacy in Germany is seriously threatened, would be a blow to the hopes and aspirations of French democrats. A great effort has been made to persuade the French people that a Conservative victory would be to the interest of France. The 'Temps' has lent the whole force of its influence to this effort. In its leading article on foreign affairs it has attacked the Liberal Government with a bitterness unusual in its comments on the internal affairs of another country. This is unfortunate, for the reason that the 'Temps' is commonly regarded abroad as a semi-official mouthpiece of the French Government. But, in fact, although it may at times publish inspired communiqués from the Foreign Office, its bulletins de l'étranger more often merely expresses the opinions of M. Tardieu, and for some time past they have been hostile to liberty and democracy in every country in the world."

* * *

THE meeting of the Prussian Diet has been notable for the disclosure of the financial situation, and for the reopening of the franchise question, to deal with which a Bill is promised. The Prussian State deficit for 1908 reached 10 millions sterling. That for 1909 fell to 5½ millions; that for 1910 is estimated at 4½ millions. Another loan is inevitable, and no taxation is proposed to achieve a permanent balance. The relative improvement is ascribed to a good harvest and better trade. It is well to note, in view of our own fiscal controversies, that a large part of these deficits is due to the necessity of raising official salaries, admittedly to meet the enhanced cost of living caused by the last tariff. The Franchise Bill will revive a perennial controversy, which finds the Socialists in good heart. But it is not likely that the Government will alter the three-class system of voting, or introduce the secret ballot. An illustration of the working of this system, which even Bismarck described as the worst in Europe, has been furnished by an incident at Kattowitz. The Poles and Clericals combined at the polls, and many officials, including a number of teachers, voted (publicly) for the Polish candidate. To enforce "official loyalty," they have all been removed from their posts.

* * *

THE new Turkish Cabinet has now been constituted under Hakki Pasha, who has returned from his diplomatic post at Rome. The most notable of its new members is the Generalissimo, Mahmud Shekret Pasha, who now combines with this post that of Minister of War. The two Young Turkish leaders, Talaat and Djavid Beys, retain their seats at the Interior and the Exchequer. A Greek and an Arab are included, but no Armenian. Indeed, one of the several reasons assigned for Hilmi Pasha's fall is that he showed in dealing with the assassins of the Adana massacre a greater severity (tardy and halting though it was) than some Young Turks thought prudent.

* * *

THE selection of a diplomatist specially conversant with the Cretan question as Grand Vizier has aroused conjecture. It is rumored that the Powers propose to induce Turkey to permit the annexation of Crete to Greece in return for an indemnity and a guarantee from the Concert of the integrity of the rest of the Ottoman Empire. The Turkish Chauvinists on their side certainly desire an alliance with Greece to balance the Bulgars, whom they really fear. An odd, if indecisive, confirmation of these rumors comes from Geneva. The Powers have cancelled the appointment of a Swiss inspector for Cretan finances. Does this mean that the present international régime is nearing its end?

THE bewilderment caused by the startling American proposal for the neutralisation of the Manchurian railways has made this week the chief interest of international affairs. Mr. Knox has suggested that Japan and Russia should both voluntarily retire from the control of these lines, allowing themselves to be bought out with a loan raised by a cosmopolitan syndicate. China is to own and work the system, but under the supervision and control of America, Britain, France and Germany. This large scheme is coupled with another proposal, which has no necessary connection with it, for the construction of a competing and parallel line from Tsitsihar to Chinchau, by an Anglo-American syndicate on behalf of China. The apparent motive of the proposal commands respect. It would remove all further risk of conflict between Russia, Japan, and China in this Far Eastern cockpit. It might also give to a slowly reforming China the chance of resuming effective control of a territory which has thrice been filched from her. On the other hand, the plan might lead to a sort of condominium of the four Powers in Manchuria.

* * *

THE attitude of the interested Powers gives small hope of the acceptance of the scheme. Such Russian opinion as is articulate declares that military necessity compels her to retain a railway which is the key to Vladivostok. But one must not hastily assume that any Russian newspaper speaks for the whole Government. The Government is rarely a unity. The Japanese, so far as can be judged, are unanimously angry. They see in this proposal a revival of the coalition of 1895 which robbed them of Port Arthur. How, they ask, could the value of a railway be appraised which cost them 100,000 lives? They are not disposed to regard America as disinterested, and they appear to be particularly suspicious of Germany. Great Britain and Germany are said to have expressed their approval of Mr. Knox's idea. France, as usual, is ready to assent when the other Powers have made up their minds.

* * *

THE wanton murder of a Paris policeman and the wounding of three of his comrades by an armed "Apache" has set the whole capital discussing the problem of hooliganism. It is a singular phase of decivilisation. The apache is rarely a mere criminal who murders to rob. He wages war on society, has his own brutal code of honor, and seems to work as much for glory and the display of a perverted spirit as for actual spoil. The first result of the incident has been the issue of an authorisation to the police to use their weapons in self-defence. The second consequence has been the starting of an interesting debate on the influence of the apache in the French Army.

* * *

THERE are, it seems, some 11,000 convicted criminals in the ranks of the conscripts. It is easy to believe that they consort together in barracks, corrupt their weaker comrades, and use the uniform as a cloak for crime. But the other alternative of confining them to the invariably brutal rigor of disciplinary battalions, there to be isolated, branded for life, and hardened into hopeless rebels, is equally objectionable. It is one of the inevitable dilemmas of conscription. The graceful and human side of this affair was the public funeral attended by the Premier, the Presidents of the Senate and the Chamber, and a large file of judges, notables, and officials, which Paris gave to the murdered policemen. In such democratic recognition of simple courage and duty we are much less happy than the French.

Politics and Affairs.

THE OLD CAUSE AND THE NEW.

By the time that these words are read the people of this country will have begun to cast their votes, or to cast them away. They can elect one of two parties. The first, the Liberals, will rule the country by the methods of government with which it is familiar. They will act through the House of Commons as the sole taxing authority and the predominant legislative power. The electors will thus have their hold on them, and in due time will reward their good stewardship or avenge their bad. The other party is of an entirely different character. It is not a normal British party, resting on the will of the electors. When it is beaten at the polls, it runs to the Lords to restore the fortunes of war. Its leaders telegraph to them across the lobby for the destruction of some Bills which are adjudged dangerous to Toryism, or the passage of others whose rejection might be more dangerous still. These wearing-down tactics have now been abandoned. They merely weakened the Constitution by placing the Tory Party at so great a premium, and the Liberal Party at so heavy a discount, that the old balance between progressive and conservative forces was almost destroyed. But this was not enough. In a rash moment Liberalism laid a hand, a light hand, on the landlords. For this act the Constitution has been made to pay, not merely through the undue stretching of powers by one authority in it, but by a seizure of the dominant power in the State. Not only the control of legislation, but the power of the purse and the power of dissolving Parliament, was, on November 30th, snatched from the representative House by the hereditary Chamber. The voter who enters the polling booth to-day was then told by the House of Lords, as clearly as if the message had been written down by Lord Lansdowne, that he might have Tory laws but not Liberal or Labor laws, Protectionist Budgets but not Free Trade Budgets, food taxes but not land taxes; that, in fact, the whole area of his powers and choice was in future to be fined down to a point of forced agreement between a Liberal Government and a dominant, permanent, unyielding, all-powerful peerage. In pursuit of this policy about 670 gentlemen, wearing the guise of work-a-day Toryism, are proposing to go into the House of Commons to enact and carry out its subordination to the House of Lords; to say, in fact and in deed, that it shall never work in freedom till it has had flung to it the permit of the hereditary Chamber.

This is the issue. Of course, it is wrapped up, evaded, falsified, run away from, and only revealed in the covert sneers of Mr. Balfour and the more candid insolence of Lord Curzon. But the men who were to "refer" the Budget to the people, in a spirit of such calm and gentlemanly candor that Mr. Balfour asks the electors to pass them a vote of thanks for their service to representative democracy, have never lost an hour since the prorogation of Parliament in covering up that issue with the gaudiest lures and baits—such as high wages, constant employment, a tariff to tax everything and make everything cheap, anti-Germanism, national pride, Jingo passion; an appeal to all that is little and narrow and spiteful in a people so as to make it forget what is high-minded and great. Every device has been used to keep the issue of popular liberty out of sight, as Louis Napoleon kept it out of sight for nineteen years, so that the Lords might not only kill representative government, but kill it in the dark. Every sophister in the Tory Party, from Mr. Balfour downwards, has come forward to gloze over the deed, and play, as he thinks, upon the people's small skill to distinguish the false from the true.

We have, therefore, come back to the old cause of liberty, fought on almost precisely the same ground as that on which Hampden fell. If we cannot uphold the sole right of the Commons to tax, no man standing between them and those who send them to Westminster, we may roll up the map of social reform as well as of political democracy. If the insult of November 30th had been inflicted on one of the worst Houses of Commons of the century, instead of on one of the best, the usurpation of the Lords would have been not one whit the less flagrant. If we had done it in the interests of Free Trade, as the Tories have done it in the hope to revive the Corn Laws, we should have deserved the sentence of excommunication that we hope and believe awaits the gang of revolutionists who now masquerade as Tories, or Fair Traders, or Unionists. But, in fact, the action of the Lords is the touchstone of modern politics. We have a definite vision of the State. They have another. They mean England to remain what she is to-day, or to return to what she was before cheap food gave her small middle classes and her workmen under the Great Industry their first chance to thrive, and the franchise their first chance of power. The Lords fought hard all through the nineteenth century to stop that evolution. They failed, and now they meet a demand for a modern England, a more decent, hopeful, Christian society than we have ever envisaged. They will not admit it. They have risked all to stop it. Enriched by the labors of the new urban communities, not only will they return to the State no percentage on their vast toll on industry, but they look with eagerness to the hope of fresh and abundant tribute gathered by the machinery of a "scientific" tariff. By this means have the Prussian Junkers quartered themselves on the German, and the industrial barons on the American, people. Thus secure, they have the Empire at their feet, its defence provided by food and labor taxes, the cities of Great Britain cramped for their wealth, her country-sides barren for their pleasure. Protection in its turn will either dull the spirit of the workers, or drive them into wild Socialism, and thus provide a tame or an easily gulled proletariat, fitfully violent, but waking mainly at the war-cries of their creatures in the Press. Only one way lies to this revolution, the crushing of the Mother of Parliaments. They have taken it. Four years ago she admitted the elect of the workers to a large share in popular representation, and she witnessed and forwarded the rise of the new Liberalism, in our view the main hope and guarantee of an orderly, progressive development, based on the double ground of Free Trade and constructive social reform. This was her crime; for this is she menaced and defied. It is to her defence that her sons are summoned to-day. Great is the contest: let us not fail her in her need.

THE CENTRAL ISSUE.

MR. ASQUITH'S election address concentrates the issue between the electors on a single point. He refuses, and rightly refuses, on this occasion even to glance at any secondary questions of whatever magnitude. He takes his readers with unswerving directness and unanswerable logic over the steps which have led to the question of the hour, and have gathered the entire forces of privilege on the one side, and of freedom on the other, for a decisive encounter. He reminds the electors that the Government, returned four years ago to maintain Free Trade, have found themselves faced with the necessity of meeting vast additional expense in the interest of national safety and of social progress; that the Budget met this expense without infringing on Free Trade, and without touching the necessities of life; that, seeing in the Budget the deathblow to Tariff Reform, the House of Lords determined on its rejection, thereby committing a "wanton breach of the settled practice of the Constitution"; that further, while their claim to control finance is a "mere usurpation," experience has shown the "unlimited veto" of the Lords to be "an insuperable obstacle to democratic legislation"; and that, accordingly, "the limitation of the veto is the first and most urgent step to be taken," as the "condition precedent" to all the great legislative reforms on which the party is set. Every link in the argument is solid, and the conclusion is irresistible. In essentials there is but one question before the electors, but it is a question to which all others lead up, and on the answer to which they one and all depend. For nearly eighty years we have advanced slowly and tentatively, but, as we have all believed, with assured progress and no backward glances, on the path of democracy. Now we have reached the summit of the pass where land and liquor, privilege and birth, wealth and power, have concentrated their forces behind a constitutional archaism to bar the way. If they can defeat us here, we shall scorn to admit—what indeed we barely contemplate—that the fight is lost, but we shall have to enter on a long and arduous campaign before we can move one foot further. When we capture the position, the road lies straight and clear before us. It is the centre and the citadel that are in question in the elections that begin to-day. The question is whether the suffrage, gained in three successive stages, though still incomplete, is to be a reality, or whether it is to be nullified by the retention of an irresponsible element, superior to the representatives of the people, and without rational pretension to impartiality or moral weight.

Now, it is impossible under the system to take a direct popular vote on any single issue, and that is one reason among many for dismissing without mercy the plea of the Peers that they are "consulting the people." But everything that it is possible to do in order to secure a mandate on any single point, Mr. Asquith has done. His Albert Hall speech was clear and precise on the question of the veto. His election address is not only clear and precise; it is limited, and rightly limited, to that single question. Every point that he mentions is shown to lead up to this conclusion, and the limitation of the veto is declared to be the "first and most urgent step to be taken." We have urged on previous occasions that if the Liberals obtain a majority, be it great or be it small, it will be a majority on this issue, and in view of Mr. Asquith's pronouncement we can affirm it now with increased confidence. And we may add this much. Should the Government, after all, fail in their object, their policy and the policy of the party will remain unchanged. The limitation of the veto is the condition, now and for the future, of the retention of office by them or by any future Government that may represent the Liberal Party. It is the "condition precedent" to the reform which Liberals have at heart, and no Liberal leader with the experience of the past four years behind him will stultify himself by promising reforms which he cannot be sure of carrying out. If, in opposition to all expectation, the Lords succeed in holding the fort, they are not to suppose that, as this has been the first onslaught upon their position, it will be the last. The contest must, in Mr. Gladstone's words, "go forward to an issue." Few men were more averse from organised constitutional change than that great leader, and it was only prolonged experience which taught him at the very close of his career to admit its necessity. It is a similar experience, graven still more deeply on their minds by repeated and serious strokes, which has forced the Progressive parties to the same conclusion, and compelled them to subordinate everything to the supreme question whether the people of England shall retain the right to reform their own institutions, or shall fall back under the tutelage from which it has been the task of three generations to set them free.

THE PRICE OF MR. BALFOUR.

Comparative Naval Strength in the So-called Danger Year (1912).

GREAT BRITAIN AGAINST GERMANY ALONE.

Reckoned in Battleships and Armored Cruisers (according to the figures of the "Navy League Annual.")

Great Britain...	101 ships of 1,492,800 tons.
Germany ...	42 ships of 578,120 tons.

GREAT BRITAIN ALONE AGAINST THE TRIPLE ALLIANCE.

Great Britain...	101 ships of 1,492,800 tons.
Triple Alliance ...	69 ships of 865,112 tons.

[N.B.—Italy is far more likely to put a ship of war on the seas against Austria, her nominal ally, than against this country.]

AMID the din of the General Election a solitary voice is heard from time to time, which appears to be communing with itself. Now the voice is faint, now, again, it is borne nearer on some gathering wind of false doctrine. It offers remarks, in the conditional and parenthetical mood, on tariff reform and constitutional government. It expresses a belief that "sooner or later" its party may win, and, in a vein of unusually rash affirmation, that the election of 1910 will not be in all respects a replica of the election of 1906. We may remark in passing that the voice is popularly supposed to be that of the "leader" of the Conservative Party, though, in fact, there is no such thing as a Conservative Party, and the party which has replaced it has no leader.

For two elections running, Mr. Balfour has refrained from saying a single word which reveals a convinced opinion on the fiscal question or offers an intelligible direction to his reputed following. For two elections, it has been impossible for any man to say with confidence that, in the average acceptation of the terms, Mr. Balfour is either a Free Trader or a Protectionist. If that question were put to him to-morrow, he would refuse to answer it. For nearly seven years, all political parties have been in full cry at his heels, and have never succeeded either in capturing him or in running him to earth. To this day the people of this country do not know on what plan he would tax them. The people of our Colonies are equally ignorant whether he will keep the door open for their goods, or will build an intervening wall only a little lower than that which he will construct against the foreigner. Since 1903, Mr. Chamberlain has offered two mutually destructive tariffs to the judgment of the Empire. The first proposed to put the Colonies on the free list, the second on a minimum schedule. The first suggested a false balance of remissions and impositions of food taxes, the second proposed food taxes without any such remissions. Not one of these schemes has Mr. Balfour discussed. In his speech at York he has, indeed, declared for taxes on foreign corn, and for a general oppression of the people by indirect taxes, coupled with a false, meaningless pledge that the new imposts on the necessities of life shall not increase the proportion of taxation which the poorer classes are to pay into the Exchequer. No fiscal statesman in a Protectionist country ever gave such a pledge, or, if he did, ever redeemed it, for the simple reason that what the poor pay in stomach taxes is not merely the amount that goes into the public Treasury (which, in Germany, so far as the various corn taxes are concerned, is about one-ninth of the extra charge to the consumer), but the vastly greater amount absorbed in traders' profits on the tax and in the rise of prices on the entire product. No light is here thrown either on the revenue which Mr. Balfour hopes to collect from his taxes—apparently it is to yield a net £0 0s. 0d.—the sources from which that revenue is to come, or the nature of the preferences to the Colonies. Mr. Balfour maintains the same dead-centre of indifference to the constitutional question. He is free to "reform" the House of Lords or to leave it unreformed. He is open to accept the Constitution or to destroy it, to put the Lords over the Commons, or to declare in 1910 that representative government stands in the position which he deliberately assigned to it in 1907. Not one clear, serious, informative word has he spoken on any domestic problem now before the country. He may be a Conscriptionist as well as a Protectionist; just as well he may be neither. He wills nothing, controls nothing, forwards nothing—standing a passive, mechanical receiver of a thousand brawling party notes, which he gives out again in a kind of reedy tremolo, and abstaining from all vigorous, manly, and truthful contact with an acute and perilous situation.

It is inevitable that a man so devoid as Mr. Balfour of a proper sense of responsibility to his country, to his party, and to himself, should, by his prolonged and deliberate abstention from the duties of his position, be laying up for himself an heritage of difficulties which will overwhelm him if he is ever again called to power. Not a stone of the Protectionist policy has he laid since 1903; even the ground-plan of the house is wanting; neither the Colonies, nor the country interests, nor the town interests, nor the various trade interests, have had more than a few confused and self-contradictory hints, wrapped up in intentionally evasive verbiage. The moment Mr. Balfour quits the House of Commons, where he can pass all policies through the sieve of his sceptical intellect, he leaves the nation unguided. With one exception. On the one question on which he was well justified in speaking with care—namely, on our relations with Germany—he has used a free, a foolish, and an evil tongue. During the debates on the Navy scare of the spring, Mr. Balfour set an example of exaggeration, and to-day, his estimate that in 1912 Germany would possess twenty-one or twenty-five "Dreadnoughts," then, as now, an impossible task for her, acts as a constant provocation to further falsehood. Then, as now, he spoke for a party object. To some extent, his incurable looseness in the statement of figures excused him from the charge of deliberate mischief-making. No such relief can now be offered him. He has suggested a widespread belief among European Powers in the inevitability of an Anglo-German war, and he has attributed to some unknown German citizens language which he knew would have an especially insulting and provocative ring in the ears of the ignorant at home.

This, therefore, is Mr. Balfour's one articulate contribution to our electioneering. He has chosen the cry which is the worst, the falsest, and the most dangerous to himself, to his country, and to the peace of the world. If Gladstone could be called to account by the Austrian Ambassador for a perfectly truthful statement as to Austrian foreign policy, and could be told by the Queen that he would "have to bear the consequences" of it, with far greater propriety will the German Ambassador ask Mr. Balfour, if he ever again becomes Prime Minister, whether his policy towards a great and friendly nation is to be that of the Hanley speech. In our opinion this will be the least serious of its results. After all that has been said and done during the last two years, Germany, we are afraid, will have ample ground for taking a Tory Government to be a hostile and a provocative Ministry. That may not mean war, and if it did, the nation might well pray that, in mercy to England, Lord Lansdowne and Mr. Balfour might be prevented from waging it. But it does mean that Germany will look at a Balfour Government with a deeply and justly foreboding eye. Germany knows, as Mr. Balfour knows, that our naval strength is to hers as three or even four to one. She knows, or thinks she knows, that with such men as Mr. Balfour at the head of a party, and such men as Mr. Garvin and Mr. Maxse and Mr. Blatchford at the tail of it, the question of honorable and peaceful relationships between the two countries will rest on an entirely different footing from that which obtains under Mr. Asquith and Sir Edward Grey. Therefore, the simple, immediate cash result of a Balfour Government must be the piling up of so many more millions of anti-war insurance premiums on the helpless shoulders of the British and German peoples. This is the price of incendiarism; for a low party trick so much grist goes out of the industrial mill, so much more of the stock of civilisation runs to waste and ruin. Between Mr. Balfour's constitutional crisis, and Mr. Balfour's Budgets, and Mr. Balfour's defence estimates, and Mr. Balfour's inevitable wars, the nation is likely to pay heavily for the luxury of keeping on a dilettante as an alternative Premier. It will pay for his want of mental energy and resource, of power of choice and direction, of healthy human interests; for his blank ignorance of finance; for his barren, unpractical mind and indecisive character; for his complete indifference to the lot of the people, his fumbling incapacity to set himself to practical issues, for his pessimism in thought, his feebleness in action. But it will pay heaviest of all for his lack of heart and conscience.

WHERE IS IMPERIAL PREFERENCE ?

NOTHING is more striking throughout this election campaign than the complete collapse of the Imperialist note so loudly sounded in the earlier years of Tariff Reform. Though Mr. Chamberlain still inserts in his many letters of encouragement to candidates some phrase reminiscent of his earlier enthusiasm, and Mr. Balfour finds a perfunctory place for Tariff Reform as a bond of Imperial union in his perorations, there has been no pretence of arguing the case for Imperial Preference and a self-sufficing Empire. Imperialism, having served its purpose of imparting a glamor of larger patriotism to the launching of Tariff Reform, is shoved aside, and Protection stands out naked and unashamed. It was inevitable that this should be so. When, so far back as 1897, Mr. Chamberlain, eager as Colonial Secretary to find the biggest rôle his office admitted, proposed Free Trade within the Empire, the proposition was received with derision in our self-governing Colonies. Canada and Australia were well enough aware that no Colonial Governments which permitted Great Britain to "dump" her cheap goods freely on their shores could stand for a single hour. Successive Colonial Conferences drove home the lesson, obvious before, that Colonial tariffs were made for Colonial, not for Imperial, purposes. The deeper significance of the lesson was, however, temporarily obscured by the wave of Imperial sentiment which led Canada to grant a largely illusory preference to the Mother-Country on the occasion of a revision of her tariff. The war fever afterwards was skilfully manipulated so as to evoke from the other Colonies similar concessions. When Mr. Chamberlain, in order to cover the disasters of the Boer War, precipitated the fuller policy of Tariff Reform, he thrust into the front of his appeal these "offers" from the Colonies, floating Protectionism on this abounding ocean of Imperial sentiment. It is true that he conjoined with this appeal reference to the advantages of a British tariff for purposes of negotiation or retaliation against foreign nations who dealt unfairly with us in their fiscal arrangements.

Such was Tariff Reform in its initial stage, Imperial union first, negotiation second, Protection a bad third. The trouble with Mr. Balfour all along lay in the fact that he pretended to accept this appraisal of the motive forces, refusing to assent to any form of Protection which was not merely incidental to one or other of the superior motives. It is always possible to maintain that Mr. Balfour, with all his recent endorsement of the definitely Protectionist positions, such as "taxation of the foreigner" and "remedy for unemployment," has not fairly toed the Protectionist line. But, however this may be with this reluctant "leader," the whole party fight to-day is fought upon the crudest Protectionist lines. The Colonies, to do them justice, never built anything on British preference. They feigned, however, for a time, some inclination for Imperial conventions in which some common trade policy should be worked out. A significant article, however, from the headquarters of Canadian Imperialism, Toronto, which appeared in the "Times" a week ago, now may be said to give the coup de grâce to the whole notion of tariff conventions. Mr. Balfour's dilatory policy of summoning an Imperial Conference to discuss the basis of commercial union for the Empire is described as one which "would give the minimum of advantage and the maximum of disadvantage." The writer points out that "the Colonies have made their tariffs for themselves, and similarly a British Government must be expected to have a supreme concern for home interests." Each country must consult its own interests. "Any other course of action must breed friction and dissatisfaction, and give force to the objection so often urged by British Free Traders that an Imperial tariff may become an organ of discussion."

It was, indeed, so obvious from the outset that no one of our new British nations would compromise its dignity and its commercial freedom by entering a Tariff Union that history will explain all the vapid talk about such a Union as serving merely to grease the slide of the Tory Party into Protection. Yet so persistent is the power of humbug that we still find Imperial preference figuring as a formal plank in the Tariff Commission scheme as newly propounded by Mr. Hewins, the "economist" retained to put sham science into the product of greed and charlatanry. The "scientific" tariff foreshadowed by this preposterous authority consists of a general tariff for countries that admit British goods "on fair terms," a higher tariff for those that do not, and, finally, a lower tariff for the Colonies. Following the Colonial lines, this means a preferential tariff high enough for protection against Colonial goods which may compete with British goods, a tariff against fair-dealing foreigners higher than is needed for protection, and, therefore, wasteful for revenue, and an instrument for "negotiation" which can only operate by menace, never by concession. So we see how all the bubble of sentiment in favor of a generous response to the offer of our Colonies ends in an impudent proposal to tax their wheat and meat, as a means of drawing closer the bond of Empire. "The ablest architect of ruin the world has ever known" could hardly have devised a fitter instrument than that which Mr. Hewins brandishes for impoverishing England, inflaming the hostility of foreign nations, and offending our Colonies.

THE PROBLEM OF LATIN AMERICA.

WHEN Mr. Taft referred in his recent message to the growth of American interests in South America, and to the political responsibilities which everywhere follow investments, the student of international affairs was fairly warned that the years to come may drag the Latin Republics from their isolation. It was easy to read in that message the guiding of Mr. Root. Alone among the men who influence the foreign policy of the Great Powers, he has made a special study of South American questions. Alone among the statesmen of either continent, he has carried out an extended personal tour from Republic to Republic. Nor is it difficult to guess what concrete form the new development must take. The opening of the Panama Canal, when at length it takes place, must transform the politics of the New World as profoundly as the piercing of Suez transformed the affairs of the East. It will bring the two Republics which are at present, perhaps, the least developed, the least accessible, and potentially among the richest of these Latin territories, as definitely within the influence of the United States as Mexico itself. Colombia and Ecuador, on which the new stream of trade and politics will first impinge, are also the least able to resist and control a movement of penetration. Peru, more civilised and more settled, is also destined to find its geographical conditions transformed. The other and more immediate problem to which Mr. Root's message referred was in all probability the sudden concentration of American capital upon Argentina. The Beef Trust, which has its centre in Chicago, is in process of evolving from a Continental into a world power. In its designs upon the markets of the Old World, which means primarily our own country, one formidable competitor alone stood in its way—the ranches of the Argentine. The beef trade of the Argentine is already a developed and centralised industry, with some eight exporting companies in control. To bring these eight companies within the Trust was a measurable problem. The preliminary phases of the battle for control have already gone so far that there is now only one of these companies of which experts care to affirm that it is quite certainly independent and likely to maintain its independence. To this phase of economic conquest there are no necessary limits. One staple export may follow another; even wheat might follow beef. The capitalist who can manipulate tariffs dreams already of the triumphs which might be won in South American ports by subsidised shipping lines.

The Monroe Doctrine has availed to remove a Continent for ever from the realm of European adventure and romance. Who now remembers the exploits of British arms on the River Plate? It is difficult to realise that diplomacy was once seriously exercised with the prospect that Louis Philippe might accept the throne of Argentina, which was at one moment actually offered to him. The fear lest Napoleon should escape from St. Helena to found an Empire over Gauchos seems to-day the most fantastic of all the embroideries of a legend. It is hard enough to reconstruct the generation in which Garibaldi created the red-shirt tradition in the waters of Monte Video. That age of romance has given place to the struggles of Chicago magnates to control the export of chilled beef. The Republics figure on the world's stage chiefly as the indispensable human organisation behind the fluctuations of some raw material in the international markets. Coffee suffers from over-production, and the politics of Brazil become for a moment lucid. Cocoa passes through a phase of large demand and high prices, and in that phase so sober a student as M. Bérard thinks he can detect the reasons of the German intervention in Venezuela. It seems to the European mind less intelligible and less dignified than the antipathies of races and the wars of churches which are familiar to us. But it touches at least concrete things, and holds the destinies of multitudes who depend on them for well-being.

It would be well for us in our own domestic controversies to imitate something of the realism which makes the price of cocoa or beef a subject of interest to the modern diplomatist. There is no question more relevant to our own fiscal controversy than the evolution of South America. Its problems make for us no theme of political discourse. If a new schism were to arise in a Balkan Church, our newspapers would devote more attention to it than they do to a tendency in trade and politics which may end by modifying the vital conditions of our food supply. It is no doubt the very stability of the greater Republics which has removed them for many years from popular attention. Brazil, Argentina, and Chile, which account among them for 87 per cent. of the trade of the sub-continent, have passed beyond the turbulent stage of civil war, revolution, and repudiation of debt. Their history has become one of a rapid commercial development, in which immigration and education between them are fast introducing European conditions. Buenos Ayres has become the second city of the Latin world, inferior only to Paris in population, while the influx of Italians and Spanish newcomers into the Argentine has swamped the original inhabitants among whom the old turbulent traditions might have survived. It is still possible that in any of these Republics a conspiracy or a coup d'état may disturb the regular transmission of power from one civil party to another. But the organisation of business has become at last so dependent on credit, and so intimately knit with world-finance, that a serious or devastating revolution is hardly more thinkable or probable than it is in the Latin States of the Old World. It is on the continual building of railways, the opening up of the interior, the bringing of new regions rich in pasture or awaiting the plough within reach of the parallel stream of immigration and investment, that the energies of the greater Republics are bent. One has only to glance at the statistics of their commerce to realise the meaning of these activities as they affect ourselves. We send to the Argentine some 54 millions sterling in imports. We draw from it some 73 millions in exports. The balance represents, roughly, the interest on the British capital invested in its public securities, its enterprises, and, above all, its railroads. The lowest estimate of this invested capital puts it at 250 millions; the highest at 500 millions. These figures are the best answer which could be condensed in a few lines to the argument for preferential trading. We are pleased to think of the Colonies as ours. We apply no such term even to a State like the Argentine, which owes its development primarily to British capital. It is, however, sufficiently obvious that no preference could be put upon Colonial wheat and beef to the prejudice of the products of Argentina without dealing a blow at a prosperity which is an organic part of our own well-being. The mischief would be by no means confined to the rise of prices in our own markets. Just in so far as the preference was effective, would the capital owned here cease to yield its revenues. Exports would dwindle, the railways would cease to pay, and the public securities shrink in value. The loss would certainly fall upon the foreigner in Buenos Ayres, but the decline of the debtor community would be also the embarrassment of the creditor nation. Such considerations, indeed, are not so much an argument against Imperial Protection as a demonstration of its impossibility. In the struggle of the interests to make a tariff, the force behind that 500 millions invested in Argentina would know how to protect itself. World politics turn, indeed, upon finance, and the same factors which are making the destinies of Latin America are capable of conserving Free Trade at home.

WHO STARTED THE CLASS WAR?

THE speeches of the Peers, whose campaign came to an end on Monday, have thrown a light on a particularly interesting aspect of a most interesting struggle. The phrase "class war" used to be a special property of militant Socialism. It was understood to mean the permanent and unsparing animosity of those elements of the proletariat who were conscious of their class as a class oppressed and wronged by the exploiting forces of society. This rankling sense never penetrated very far into modern English politics. The men who tried to make it the motive power of a political appeal were few in number and not conspicuously successful in their methods. English society, though much less homogeneous than French, was in this way far less ready to obey impulses of mutual suspicion and revenge. Classes lived in isolated worlds, but they lived in general on terms of outward peace or, at any rate, of tolerance. Nothing, indeed, is more striking and perhaps surprising than the temper of patience and forbearance in which the classes that have to endure all the storms and havoc of life have regarded those who watch those storms in suave calm and sunshine and shelter. The class war, with all its magnificent phrases and its mobilising ideas, sweeping across the sky of Europe like a message from its heroic revolutions, has been an idle and empty tale in the ears of the English poor. It has never touched their lives or kindled their imaginations. We do not mean, of course, that the rich and the great are always cherished by the poor with respect and affection; an eighteenth century novelist's remark that in any English village in his day the poor were in silent league against the village potentate may be true of the sombre silence of the twentieth century agricultural laborer. What we mean is that in English politics there has been singularly little attempt to inflame the poorer classes; that the fierce spirit of party has very rarely clothed itself in social passions, and that the experience of the nineteenth century has shown how idle was that dread that made our ancestors picture English civilisation as menaced by what Pitt called "the liquid fire of Jacobinism." The instincts and the memories that were expected to give a volcanic fury one day to the disinherited classes have scarcely stirred or murmured in their century's sleep.

At first sight, it might appear strange that this social Lethe should have been disturbed by the very class that might have been expected to dread an awakening. A challenge from the rich to the poor seems a wild adventure. But those who are surprised by this event forget that the aristocracy, too, has its common hatreds and jealousies. As the attack of the Peers on those popular liberties which were thought to be established for all time has developed, there has been revealed a class consciousness far more powerful than any common resentment of injustice or any common sentiment of hope among the poor. The educated classes have been brought up to dread some horrible outbreak of disorder from the shadows in which the common people live; what society had not hitherto realised is that the class which has now formally challenged the nation is enveloped in a far more bitter, a far more stubborn, and a far more rapacious social atmosphere than the atmosphere of the field or the workshop, or of the alley and inn. The last few weeks, to borrow a metaphor from one of Gillray's cartoons, has taken the lid off a great seething volume of class arrogance, of which most persons have hitherto been scarcely conscious. We have had Peers boasting of their tyrannies; we have had Peers thinking that it profited their cause to parade their contempt for the working classes; we have had Lord Curzon descanting on the glorious (and spurious) title-deeds of his order. But most significant of all is the speech in which Lord George Hamilton, blurting out on a platform what is in the mind of many members of his class, asked whether anybody wanted a little Welsh solicitor to manage the finance of the nation. "I am sorry," wrote Lord Carlisle to George Selwyn, when that ornament of the aristocracy was threatened with a rival candidate who was a timber merchant, "that this damned carpenter is giving you trouble. What idea can he have in his head outside a plank?" Lord George Hamilton feels exactly in the twentieth century as Lord Carlisle felt in the eighteenth. The aristocracy forgets nothing. Government is still its own exclusive business, and those who are outside its charmed circle cannot buy a place in the direction of affairs by any talent or any virtue; they can only buy it by doing the pleasure of the aristocracy. It is this supreme pride of class, with its intoxicating illusions and its powerful stimulus, that explains the outbreak of the Peers. They are so profoundly immersed in the conviction that politics is their business, that all the glory of English life is simply the lustre they shed on their surroundings, that they assume that the nation will admire their violence. Just as the boisterous captain in "Evelina" thought that it was an honor to the wretched Frenchman to be rolled in British mud, so the gay English lord thinks that the nation rather likes being kicked, if only it is kicked by the boot of a Peer.

The pride of class is rooted in the history of the aristocracy. The aristocrat comes, as it was once well said, from a class that has always been accustomed to find its society welcome, and has therefore learned to move with grace and ease. But if pride of class is to be one of the springs of politics, is there any class that has less right to it than this? The humbler classes and races have, as Mr. Lloyd George said, a history no less ancient. They have a history that is far more innocent. If England is now a country of great estates, if she alone in Europe has no peasantry, if her laborers live under the shadow of poverty and hopelessness, with no rights over the soil they till, and no status in the village they inhabit, the fault does not lie at the door of the poor. It was not the poor who swallowed up eight million acres of common land in less than a century; it was not the poor who destroyed the small farms or threw down the cottages; it was not the poor who drove the laborer into the meshes of the Speenhanland system, and it was not the poor who built palaces out of the famine of the Great War. All Englishmen had ancestors living in the eighteenth century; it is the Englishmen whose ancestors were ruling in the eighteenth century who have to answer to the nation for those days of desolating pillage. If rapine is in the blood of any class, it is in the blood of this, and if any class has shown itself to be incapable of governing with justice and integrity, it is the class that would forbid those outside its close families to have any share in government at all. It is the supreme interest of this momentous election that the aristocracy which has all these sins against the public good on its conscience has attacked the self-governing rights of the nation in the name of the monopoly which it so flagrantly abused. This is the class that has started on a class war. This is the Vesuvius whose lava threatens to overwhelm our peace and our civilisation.

Life and Letters.

THE DUMP-SHOP.

To impose upon the minds of the more ignorant part of the electorate the conviction that "the foreigner" is our enemy, and that the Liberals are aiding and abetting him in his insidious designs against our trade and our country, is the sinister task to which Conservative electioneering is addressing itself. The latest and most realistic mode of this suggestion is the Tariff Reform Shop in which the "dumping" iniquity of the foreigner is exposed by a windowful of various goods priced and labelled with their country of origin. The extent of this "conspiracy" is indeed calculated to alarm the spectator. So many sorts of foreigners are in it. Germany, indeed, as we might expect, is well to the front. She has the audacity to send us blankets, petticoats, socks, corsets, table-covers, linoleum, saucepans, soap, dishes, and, with a sardonic humor, honey-pots, besides a variety of other things which we are quite able to make for ourselves, but somehow are misled into getting Germans to make for us. But, grievous to relate, our cherished ally, France, comes next in the number and variety of her outrages. She not only throws on our market large quantities of lace, tulle, and other articles of taste and ornament, but has the effrontery to present us with a fireproof teapot. The United States inflicts a number of injuries, chiefly in glass and metal ware. But no nation is too small or too weak to refrain from similar insults. Here are kid gloves from Belgium, embroidery and lace from Switzerland, wine glasses from Bohemia, and, insult added to injury at such a time as this, spirit decanters from Sweden. Indeed, Sweden is detected of a crime of peculiar atrocity. If you visit the dump-shop in the Walworth Road, you will see set forth in visible enormity, a Swedish door sold at five shillings and sixpence, the knots cut out and stuffed with sawdust puttied over—a redoubtable sermon in wood.

A certain risk, no doubt, is involved in this realistic mode of suggestion. Intelligent passers-by, who may be electors, take note of many articles which, for lack of materials, skill, science, or taste, cannot be made at all, or made so well, in this country. Many of the goods are seen to be so common and so cheap that it would not pay an English firm to make them. Moreover, in a poor neighborhood the interests of the consumer are not easily stifled; and we saw many a hungry glance, especially from women, cast at the low-priced articles. Since the great mass of retail purchases are made by women, the woman elector, when she gets a vote, may surely be expected to safeguard, even more jealously than men, the consumer's interest.

The Tariff Reform shop is an interesting example of how a half-truth may conceal, or even pervert, a whole truth. For, if the other half of the trade involved could be set forth, the false suggestion would at once lose all its fear, and the beneficence of international trade stand manifest to the most ignorant man. The other half would be seen in Berlin, in Paris, in Philadelphia, in Basle, where a similarly constructed window would display the immensely more numerous and various sorts of British goods "dumped" on the French, German, Swiss, American markets in payment for the goods shown in the Walworth Road.

The whole "philosophy" of Protection, however, consists in ignoring the consumer and in confining attention to one side of every act of commerce. "If the foreigner gets the job, the British worker goes without," is the inscription scattered broadcast over the parade of foreign dumping. Each chair that comes from Sweden represents an English cabinet-maker done out of a day's work, even though the Englishman has done the best-paid work upon it; each German blanket takes away an English weaver's job. The reasoning is so simple when once the premise is admitted that there is only a given quantity of jobs to go round, and to the worker, absorbed in the immediate demands of a little local market, this appears a self-evident truth. So, when "the foreigner" sends in goods of a sort that could, and therefore should, have been made in this country, he has clearly done you out of a job. When, therefore, you and your companions are unemployed, you know it is because the foreigner has taken "your work." It is true that, if you could be taken to Berlin or Paris or Chicago, you would find plenty of foreign workers equally indignant because their Government, with all its pretended Protection, had failed to secure the home market for them by keeping out British goods. British workers have taken their jobs.

But our Tariff Reformers are assiduous in keeping out of sight the other side. Their argument is one incessant demoralisation and derationalisation of commerce. Each article the foreigner sends us is an injury, even though we retaliate by inflicting a similar injury on him: the essence of international trade, as they see it, is a fight between rival nations for a limited and insufficient market. To support their view, a whole chain of lying suggestion has been woven. Not only does the foreigner take your job, he makes you pay his taxes. Every wall portrays the infamy of this proceeding. Here is the honest British workman turning in despair towards the adjoining poor-house, while just across the ocean stands the German customs house officer, carrying a bag swollen with English sovereigns which should have gone as wages to this British workman and his mates. Presumably the English exporter accompanies his goods across the ocean, carrying in English money the tax required to secure their entrance! At any rate, a flow of English gold (how procured it does not appear) is extorted by Germany from the wage-fund of English labor. What does Germany do with it? She uses it to build more "Dreadnoughts" for the purpose of invading our coasts. Why Germany should be so foolish as to contemplate killing the bird that lays so many golden eggs, is not evident. Apparently her malignity exceeds her greed. But the doctrine of this triple wrong is quite succinct. Germany takes our work, makes us pay her taxes, and intends to punish us for the damage she is doing us. Since within the last three weeks leading statesmen of the Conservative Party have committed themselves, separately, to each of these three positions upon unemployment, the incidence of a tariff, and the policy of Germany, it is no matter for surprise that the meaner sort of politician should rely upon these vile suggestions for catching votes.

It may, perhaps, occur to ask "What should the foreigner do, if he were a real gentleman and meant well by us instead of evil?" Ought he to keep clear of our shores and our markets altogether? No, for we require him to buy our surplus manufactured goods, and it seems a necessity that he should therefore sell something to us. The "dirty" foreigner, it seems, has a function in commerce, both as buyer and as seller. Providence designed him to buy from us certain sorts of fully manufactured goods. He should not be allowed to buy from us any articles which have not got a full complement of British labor in them. We should not sell him yarn; it is even doubtful whether we should sell him cotton or woollen cloth; rather we should aim at selling him the completed articles of clothing or of furniture. Even complete tools or machines we should withhold, because when he gets them he will use them to compete against us. So, too, we must not sell him ships, or he will steal our shipping trade, or coal to run his furnaces. He must be forced to buy such sorts of finished manufactured goods as he cannot use against us. On the other hand, he must send us only raw materials or foods, of such sorts as we cannot produce at home or in our Empire.

Since Free Trade and the natural play of international interests do not appear to secure this exchange, we must bring legislative "science" to bear upon the problem. By fiscal force we are to revert to the situation of seventy years ago, with England as the great workshop of the world, receiving from all other lands raw materials to be wrought into manufactured goods which they would purchase to our immense profit.

Such is the impossible, insane ideal which our Protectionist statesmen are preaching.

"OUR FATHERS HAVE TOLD US."

We have forgotten, else it would be impossible they should try to befool us. We have forgotten the terrible years when England lay cold and starving under the clutch of the landlords and their taxes on food. Terror is soon forgotten, for otherwise life could not endure. Not seventy years have gone since that clutch was loosened, but the iron which entered into the souls of our fathers is no more remembered. How many old laborers, old operatives, or miners are now left to recall the wretchedness of that toiling and starving childhood before the corn-tax was removed? Few are remaining now, and they speak little and will soon be gone. The horror of it is scattered like the night, and we think no more of it, nor imagine its reality. It seems very long ago, like Waterloo or the coach to York—so long ago that we can almost hope it was not true.

And yet our fathers have told us of it. They and their fathers lived through it at its worst. Only six years have passed since Mrs. Cobden Unwin collected the evidence of aged laborers up and down the country, and issued their piteous memories in the book called "The Hungry 'Forties." Ill-spelt, full of mistakes, the letters are stronger documents than the historian's eloquence. In almost every detail of misery, one agrees with the other. In one after another we read of the quartern loaf ranging from 7d. to 11½d., and heavy, sticky, stringy bread at that; or we read of the bean porridge or grated potato that was their chief food; or, if they were rather better off, they told of oatmeal and a dash of red herring—one red herring among three people was thought a luxury. And then there was the tea—sixpence an ounce, and one ounce to last a family for a week, eked out with the scrapings of burnt crusts to give the water a color. One man told how his parents went to eat raw snails in the fields. Another said the look of a butcher's shop was all the meat they ever got. "A ungrly belly makes a man desprit," wrote one, but for poaching a pheasant the hungry man was imprisoned fourteen years. Seven shillings to nine shillings a week was the farm laborer's wage, and it took twenty-six shillings then to buy the food that seven would buy now. What a vivid and heart-rending picture of cottage life under the landlord's tax is given in one old man's memory of his childish hunger and his mother's pitiful self-denial! "We was not allowed free speech," he writes, "so I would just pull mother's face when at meals, and then she would say, 'Boy, I can't eat this crust,' and O! the joy it would bring my little heart."

We have forgotten it. Wretched as is the daily life of a large part of our working people—the only people who really count in a country's prosperity—we can no longer realise what it was when wages were so low and food so dear that the struggle with starvation never ceased. But in those days there were men who saw and realised it. The poor die and leave no record. Their labor is consumed, their bodies rot unnamed, and their habitations are swept away. They do not tell their public secret, and at the most their existence is recorded in the registers of the parish, the workhouse, or the gaol. But from time to time men have arisen with the heart to see and the gift of speech, and in the years when the oppression of the landlords was at its worst a few such men arose. We do not listen to them now, for no one cares to hear of misery. And we do not listen, because most of them wrote in verse, and verse is not liked unless it tells of love or beauty or the sticky pathos of drawing-room songs. But it so happens that two of the first who saw and spoke also sang of love and beauty with a power and sweetness that compel us to listen still. And so, in turning their well-known pages, we suddenly come upon things called "The Mask of Anarchy" or "The Age of Bronze," and, with a moment's wonder what they are all about, we pass on to "The Sensitive Plant," or "When We Two Parted." Or, as we pass, we may just glance at the verses and read:—

"What is Freedom?—ye can tell
That which slavery is, too well—
For its very name has grown
To an echo of your own.
'Tis to work and have such pay
As just keeps life from day to day
In your limbs . . .

'Tis to see your children weak
With their mothers pine and peak,
When the winter winds are bleak—
They are dying whilst I speak."

Or, turning on, perhaps, in search of the "Ode to the West Wind," we casually notice the song beginning:—

"Men of England, wherefore plough
For the lords who lay you low?
Wherefore weave with toil and care
The rich robes your tyrants wear?

Wherefore feed, and clothe, and save,
From the cradle to the grave,
Those ungrateful drones who would Drain your sweat—nay, drink your blood?"

And so to the conclusion:—

"With plough and spade, and hoe and loom,
Trace your grave, and build your tomb,
And weave your winding-sheet, till fair
England be your sepulchre."

Or else, in looking once more for that exquisite scene between Haidée and Don Juan on the beach, we fall unawares upon these lines:—

"Year after year they voted cent. per cent.,
Blood, sweat, and tear-wrung millions—why? for rent!
They roared, they dined, they drank, they swore they meant
To die for England—why then live?—for rent!

And will they not repay the treasures lent?
No; down with everything, and up with rent!
Their good, ill, health, wealth, joy, or discontent,
Being, end, aim, religion—rent, rent, rent!"

The men who uttered such lines were driven from their class, their homes, and their country. They were despised and hated, like all who protest against oppression and remind the smug world of uncomfortable things. But they were great poets. One of them was our sweetest singer, the other was, when he wrote, the most conspicuous figure in Europe, and the most shattering force. Even England, which cares so little for her greatest inheritance of passionate intellect, cannot yet forget them. But others who sang the same terrible theme she has long forgotten, or she keeps them only on the shelves of curious and dusty investigators. Such men, we mean, as Ebenezer Elliott, Ebenezer Jones, Ernest Jones, Thomas Cooper, William James Linton, and Gerald Massey, who so lately died. They were not high-born, nor were they shining poets like the twin stars of freedom whom we have quoted. Little scholarship was theirs, little perfection of song. Some had taught themselves their letters at the forge, some in the depths of the mine, some sang their most daring lines in prison cells where they were not allowed even to write down the words. Nearly all knew poverty and hunger at first hand; nearly all were persecuted for righteousness' sake. For maintaining the cause of the poor and the helpless they were mocked and reviled; scorn was their reward. The governing classes whose comfort they disturbed wished them dead; so did the self-righteous classes whose conscience they ruffled. That is the common fate of any man or woman who probes a loathsome evil, too long skimmed over. The peculiarity of these men was that, when they were driven to speak, they spoke in lines that flew on wings through the country. Ignidation made their verse, and the burning memory of the wrongs they had seen gave it a power beyond its own expression. Which shall we recall of those ghostly poems, once so quick with flame? Still, at moments of deep distress or public wrong-doing, we may hear the echo of the Corn-law Rhymer's anthem:—

"When wilt thou save the people?
O God of mercy! when?
Not kings and lords, but nations!
Not thrones and crowns, but men!"

Or if we read his first little book of rhymes, that may be had for twopence now, we shall find the pictures of the life that was lived under Protection—the sort of life the landlords and their theorists invite us to enact again. From his "Black Hole of Calcutta" we take the lines:—

"Bread-tax'd weaver, all can see
What that tax hath done for thee,
And thy children, vilely led,
Singing hymns for shameful bread,
Till the stones of every street
Know their little naked feet."

Or let us take one verse from the lines, "O Lord, how long?"

"Child, what hast thou with sleep to do?
Awake, and dry thine eyes!
Thy tiny hands must labor too;
Our bread is tax'd—arise!
Arise, and toil long hours twice seven,
For pennies two or three;
Thy woes make angels weep in Heaven—
But England still is free."

Or we might recall "The Coming Cry," by Ebenezer Jones, with its great refrain:—

"Perhaps it's better than starvation,—once we'll pray, and then We'll all go building workhouses, million, million men!"

Or we might recall Ernest Jones and his "Song of the 'Lower Classes,'" where the first verse runs:—

"We plow and sow, we're so very, very low,
That we delve in the dirty clay;
Till we bless the plain with the golden grain
And the vale with the fragrant hay.
Our place we know, we're so very, very low.
'Tis down at the landlord's feet;
We're not too low the grain to grow,
But too low the bread to eat."

Or shall we take just one verse from the terrible "Easter Hymn," written by the same true-hearted prisoner for freedom:—

"Like royal robes on the King of Jews,
We're mocked with rights that we may not use,
'Tis the people so long have been crucified,
But the thieves are still wanting on either side.

Chorus—Mary and Magdalen, Peter and John Swell the sad burden, and bear it on."

The iteration of the idea throughout the poem is tremendous in effect, and the idea comes close to Swinburne's ode, "Before a Crucifix":—

"O sacred head, O desecrate,
O labor-wounded feet and hands,
O blood poured forth in pledge to fate
Of nameless lives in divers lands,
O slain and spent and sacrificed
People, the grey-grown speechless Christ."

Time would fail to tell of Linton's "Torch-Dance of Liberty," or of Massey's "Men of Forty-eight," and there are many more—the utterance of men who spoke from the heart, knowing in their own lives what suffering was. But let us rather turn for a moment to the prose of a man who, also reared in hardship's school, had learnt to succour misery. Speaking at the time when Protection was biting and clawing the ground in the last death-struggle, and all men but the landlords hoped, Carlyle asked this question of the people:—

"From much loud controversy, and Corn-law debating there rises, loud though inarticulate, once more in these years, this very question among others, Who made the Land of England? Who made it, this respectable English Land, wheat-growing, metalliferous, carboniferous, which will let readily hand over hand for seventy millions or upwards, as it here lies: who did make it? 'We,' answer the much-consuming Aristocracy; 'We!' as they ride in, moist with the sweat of Melton Mowbray: 'It is we that made it, or are the heirs, assigns and representatives of those who did!'—My brothers, You? Everlasting honor to you, then; and Corn-laws many as you will, till your own deep stomachs cry Enough, or some voice of Human pity for our famine bids you Hold!"

So our fathers have told us, and we have forgotten. It is all very long ago, and the Protectionist says that times have changed. Certainly times have changed, and it was deliverance from Protection that changed them most. But if landowners have changed, if they are now more alien from the people, and richer from other sources than land, we have no reason to suppose them less greedy or more pitiful; nor can a nation live on the off-chance of pity. Seventy years ago the net encompassed the land. We have seen how the people suffered under its entanglement. In the sight of all, landowners and speculators are now spreading that net again. Are we to suppose the English people have not the hereditary instinct of sparrows to keep them outside its meshes?

THE ROMAN PARALLEL.

THE modern world has all but lost that rhetorical habit in which our great-grandfathers used to indulge, of basing their politics upon classical parallels. Our demagogues do not pose as reincarnations of the Gracchi. Our terrorists do not talk of Brutus. Our Imperialists rarely remember the proud consciousness, so common at the close of the eighteenth century, that the achievements of Rome are a warning and example. Yet the enlargement of the canvas of history has, in fact, made such parallels more natural than they were in earlier generations. Archaeology has pulled the four corners of the world together, and taught us to think rather in periods than in centuries. The lapse of time that divides us from the Punic wars is no greater than that which is covered by the rise and decay of the Minoan civilisation in Crete. We can dimly discern that the real epoch in that vast lapse of years was the passing of the age of bronze into an age of iron. We may suspect that to those who come after us and read our foreshortened annals under a few feet of accumulated refuse, the one significant fact in all the two thousand years which divide us from the rise of Roman dominion may be, neither the spread of Christianity nor the barbarian invasions, still less the Renaissance and the Reformation, but merely the use of electricity and steam. The "ancients" in our contemporary view of world-history are nearer to us than they ever were to Montesquieu and Gibbon. Catastrophes have dwindled in the new perspective into transient crises, isolated civilisations into continuous phases, and warring races take their stand in line like the torch-bearers of the Lucretian simile. Lord Cromer's comparison between "Ancient and Modern Imperialism," in the address to the Classical Association which Mr. Murray has published in book form, is an invitation to take this wider outlook, and to think, not only "Imperially," but "historically." We are midway in some process which will stretch far beyond our own day, only to figure in the chronicles of our race as one episode among the rest.

Lord Cromer works out his parallel with considerable erudition. There is here and there a human touch which reminds us that the man who wrote these pages was himself the successor of the Ptolemies and the Galli who had sway before him on the Nile. But his conclusion is on the whole that there is no parallel at all, or at least no parallel between the Roman and the British Empires which conveys a lesson or authorises a prophecy. He rightly excludes the self-governing colonies from the comparison. It is our Asiatic and our African dominions, and more particularly India and Egypt, which stand to us in something resembling the relation which bound the provinces to Rome.

Lord Cromer emphasises with an undue optimism, the difference in spirit between the two rules. We have never, since the East India Company was brought under Parliamentary control, levied a direct tribute comparable to that annual subsidy of wheat which Rome exacted from Egypt to feed her proletariat. Our pro-consuls have never, since the time of Warren Hastings, been accused of enriching themselves by extortion and corruption, and it would be difficult in the records of any modern Imperialism to find a parallel to the speech of that provincial governor who told a deputation of his subjects that he regretted only that he could not tax the air they breathed. But it would be hasty to conclude that the motive of financial exploitation is absent in our Imperialism. Even under the Romans the contractor, the usurer, and the monopolist were commonly more formidable than the governor who allied himself with them. The deliberate ruin of Indian industries for the conscious profit of English mills was the work rather of Parliament than of the Company. Statesmen and historians may affect to ignore the constant, silent pressure of the bondholder, the investor, the contractor, the land speculator, the younger son, and the pensioner, but these are the interests which have made Imperialism the accepted creed alike of the City bank and the country house. Our bureaucrats may control these forces as the Romans did not, and see to it that for every payment and profit there shall be some corresponding service. But the financial motive behind Imperialism is none the less as potent in London as it was in Rome.

The real point at which any comparison breaks down is rather the second vital difference on which Lord Cromer insists—our failure as compared with the Romans to assimilate our subjects. The Gauls within a generation of the conquest were talking Latin and giving to their sons the name of Caius Julius. Spain required but a few generations of Roman rule to breed a Seneca and a Martial. The evidence of inscriptions in North Africa points to frequent inter-marriage and the wholesale adoption of Roman names by men of Carthaginian or Numidian stock. In such conditions the sense of foreign conquest must have died out almost as soon as it was complete. Nothing of the kind has happened in India; nor will it ever happen. There may be a sense in which French rule in Algeria or Annam is a little more genial than our own. The social separation may be a shade less absolute than it is in India. But in no European dependency to-day is such an assimilation of conquered and conquerors thinkable as took place under the Romans. It is easy to tabulate the reasons of the difference. The Romans were dealing either with peoples of Aryan stock as white as themselves, or with branches of the older Mediterranean race. Their easy polytheism scrupled at no interchange of gods. Neither color nor religion formed a barrier. Our conquests have confronted us with races which are obviously and physically distinct. They cannot, if they would, Anglicise themselves by a change of name. They have, as the Gauls and Spaniards had not, an old and elaborate civilisation which does not disappear even when it appropriates our science and our politics. Above all, they have a religion which neither yields to ours, nor permits of the more intimate forms of social intercourse. It is quite possible that the Anglo-Indian civilian would never have consented to meet the "natives" on equal terms, even had they been Christians. But it is also true that no Indian or Egyptian Mohammedan would allow his daughter to marry an Englishman, and that no high-caste Hindoo would break bread in his house without a sense of impurity and defilement. It would be interesting to follow Lord Cromer into his tentative speculations on the part which color has played in perpetuating this separation. We are inclined to think that color is rather the convenient badge and symbol of the antagonism than its cause. Egyptians are often white, or even pallid, when the sun-burn wears off, yet to the average Englishman they are a "colored" race. Turks from such regions as Bagdad are commonly darker than Egyptians, yet the most Imperial Englishman is ready to treat them as "gentlemen" and equals. Indians have at least features that betray our common racial origin; the Japanese, though less dusky, are far more obviously of a totally alien stock. Yet, among Englishmen at least, the color line is so drawn as to include the Japanese and exclude the Indians. It is rather the pride of conquest than the insolence of color which makes the separation. But whatever its ultimate explanation may be, the fact of a hopeless and irremediable separation remains. Our Empire is never likely to resemble that of Rome, because we cannot or will not assimilate our subject races. The conquered came to Rome first as slaves, next as teachers and as literary men, then as generals, and in the end as Emperors. Our polity, for all its smooth phrases and more recent reforms, is still in practice based on the principle of keeping the conquered in their place.

Lord Cromer's answer to the question whether an Empire which teaches while it does not assimilate, which shares knowledge but monopolises power, can hope to be permanent, is rather less positive than we should have expected from him. He clearly looks forward to the ultimate emancipation of Egypt at some period beyond our immediate horizon. To the question whether we can retain India he scarcely addresses himself. He argues rather that we must retain it, and even ought to retain it, though he looks forward to some extension of self-government apparently much beyond anything that is latent in Lord Morley's reforms, though still consistent with the retention of our effective supremacy. These things are on the knees of the gods. But while we are dealing in parallels, there are some further points which it is necessary to emphasise. It is true, as Lord Cromer insists, that our rule is incomparably milder, honester, and more beneficent than that of Rome can have been even in its better periods. But it is also true that we carry with us, wherever we go, a standard and a political ideal by which our rule even at its best is tried and found wanting. When the Romans went to the Nile they went quite frankly for wheat; they did not profess that they had gone there to teach the Egyptians to govern themselves. They carried with them into Gaul and Spain, first the teachings of the Stoics, and then the consolations of Christianity. Stoicism was a philosophy of acquiescence and quietism; the early Christians taught passive obedience and a patient waiting for the Second Coming. Both creeds made for a humanitarian attitude, but neither made for revolt. We, on the contrary, have sown the seeds of nationalism and militant democracy, and set our subjects to read, not Epictetus and Antoninus, but Burke and Mill. And that is only the beginning. India and Egypt are Radical and Nationalist to-day. To-morrow they may go, as the Georgians and even the Persians are already going, to Socialism for their political education. Nor can foreign rule under the modern State ever again be what it was from the time of the Romans up to the decline of the Manchester school. It was at its best and its worst merely an organisation for the preservation of order and peace. It left the greater part of life untouched. It ruled the market-place and the open road, but it entered neither the home nor the school nor the factory. To-day the State, in India as in England, abandons this external attitude, to assume a function constantly more intimate and pervading, takes charge of health, regulates the growth of youth, and makes the conditions under which the worker earns his daily bread. The Oriental was indifferent to the drums and trappings of his conquerors, primarily because his conquerors left his daily life alone. The village community and the theocratic church were for him the important realities, and they survived all previous conquests. Our work has been to make the State a fundamental factor in his life. A Viceroy is not merely stronger than a Mogul; he rules and regulates where neither a Roman governor nor an Asiatic tyrant attempted to interfere. The next two generations will decide whether a State so intimate and so pervading can continue to be foreign.

THE SCHOOL OF THE ZOO.

It is one of our regrets that we never saw the educated chimpanzee, Sally, when she held her At Homes in the London Zoological Gardens. There have been apes with greater accomplishments, but these are professionals, highly crammed performers, while we shall always think of Sally as a lady who expanded like a flower in the serene atmosphere of home. Or, if a worse truth must be told, she wiled away her years of captivity by teaching herself the manners of her favorite keeper; and she produced, like the French prisoner who made a complete model frigate out of mutton bones, a work of art that cannot be equalled in the professional workshops of the world.

Lately, we asked a keeper in the present stately Apes' House whether Micky, the senior chimpanzee there, had been taught any of the tricks that Sally knew. He shook his head, and told us that that kind of thing was not now allowed in the Gardens. He seemed to think of the education of an animal kept as a scientific exhibit as a sort of sacrilege, and as such perhaps it is considered by those in authority in Hanover Square. There is believed to be no mean between the elephant that stands on its head and the ape that amused visitors by stirring its tea with a spoon, and so the line has been drawn at the ape. Even the sea-lion has ceased to get up in a chair for its meals, though it must be confessed that the high diving in the sea-lions' spacious new domain is far more entertaining than that was.

It is not that the present secretary has an entire objection to performing animals. In the introduction to Mr. Carl Hagenbeck's "Beasts and Men," * Mr. Chalmers Mitchell writes: "I seldom lose an opportunity of seeing exhibitions of performing animals," but he qualifies what might seem a strange avowal in one who has the guardianship of our Zoo by continuing: "Equally seldom do I enjoy the performance for long, except, perhaps, in the case of sea-lions, who appear to me to enjoy what they are doing." There seems, then, to be some ideal curriculum by means of which an animal should be enabled to show its trained intelligence without loss of dignity, and which might even become a feature of a collection like that at the London Zoological Gardens. There can, of course, be no question of loaded whips, hot plates, and the other tricks that disgraced the animal-trainer till Hagenbeck became a sort of animal Pestalozzi. That bad system was rooted in the time when even our children were submitted to a brutal coercion that defeated its own end—a terrific system that allowed for only a small and select survival of the fittest. There may still be cruel animal-trainers, as there are old-fashioned schoolmasters who would resort to the methods of Wackford Squeers if society did not watch them sharply. There are also impatient men who, against their better judgment, will spoil the lesson by striking unjustly. The knowledge is at least ours that the intelligence of the animal can best be reached and led out by means of kindness, and that rewards are a better stimulus than punishments. The ultimate punishment is expulsion from the class, and it is also an event that happens very early to an obviously unsuited animal, at any rate where the choice of substitutes is not too limited.

It is remembered, however, that in the days of undoubted cruelty on the part of animal-trainers they one and all made pretension that it was "all done by kindness." With his terrible instrument of reprisal disguised in tinsel, the lion-tamer seemed to put his charges through their tricks by dint of smiles and a noisy but harmless carriage whip. And there are sceptics to this day who go behind all appearances and protestations to the contrary, and suspect cruelty at the back of every result. The tricks of the stage animal seem too much outside the nature of the animals that perform them. They are founded, not on extensions of the animal intelligence, but impositions of a grotesque human demand. Even if cruelty has not produced such obedience, it is a cruel thing in itself to make an animal look so ridiculous. Whether it has been done by sugar or by red-hot bars, here is something as revolting in the animal as slavery in a human being, and it should be abolished for its own sake, without inquiry as to how it got there. It is an objection that rules out a large proportion of the circus programme. There is need for a committee of true animal-lovers to draw up an animals' education code.

But never, surely, will the animals at the Zoo become performing animals like those in Hagenbeck's great collection at Stellingen? We agree. But there are other possibilities. The Crystal Palace is vacant, and it has already been suggested that these fine grounds may become a second Zoo for the two or three million people living within reach on the south side of the river. There are already living animals there—in cages—a kind of animal slum compared with what Hagenbeck provides for Hamburg at Stellingen. Some of the teachings of Germany have borne fruit at Regent's Park, in the imitation rockery for sea-lions and mountain sheep, and in the out-door life given even to some of the sub-tropical animals and birds. Squirrels, once kept in tall roofed cages, are now in the open air, with short, unclimbable fences round them. Only a step is needed to enable visitors and lions to gaze at one another across an open ditch nicely calculated in depth and width to exceed the latter's leaping powers. It is an arrangement that has not all the advantages in comparison with bars, but it is one of the notes of the new Zoo. Incidentally, the ditch can economically bound a larger area than can well be covered in with bars, and thus ensures for these great and active beasts a better allowance of fresh air and exercise.

* Longmans, Green, & Co.

It is in the interests of the animals rather than the public that we would suggest some measure of education in captivity. Nothing is more painful than to see a large-limbed and splendid tiger monotonously pacing to and fro in a narrow cage. He knows the exact dimensions of his quarter-deck, puts down each pad in exactly the same place, turns at the same exact moment and with the same toss of the head or down-saw of the chin. And this is often all that he has to do, day after day for months and years, by way of exercise—the essential of continued life. He would be better off even jumping through hoops once or twice a day or in learning some other variant of his monotonous tramp. The wolves can make a better appeal through that pampered friend of man, the dog. The town dog that has no rats or rabbits to run after is taught to take the artificial exercise of fetching sticks from a pond or playing hide-and-seek with the children in the park. In the house he learns to fetch slippers, to make conventional appeal for food, and in many other ways to "perform" for a master who cannot by any stretch of the imagination be said to exercise the cruelties of a trainer. We knew (alas! he is no more), a terrier that had learned to spell coffee with six barks, chocolate with nine, and express other wishes by means of similar conventions. Behind bars, like a Dingo at the Zoo, he would have worn holes in the floor by the precise setting down of his paws, as he walked one eternal circuit round a cage.

There are just three states of animal more or less available for study towards an understanding of the animal universe—the wild animal, the stuffed animal, and the animal in a cage. The stuffed animal is almost as interesting and as instructive as the animal in a small cage. In the wild, we can learn what a being becomes by force of constant and age-long circumstance. In a cage, we might learn what kind of an intelligence it has with which to respond to new circumstances. Almost in spite of every wish of ours to the contrary, all the animals in the Zoo tend to become performing animals. Each bear learns its own method of attracting the buns of visitors. The bear in the pit, too lazy to climb its pole, has an engaging way of lolling like an old man and getting buns thrown into its lap. Another stands up and opens its mouth, another rattles a bar like a dinner bell, a third plays the tambourine with a tin dish. So do the others perform, from the elephant to the squirrel, getting, no doubt, much benefit besides the doubtful one of varied food out of the excitement and interest of this manner of life. The sea-lions dive and field and race for their food; why may not those superb leapers, the jaguars, give similar exhibitions? We believe that the monkeys are quite glum and miserable when there are no human spectators in the monkey-house. It is thoroughly well known that the chimpanzee cannot live in captivity without a human friend. An hour's schooling every day would do many an animal captive a world of good, and add to the scientific value of many an exhibit. The dwellers in the Zoo have suffered an incalculable and, on the whole, unjustifiable robbery. One method of restoration is obvious enough, the enlargement of their liberty to the utmost extent possible to us. May it not be that there is another, the enriching of their lives by means of novel occupation, the guiding of their energies into channels of new scope and, above all, some measure of that human companionship that has made the lot of the dog not only tolerable but happy?

Short Studies.

THE BASIS OF THE WAGE.

THE oblong envelope stuck over the edge of the breakfast tray, looking very white against the coarse greyness of the cloth.

The woman moved forward swiftly from the door, and grabbed it, picking feverishly at the flap. The envelope fluttered to the thready carpet, as she peered at the few typewritten lines, frowning to overcome the momentary spasm in her eyes. After she had read the letter she sat down in front of the tray, smiling a little.

She ate a little bread-and-butter, and sipped at a large cup of tea; but she kept looking at the letter beside her, reading it over and over again; and very soon she got up from the table. For a little while she stood staring at a remnant of pattern at the edge of the carpet, then she crossed suddenly to the mantelpiece, and looked into the mirror, which was covered with little brown spots. She frowned at the oblique hollows in her cheeks, and then into the reflection of her tired eyes. Presently she turned away and left the room.

When she returned, dressed to go out, the landlady was taking away the tray.

The woman spoke hurriedly from the doorway. "At last, I've had a reply; it's the last I answered—the cashier one."

The landlady stood, pressing the tray against her waistband. "I said you'd get one soon; and you would fret."

The woman's forehead wrinkled.

"Oh, I know," continued the landlady, "it isn't nice owing people money, and London isn't the best place to do it in neither, especially when you're alone in the world." Then she made a move to pass out. "Well, anyway, I 'ope you'll be successful; then it will be all right." She moved towards the door.

The woman was examining a pair of stained gloves, finger by finger. She looked up. "I hope so. But I've only been told to call so far. Thank you all the same, Mrs. Bassett."

The landlady turned at the open door. "Oh, you'll stand a good chance against most of them, I know," she announced, "though there's sure to be a lot."

"I'm afraid so," murmured the woman, as the landlady left the room.

As the clock of a church was striking ten, the woman stood in the gloomy entrance passage of a big block of offices, reading the rows of names painted on the wall. Men and women, hurrying into the building, jostled past her. With a slow movement of her eyes she read from the top to half way down the wall; then she turned, walked along the passage, and went up the stone stairs.

On the second floor she hesitated in front of a double, glass-panelled swing-door. Her chin went up with a little jerk as she suddenly stepped forward and pushed in.

On the left side, on a long bench, sat four girls who eyed her as she entered. She glanced at them and crossed to the counter, standing there gazing at the bowed heads of several men who sat writing at a long, high desk. While she waited, a girl came through a door in the partition on the right, made a little grimace of disappointment at the row on the bench, and passed out through the swing-door.

"Next!" called out a youth, coming to the counter and looking at the girls.

The girl next the counter got up.

The youth eyed the woman, carelessly. "Advertisement? Over there, please." He nodded towards the bench; then he returned behind the partition.

The woman sat down on the end of the bench away from the counter.

After a while the girl flounced out from the partition-door, frowning, and crossed to the bench. "Nine to seven," she muttered to the first girl in the row.

"Next!" called out the youth from behind the partition.

The first girl got up. "Nine to seven! Oh, dear!" she sighed. She smoothed down her short brown skirt and pushed up her hair off her forehead with a quick movement of her hands; then she passed through the partition-door.

The woman examined her gloved hands, back and front, gazed at the movements of the clerks at the high desk, eyed the two girls next the counter, furtively; but she kept glancing every now and then at the partition.

So she sat waiting and watching.

As a girl came out through the partition, the youth called out, and the next girl went in; each time the woman moved one place nearer to the counter. At last she sat next to it.

Two more girls came in through the swing-door, one after the other, looked round, saw the woman on the bench, and came and sat down. While the woman was looking at them, the partition-door swung open. The last girl came out, staring blindly ahead. Her under lip trembled a little.

"Next!" called out the youth. "Quickly, please!"

The woman jumped up off the bench and went through.

"Straight along the passage to the door at the end," said the youth, half-turning from a row of speaking-tubes on the other side of the partition.

The woman nodded and moved swiftly along. At the door she hesitated; then her shoulders heaved slightly; she knocked and entered.

"Name?" asked a voice from behind a desk. "Please come forward."

The woman moved up to the side of the desk. "Madge Blenkinsop," she replied.

"Blenkinsop, Blenkinsop," repeated the man, turning a bundle of papers clipped together at the corner. "Blenkinsop, right," he added, without looking up.

The woman watched him as he read her application.

The man looked up; he leaned back in his chair and eyed her with a long searching stare. The woman looked at him, shifted her position, and looked away.

The man continued to stare. "Age?" he asked.

The woman looked back at him. "I'm twenty-eight," she answered.

"H'm. Done anything since this?" The man tapped the typewritten testimonials with the back of his fingers.

"I haven't been able to get anything," replied the woman.

"H'm," repeated the man. "You're a bit old." Then his voice changed to a sing-song utterance. "Cashier at our Camden-road Depot; nine to seven; twelve and sixpence a week; black dress." He looked up at the woman.

Her eyes clouded; and she looked down into the man's face, her forehead puckering. "Twelve and sixpence," she repeated.

"Yes; twelve and six," said the man, "and I've had about two hundred replies." Then his voice softened, as he watched the blank look on the woman's face. "You see, we expect our employees to be living at home. You are living at home, I suppose?"

The woman was staring away at the wall; she looked down at him with a jerk. "I beg your pardon," she said, hurriedly.

"I asked you whether you were living at home," said the man.

The woman nodded her head quickly several times, and swallowed, as if she had a lump in her throat; then she spoke quite slowly. "Yes; I am living at home."

"That's all right, then," said the man, moving in his chair. "You can start next Monday; 264a, Camden-road. Be there at nine. Good-day." He nodded at the woman, and turned to a speaking-tube by his desk.

"Thank you very much. Good-day, Sir," said the woman in a low voice. Then she turned and moved towards the door, walking slowly.

CHARLES INGE.

Letters to the Editor.

LIBERALS IN IRELAND.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. W. J. Johnston, in your number of January 1st, writes a reply to my criticism of the previous week. I certainly cannot complain of the tone and good temper in which he defends the tertium quid of Irish parties. I would very much regret that anything I wrote should be construed as placing obstacles in the way of those who are uniting in the advance towards higher ideals of democratic government in Ireland, and, above all, I would regret that words of mine could be interpreted as reflections on any religious body. What I have striven for in season and out of season for many years, is for the abolition of the political and sectarian tests that cripple a career of merit in Ireland. In common with the Nationalists throughout the country, I have advocated a policy of fair play for all sections, and in this way have waged war largely in the interests of Irish Nonconformists. I have spoken and written in strong terms against the formation of any organisation that perpetuates a system of government by jobbery, because I believe that such a system closes the door of advancement to the talented children of humble citizens, and in Ireland such a system must wreak most injury upon my native fellow countrymen. It has done so. It continues to do so. As far as in me lies, I shall struggle to stop it. I have not only noted, but I have fully appreciated, the history of Ulster politics in recent years. Events there have shown how the spoils system develops clique within clique. The Ulster Nonconformists were foolish enough to tie themselves to the anti-Irish faction in 1886. Fourteen years later they were complaining, with every appearance of truth, that while they bore the burden of the anti-Irish battle, in the division of the spoils the Nonconformist Unionists were given almost as small a share as the Popish Nationalists. It was this that originated the Unionist secession that commenced in 1900, and the split was assisted by the land question which affected a multitude of agricultural Nonconformists. I regret, when these people became sensible of the fact that they were being victimised by the official ascendancy, that they did not make common cause with their Nationalist neighbors, and did not seek to strengthen the Irish Party in their fight for fair play. The Ulster Nonconformists endeavored to form a second Unionist Party to fight the Tories for the privilege of dominating the Irish. In other words, oppressed by one ascendancy, they aimed at substituting another for it. It suited the Nationalists to foster this split. Proverbially, the falling out of the two sets of spoliators should have afforded an opportunity for the country to come by its own. I fear, however, that there is visible in the conflict very little advance towards the democratic ideal of equal opportunities for all classes upon their merits. Whoever won in this contest, we Irishmen were to be no better off than before. The fact that the dissentients from the official Orange Party ultimately assumed the name of "Liberals," did not advance the matter. One might call a tortoise a kangaroo for a long time before the animal would hop.

Mr. Johnston confirms my statement that it was in 1905 that the present body was formed. That, as far as I can see, is not an Ulster organisation. I have never been able to discover what is its policy. Are its members Home Rulers? Many of them, to my knowledge, are not. In spite of the Prime Minister's declaration, some of the "Liberal" candidates in Ulster are disclaiming Home Rule. Mr. Johnston tells us that Home Rule is not an essential tenet of the creed of Irish Liberalism. How a party with unsettled convictions on this point can be trusted to advise anyone on Irish affairs surpasses my understanding. Are they then united on the Budget? They are not. Many of them would vote against it. If they are not without principle, surely they should be able to state their principles. I said, and I see no reason to doubt it, that they band themselves together to seek to procure by political intrigue the appropriation of public offices that should be awarded to merit. It is certain that many subscribers are secured on this basis, and that a number of gentlemen of the most divergent political opinions appear on its platform in the expectation of using the organisation for their personal advancement. In everything, except in name, the workers of the new party imitate the Tories.

We Nationalists complain of this with reason. It is an obstacle to uniting all classes in pursuit of the common good that the Government at Westminster should farm out Irish patronage to any clique. There is no use depreciating the men who succumb to the system. The Irish cause is deprived of the services of many men of ability, especially in my own profession, who find that they cannot as Nationalists compete for recognition against the most incompetent followers of the patronage-mongers. Money becomes an unpleasant factor in politics. Attempts are openly made to supplement by cheque deficiency of other claims. The standard of public life is degraded in the example set by the maintenance of such methods in the distribution of important offices.

I am sorry that Mr. Johnston is not able to correct my deductions as to the patronage policy of his new party, and I gather from the letter of a "Nonconformist Liberal" in your issue of this week, that he does not dissent from that policy which certainly has aroused my wrath, although I am not aware that it has excited my jealousy. I do not suppose that anyone with the smallest knowledge of Irish affairs can suggest that I am attacking political patronage, because I cannot command political influence on my own behalf. The suggestion would be true in the sense that we Nationalists undertake not to trade on our politics. Have the Irish Liberals any such precept for themselves?—Yours, &c.,

A. M. SULLIVAN.

Allone House, Dublin,
January 10th, 1910.

THE ARCHBISHOPS AND THE ELECTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The Archbishops of Canterbury and York have recommended a form of prayer for the benefit of all electors of Members of Parliament, so that they may make choice of fit persons to serve in the Great Council of the Nation. In this prayer the archbishops declare that the vote is a "trust," and I doubt if anyone will dissent from that view. As a nonconforming member of the Church of England, I desire to express the doubt which I feel as to the use of this prayer having the effect which the archbishops manifestly intend. I am led to this doubt by the conduct of the Spiritual Peers on the Budget in the House of Lords. I assume that the individual members of the episcopacy regard their votes there as trusts, and also that before voting these twenty-six righteous men used prayer somewhat similar to that which the archbishops now recommend to be used by the commonalty. If this be so, then apparently their supplications did not avail much, and indeed had quite an undesired effect. Of the twenty-six right reverend fathers in God who had the trust of a vote, twenty-one did not execute their trust. They went not up to the help of the Lord against the mighty. They may have been powerful in prayer, but they stopped at prayer. Do the archbishops desire an overwhelming majority of the electors for Members of Parliament not to record their votes? Is the mugwump or arm-chair politician to be our example of perfection? On the other hand five Spiritual Peers voted, and the record reads like a football score. Archbishops: For the Budget, 1; against, 0. Bishops: For the Budget, 3; against, 1. Of those who vote for Members of Parliament in the coming contests, do the archbishops desire a similar overwhelming majority in favor of the Budget? If not, are they prudent in recommending the use of this prayer?—Yours, &c.,

J. FLETCHER LITTLE.

1, Park Crescent, Portland Place, W.
January 12th, 1910.

RICHARD COBDEN ON WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—We are all aware of the part which Free Trade has played in the public life of England during the past century and of the association with it of the name of Richard Cobden, but few are aware that at this early period his convictions on the subject of women's suffrage were very definite. In 1845, in Covent Garden Theatre, he addressed one of the largest audiences during the Anti-Corn Law Agitation in these words: "There are many ladies, I am happy to say, present. Now, it is a very anomalous and singular fact that they cannot vote themselves, and yet they have a power of conferring votes on other people. I wish they had the franchise, for they would often make a much better use of it than their husbands." Again, in a speech in the House of Commons on July 6th, 1848, he narrated a conversation "with a gentleman who was engaged in drawing up the Charter." This was, no doubt, Francis Place, who asked Cobden to support universal suffrage on the ground of principle. He replied: "If it is a principle that a man shall have a vote because he pays taxes, why should not also a widow who pays taxes, and is liable to serve as churchwarden and overseer, have a vote for member of Parliament?"

In 1860 Mr. Cobden, still adhering to his convictions in a letter to his friend Mr. Joseph Parkes, the father of Bessie Raynor Parkes, now Madame Belloc, who is still living, says: "My doctrine is that, in proportion as physical force declines in the world, and moral power acquires the ascendant, women will gain in the scale. Christianity and its doctrines, though not yet coming up to its own standard in practice, did more than anything since the world began to elevate women. The Quakers have acted Christianity, and their women have approached nearer to an equality with the other sex than any of the descendants of Eve. I am always laboring to put down physical force and substitute something better, and therefore I consider myself a fellow-laborer with your daughter in the cause of Women's Rights."

You Free Traders are doubtless also followers of Mr. Cobden in all the good ideals which he upheld. Amongst those stands pre-eminent the great principle that taxation without representation is tyranny.

At the last election, representatives of the housewife's industry—one of the greatest, if not the greatest, of all industries—worked hard to return a Free Trade Government to power. Without doubt, it was the women of England who, mindful of the days of the hungry 'forties, knew that for them Protection meant less spending power in the family and home. Now is your opportunity to second women in their righteous endeavor to obtain citizenship, and thus secure their support in the present struggle for the constitutional rights of the English people.—Yours, &c.,

JANE COBDEN UNWIN.

Heyshott, Sussex,
January 10th, 1910.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF CONVERSION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—There is a single sentence in Mr. Sidney Low's generous review of my book, "Broken Earthenware," to which it is necessary that I make reply; but before referring to this sentence and furnishing my answer, pray permit me to express my gratitude to Mr. Low for his brilliant and understanding notice of my book.

Mr. Low says that I am on insecure ground when I issue a challenge to science to perform miracles of "conversion"; and he refers me to a subject with which I happen to be well acquainted, medical hypnotism. Now, it is as true that hypnotism can occasionally turn an almost dipsomaniac, if he desire to be saved, into a teetotaller, as that Salvation Army conversion can turn a similar drunkard or a sensual monster into a saint. But, the immense difference! Science cures a malady; conversion creates a soul. Mr. Low's criticism, in fact, underlines the chief contention of my book. I say that science can save a man from himself, but cannot give him the impulse to save others. The whole wonder and the chief beauty of conversion, under the Christian influence, is that it renders fair what was foul, and afterwards creates in the converted and cleansed soul a resistless passion for saving other souls which are yet sunk in degradation and despair.

I do not think that it is either fair or wise to make a comparison between the mad and unreasoning fanaticism of the Mahdi's followers with the quiet, self-sacrificing, and most gentle tenderness of those Salvationists, men and women, who, without sounding a trumpet before them, devote their days and nights to nursing the sick, to comforting the sorrowful, and to saving the lost, in neighborhoods of horror and contagion. Mr. Low may account on physical grounds for the mental disturbance at the moment of "conversion," but who of us will dare to attempt on purely human grounds an explanation for the beauty and the sublime devotion of the after-life?—Yours, &c.,

HAROLD BEGGIE.

Carbis Bay, S.O.,
January 12th, 1910.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—There are many points of interest raised by Mr. Sidney Low in his article on "religious conversion," in your last number. Mr. Low has before him Mr. Harold Begbie's records of a number of conversions in a slum district of London, and he acknowledges the marvellous reforms which are spoken of, most of them, as he notes, being from alcoholism and other forms of extreme sensual indulgence. And he then proceeds towards a conclusion which, from the point of view of religion, is of a most seriously sceptical character. For he equates these changes with the changes due to mental suggestion and hypnotism. The point of these latter changes is that there is not any real object before the mind of the experient; there are only internal perturbations of his own being—even when these are induced by suggestions coming from other people, and therefore originating externally to the patient, they are not really objective, e.g., if a hypnotiser suggests that the patient is a King or the Lord Mayor and should behave more becomingly, the influence takes place, although the patient is neither of these exalted personages. But in many cases the suggestions are quite self-made, and have no external existence in any shape or form. Now it is Mr. Low's contention that the conversions from alcoholism by the preaching of a Divine promise of forgiveness and spiritual help are quite parallel to the above, and would take place even if such promise is quite fictional; in short, that false beliefs are as effective as true ones in producing mental reformation.

This contention is a very common one in our time, especially with people connected with medical studies or taking interest in psychological inquiries. Psychology is taken as capable of giving full and complete answer to the problems of reality. It would be a very serious difficulty in the way of establishing religious truth if this contention were valid. For it cuts away the real veracity of the experience to which religious thought makes its appeal, and closes the gate against all reference to God and to our relationship with Him.

I trust that this momentous subject will be discussed in your pages. For myself, I offer this counter-statement: that a revolution in the soul which is to be of a healthy and a permanent kind can be effected only by rescuing the mind from fictions and from its own unaided efforts for self-guidance by placing it in contact with the real spiritual order of the universe. I maintain that in a healthy state the mind is never self-fed, so to speak; it knows the difference between its own creations and realities, between its own power, and lack of power, and the power which surrounds it, and on which it can draw for support. It may from time to time be misled by its own fancies or be despondent in its times of weakness; but over a long course of years and through a continued course of experience, health, insight, and vigor can come only from contact with what is real.

Now, the conversions on which religion relies are not simply sudden changes taken apart from the subsequent history of the converted men and women, but those in which we have before us records of subsequent health, vigor, and happiness. The records of religion abound with instances of men who, after conversion, have been so unquestionably healthy, so notably sane, and so eminently vigorous, that we acclaim them as types of what man is capable of being. For example, I can think of no healthier and stronger types of human character in quite humble circumstances of life than those recorded in the "Lives of the Early Methodist Preachers"; veritable leaders of men among the strong characters of England from the Yorkshire dales to the miners of Cornwall in the eighteenth century. If these, and others like them, were merely subjects of fictional suggestions, whether induced by John Wesley or evoked in their own minds, on a par with hypnotised patients recalled from mental alienation by Charcot and his assistants, we seem in face of the grim conclusion that there are fictions more effective of sanity and vigor, more beneficent for individual souls and for social welfare generally, than reality itself. We should have to accept the strange conclusion that the unconverted men who accept as the only truth that they are morally failures and wrecks, left to themselves for all hope of reform, are in a superior position to those who lend themselves to the influence of fictitious suggestions, either generated by their own fancies or imposed on them by the will of other people. This would indeed be an abandonment of all belief in the rationality of the universe.

We grant that minds under delusion or in hysterical or abnormal nervous situations can be rescued by the intervention of baseless suggestions for the moment; but that they can settle down into permanent sanity unless they are presently brought into contact with realities is neither probable nor proved. And I affirm that the conversion of men from moral degradation, or simply from weakness of will or from poverty of moral ideals, into men of high aims and of well-knit moral constitution, takes place precisely because they are rescued from a realm of self-delusion and self-dependence, full of fictions, deceits, and vanities, and placed within a realm of highest reality by the moral order of the universe. In effecting solid and permanent conversions, religions—for it is not only Christianity which is concerned—are all of them effective, because they bring to bear some truths about the Divine order of the world, and place converted souls in the light of these truths, and under the influence of the Spirit which is the source and the essence of reality itself.

There are other considerations to be brought to bear against Mr. Low's contention. I hope that your readers will not fail to accept your invitation to the discussion of this widely-prevalent tendency to abandon trust in that rationality of the universe on which true religion takes its stand.—Yours, &c.,

A. CALDECOTT.

King's College, London,
January 6th, 1910.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—There is a suggestive analogy to the psychology of conversion in Aristotle's "Ars Poetica." There he tells us that the two conditions of a good drama are Anagnorisis (recognition) and Peripeteia (revolution). In a perfect drama such as the "Oedipus Tyrannus" these two coincide. At the turning-point in the play Oedipus recognises himself for what he really is—the murderer of his father (ἀνagnωρίσις)—and his circumstances and character undergo a revolution (περιπέτεια), as we see in the "Oedipus Coloneus."

So in a real conversion: A man recognises himself as ruined and guilty, and through that self-knowledge begins to know God; his character and often his circumstances are revolutionised. Conversion is the recognition and revolution which changes life from a chaotic and often a filthy dream into a well-ordered drama in which not self, but Christ, is the protagonist, and the best way to understand conversion is to be converted: πολλοὶ ναρκήφοροι, παύροι δὲ βίχχοι.—Yours, &c.,

C. F.

January 12th, 1910.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Low asks how we shall explain the psychology of conversion, and he proceeds to answer his own question. He says that it is the power of suggestion and hypnotism which turns criminals and degenerates to habits of decency, order, and honest living. I venture to think that Mr. Low is mistaken in attributing conversion to the power of suggestion. There are many in every class of society who have experienced conversion, and who are prepared to affirm that the force by which the change is wrought is the power of personality. Suggestion is doubtless the first step, but suggestion acts on the mind, while the influence of personality operates on the soul. In other words, it is the influence of the living personality of Jesus Christ on the life of the individual that causes the change and produces character and a mind in approximation to the mind of Christ.

In the cases of the criminal, drunkard, and bully, conversion is explained by the same power—life-giving spiritual contact with God himself—but here the way is opened for that influence to operate by powerful suggestion, sometimes of a sensational and emotional nature. We find countless cases of conversion in the Salvation Army meetings and in the churches of all denominations, whether Nonconformist, Anglican, or Roman. But the force behind the change is the same in all cases. It is the vitalising power of personality operating on the soul of man. And what power can be more regenerating and more permanently illuminating than continuous living intercourse with Jesus Christ who is surely the Son of God?—Yours, &c.,

C. LYALL COTTLE.

Warren Drive, New Brighton,
January 3rd, 1910.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The article of Mr. Sidney Low greatly impressed me. Conversions have all the fascination of mystery for the psychologist. As a scientist he is obliged to face them precisely as he has to face the mental phenomena of the child, the eccentric, the insane, the hypnotised subject, &c. Any facts of the human mind, be they normal or abnormal, must find a place within the region which he explores. The most daring explorer in this region comes often to a sudden halt by reason of the difficulties lying across his path. Thanks to the concentrated attention bestowed in recent years on the abnormal phases of the mind, and the labors of the psychical Research Society, much fresh light has been shed on this dark region. Professors Starbuck and James amongst others have done much in directing attention to the subject of conversions. On strictly psychological grounds neither these authors nor anybody else have succeeded in tracing them to their exact cause. They remain more or less a problem. To refer them to "suggestion," or to the operation of the subconscious self, does not bring us much nearer the problem. What takes place in the mind of the convert Professor James would seem to regard "as results of the tension of subliminal memories reaching bursting-point." (Varieties, p. 236.) Furthermore, he says: "If the grace of God miraculously operates, it probably operates through the subliminal door, then. But just how anything operates in this region is still unexplained." (Varieties, p. 270.) He appears to think that the subconscious self is the mediating term between the Self and God (p. 511).

It would no doubt simplify the problem if all conversions were alike; but they are not alike. Conversions are endless in their variety. Moreover, as a word, conversion is variously applied, and we are apt to confound meanings and things. From a loose use of the word we make a class of converts who only resemble one another in a few things, and, perhaps, the least important things. "All is not gold that glitters." The slum "converts," the patriotic converts of Japan, hypnotised converts, and Charcot's hysterical women, reveal certain common elements as the result of their conversion. But is there no fundamental difference between the Salvation Army converts and the others named? I believe there is.

The power which converted the slum drunkards and debauchees twenty centuries ago converted St. Paul, who had not been a drunkard, "but was blameless in the eye of the law," and who wrote so profound and intellectual a letter as the Epistle to the Romans.

The same power, through St. Paul's ministry, converted the matter-of-fact Roman and the wise Greek. This power must be something unique. I fully agree with Mr. Begbie that only religion can bring about real conversion. To co-ordinate religion with hypnotism and patriotism would be convenient, no doubt, in a scientific interest; and no objection could be urged against such arrangement, were it shown that religious conversion is not essentially different from a mere naturalistic process, such as hypnotic "conversion." But are not the conversions which Mr. Begbie describes something other and higher than a naturalistic process? In other words, are they not miracles of grace?

Mr. Low concludes his excellent article thus: "We may believe in miracles, but we ought not to expect them." My answer is that we do believe in miracles; and, somehow, we cannot do without them.—Yours, &c.,

JAMES EVANS

(Presbyterian Minister).

7, Bowen Terrace, Brecon,
January 13th, 1910.

"WHAT WE ARE FIGHTING FOR."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—At the close of your article on "What We Are Fighting For" in THE NATION of 8th inst., you commiserate the unfortunate parents of sons, who see some form of compulsory military training before their boys. But are you sure you rightly gauge the feelings of the modern father and mother on this question?

In the days of our fathers the individual citizen looked for very little from the State, and felt that he owed correspondingly little. The ideal was perfectly consistent. A man educated his sons at his own expense, fed and clothed them till they were self-supporting, and had no one else to look to, to support him without dishonor in his old age. The State had done little more for him than to let him grow—like Topsy—so was it not enough if he rather grudgingly paid the taxes necessary for the upkeep of an army and navy of hirelings to defend the State?

Now, however, everything is changed. Our sons will be educated at the expense of the State, they will be fed at school at the expense of the State, and booted too, if we parents but take to drink or get into trouble. Their interests as workmen will be protected by the State to a degree which their grandfathers would have considered oppression, they will be relieved by the State of responsibility for our old age, and will be assured of pensions themselves in their declining years.

And yet you, sir, expect us, the State-assisted parents of the State-fostered children, to grudge it if our sons are required in return to train themselves to defend the State in times of urgent danger. If this be the teaching of modern Liberalism, I confess I am disappointed. It can produce but a poor, mean-spirited race of men, and, as you truly observe, "every country gets the government it deserves." There are some of us, however, who have a different ideal for our sons.—Yours, &c.,

"A MOTHER OF SONS."

January 11th, 1910.

[Free service to the land of one's birth is one thing; conscription is another.—ED., NATION.]

THE INDIAN POLICE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I point out, with reference to your article on the character of the Indian Police, that the sentence of imprisonment for life on Mr. Savanbad was not, and could not have been, passed by Mr. Jackson. His connection with the case was that he committed the man for trial before the Sessions Court, where the prisoner was convicted and sentenced. A Sessions Judge has no executive duties, and no connection with the police administration. You will find the fact stated in the "Bombay Gazette" of December 25th, and as for the law you may take it from me, as an old Sessions Judge.—Yours, &c.,

F. C. C.

January 10th, 1910.

LONDON LIBRARY SUBJECT-INDEX.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Seccombe's admirable article on Dr. Hagberg Wright's Subject-Index of the London Library must needs be highly appreciated by all who are associated with the London Library. But there are in Mr. Seccombe's article one or two inadvertencies which it seems desirable to correct.

Mr. Seccombe says that he has looked in vain for Hudson's works under the heading "Birds." As a matter of fact, one of Hudson's books appears under the general heading "Birds," while three others appear under the heading "Birds, England."

Your article asserts that the names Thierry and Vinogradoff are missing under the heading of "History of England," whereas Thierry's work is noticed, not only under the general entry, "England, History," but under the special headings, "England, History, 450-1066. Anglo-Saxons, &c. (later works)." "Norman Conquest, Northmen, and Normans," and "William I. of England."

Professor Vinogradoff's books are to be found under the headings "England, Social Life," "Feudalism," "Land, England," and "Manors."

Thackeray, the absence of whose name from the heading "Dandies" is deplored by Mr. Seccombe, duly appears there.

Mr. Seccombe's remark that "Military History" is scantily represented may be accounted for by the circumstance that he has overlooked the two headings, "Army" and "Regimental History," which, in very liberal detail, supplement the general entry.

The library unfortunately lacks the work by Le Clercq, which your reviewer misses from the entry "Mauritius."

The preliminary "Notes" explain that works of fiction have been deliberately omitted from the Subject-Index, and are only included in the "Authors' Catalogue." This regulation explains Mr. Seccombe's failure to find Erckmann-Chatrian noticed in the Subject-Index under the heading "Alsace-Lorraine."—Yours, &c.,

A MEMBER OF THE LONDON LIBRARY COMMITTEE.
January 11th, 1910.

THE MANNERS OF THE PEERS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As an old-fashioned Tory who reads your journal, chiefly, I must confess, for the sake of Mr. Galsworthy's articles, appearing at too infrequent intervals, I beg the courtesy of your columns to protest against the extraordinary hendiadys, "their stable-talk and their Eton manners."

These words occur in an article headed, "Our Lost Romance," a contribution which, in my amateur judgment, is too flamboyant and not wholly free from class prejudice. Hitherto I could never have imagined anyone penning such an expression of opinion.

I consider, sir, that Eton is one of our greatest institutions, and that every right-minded Englishman should be justly proud and jealous of her glory and her reputation. Your own journal of February 22nd, 1908, contains a review appreciative of our leading public school. I cannot profess to compete with your writer in his knowledge of "stable-talk." I should, however, imagine that John Bull would find it refreshingly free from cant and a pleasing contrast to the sanctimonious purrings of Salem Chapel.

Not the least service which Eton has rendered to the world has been the long line of warriors, governors, and statesmen whom she has given us. In past years most of our statesmen have been her sons. I venture to think that if all the members of the present Cabinet had enjoyed the privilege of being Etonians, certain Georgics would have gained in dignity and reserve, although I suppose they would have lost those crude and over-painted portraits of Land and Property, those colored cartoons, which, during the last few months, have slightly astonished and mildly amused cultivated Europe.

In my humble opinion we could with advantage to the dignity and tone of our public life have very much more of Eton, and the type for which she stands, and completely dispense with the new comic "School for Scandal." To-day more than ever England needs to be reminded of the words of Burke: "Nobility is a graceful ornament to the civil order. It is the Corinthian capital of polished society. 'Omnes boni nobilitati semper favemus' was the saying of a good and wise man. It is indeed one sign of a liberal and benevolent mind to incline to it with some sort of partial propensity. He feels no ennobling principle in his own heart who wishes to level all the artificial institutions which have been adopted for giving a body to opinion, and permanence to fugitive esteem."—Yours, &c.,

STANLEY WIGHTMAN.

Stannetts, Fulwood, Sheffield,
January 8th, 1910.

WHAT IT COMES TO.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—To get a clear view of the issue now before us, it is necessary to call to mind the exact words of Lord Lansdowne's motion: "That this House is not justified in giving its consent to this Bill until it has been submitted to the judgment of the country." The pretence that the Lords wished to consult the people about the Budget is not believed by anyone. Nevertheless, this is the pretence, this is what was said, and since it is, to return a Unionist majority to power is to give the House of Lords ultimate control over taxation.

Surely, very obviously, by the very act of returning the Unionists to power, the People would be approving of the Lords consulting them now. Fortified by this approval, the Lords, the next time they disliked a Budget, would consult the People again. If the People voted against them, this second time, the Lords would say "We agree"; but they would consult the People on a third occasion; nor could there be any complaint of their doing so.

All the People could say would be this: You consulted us once, and we said "Yes." You consulted us on another occasion, and we said "No." You now consult us a third time to know which it is to be this time. There could be no possible complaint, and a right thrice exercised would be completely established.

It comes, then, to this, that if the Unionists are now returned to office, the Lords obtain the power to reject a Budget when they please, and, with this new power, as of course, the power of dismissing Governments when they please. But this power of life or death over Governments means in practice that Governments will consult the Lords, that continually Governments will alter their Budgets to please the Lords.

These are conditions which no Democracy can accept and remain a Democracy, which no Democracy in the world, and, least of all, the free Democracy of England, would permanently accept.

The House of Lords is not a representative Chamber. It is out of touch with the People. It represents wealth, the class of wealth; and, therefore, if the People give the House of Lords control over taxation, England enters on what must become a long and weary class war, the most hideous and rancorous of all possible class wars, a class war about the incidence of taxation. The Lords do not wish the class they represent to suffer the additional taxation of the Budget; they prefer, as it is said, that there should be a "broadening of the basis of taxation."

Were this policy carried out we should have a people saddled with the miseries of an embracing tariff, gradually sinking deeper into the power of the Trusts, forced to fight elections to get a shilling off one necessary of life and sixpence off another, pestered by the din of competing factions talking for ever of finance.

No doubt, ultimately the People would win, because ultimately they would stake everything to win. They would win when their trade was dislocated, and when the old good feeling between class and class in England was gone.

Is it possible to conceive a more horrid battle, or any greater folly than that the People should not end it before it has begun by striking from the shoulder now?—Yours, &c.,

A. A. JACK.

January 5th, 1910.

CHILDREN'S CARE COMMITTEES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I wish to bring to your readers' notice that it is proposed to form a Guild consisting of members of Children's Care Committees, who are anxious to make these bodies an efficient organisation for carrying out and extending the work entrusted to them in connection with school feeding, medical treatment, after-care, and generally interesting themselves in the children while at school and after leaving.

To promote this object, it is proposed to carry out special investigations into matters such as feeding centres, and methods of selecting necessitous children, with a view to making practical suggestions, and bringing defects to the notice of the London Education Committee.

Members of Care Committees willing to join, and other persons interested, are requested to send their names to Miss Maud Davies, 25, Hogarth Road, Earl's Court, S.W.—Yours, &c.,

B. L. HUTCHINS.

THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE LICENSING LAWS IN ENGLAND AND WALES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—On Friday last a special meeting of the Liverpool Justices was held for the purpose, primarily, of receiving a deputation to present a memorial upon the subject of the disparity existing between the yearly convictions for drunkenness in Liverpool and the convictions against licensees for selling drink to drunken persons. The official statistics for 1908 show in Liverpool 10,500 prosecutions for drunkenness, of which 97 per cent. resulted in convictions. On the other hand, only 26 licensees, or 28·8 per cent. of the 91 proceeded against, were convicted for selling drink to drunken persons and other breaches of the licensing laws.

It is well to remember that this subject is not one for Liverpool alone; what obtains here prevails all over the country—the same glaring disproportion between the persons convicted for drunkenness and the licensees convicted for the transgression of the licensing statutes. These are the figures for 1908 (the last available from the Home Office Blue Book): Proceeded against in England and Wales for drunkenness, 209,691, and 164,623 of these convicted; licence-holders proceeded against for the infringement of the Licensing Statutes, 2,065, and of these 1,124 convicted!

It cannot be controverted that the administration of these statutes is far from being as satisfactory, thorough, and effective as the nation has every right to expect. It constitutes a public scandal. The magistrates all over the country, notwithstanding the reactionary Balfourian Act of 1904, have still much power vested in them, which, if strenuously exercised, would do much for the repression and abolition of drunkenness in the land. We have it from the highest authorities that the function of the magistrate in these matters is to protect the public against the publican. However, the magistrates everywhere, generally speaking, only discharge the function perfunctorily. It is useless to offer excuses—such as blaming the grocers' licences and the clubs. The great majority of the unfortunate persons convicted annually for drunkenness are made intoxicated on licensed premises. The police are not encouraged by the magistrates in these cases—too often they are discouraged. They will tell you: "What's the use of bringing charges against licensees? The magistrates are reluctant to convict—and will not convict." In his charge recently to the Grand Jury at York, Mr. Justice Bucknill commented on this very subject, and went so far as to suggest the need for the appointment of "inspectors" or "detectives" to devote the whole of their time to watch licensed houses. The matter is of such serious importance to the nation as to make it incumbent to investigate and overhaul the present system of administering the licensing laws of the magistrates of this country. If a Royal Commission for the purpose were appointed, it would have a salutary effect, for its proceedings would throw a lurid light on how the present system is administered.—Yours, &c.,

HUGH EDWARDS.

Liverpool, January 10th, 1910.

Our Younger Poets.

II.—FREDERICK NIVEN.

I.

NORTH DEVON.

OVER there the churchyard is:

The old square steeple

Stands above the old gray stones

With their old-time names—

Selicks, Acklands, Babbacombes.

That green slope is Silence's;

There he dwells with the dead people,

Having hushed their laughs and moans,

Ended all their prides and shames

In their six-foot homes.

It is quiet there: when rain comes

The green grass shines through:

When the rain goes the bee hums

And the blackbird pipes too.

But the quiet is not ever broken

Even on Sabbaths by the worship, or the bell:

There hath Silence set his unseen token,

Set his spell.

And here too, here beyond these sleeping
On the other side the rusted, mossy wall,
Here comes Silence also softly creeping
With his unheard foot-fall.

By the nettled and black-berried byeways,
By the lanes, and on the climbing highways,
Even to this highway's end where it goes down
Over cliffs where gulls and foam are blown,
Wanders he from his walled, green Sanctuary,
To the immemorial sea.

II.

HER SERVANTS LOOK ON THE LITTLE MOTHER FROM BETWEEN THE TAPESTRIES.

SHE sitteth there in calm and storm
Weaving upon her loom.
She is so child-like in her face,
Although she hath a god-like grace,
One wonders who hath taught her all
Her mastery of line and form.
Her quiet singing in the room
Blends with the sound like soft foot-fall
Of faeries, as the shuttles weave. What weaveth she?
A king's proud mantle or a pall?
What symbols, and what tapestry?

The sun shines in, the light of storm;
She weaves upon her loom.
Hush! Look; she hath a wondrous face,
Our queen; behold her radiant grace.
She weaveth gladly, for us all,
As she hath woven her sacred form,
Out of her soul. Hush! Her foot-fall!
She riseth up to cross the room. What weaveth she?
The soul's fair cloths, the body's pall.
Hush; hence; let drop the tapestry.

III.

TO THE MYSTERY.

THESE be the things that move my heart,
Thou knowest why:
*A pool; a stream where sunbeams dart;
The song the stream makes flowing by;*

*The gleam of pebbles in the stream;
The wavering light:*
I dipped, and found a stone; the gleam
Passed, as the sun-glow does at night.

Ah me! I was like dotterel Death;
He culls in vain:
What he desires evanisheth
Even as he plucks—is God's again;

*A voice beloved: it sang a strain
Of old dead years.*
My heart was full of joy—and pain:
The silence after touched to tears.

They were too beautiful to pass—
The voice, the air;
Ah! How the rose-leaves strew the grass,
And how the transient things are fair!

*Roses: my heart is as a home
Where every rose,
Being so loved, might fluttering come
When wind-cast from its garden-close.*

Ah God, or Zeus, or Mystery,
Let us thus come,
She whom I love, who loveth me,
When kind Death envies us—come home.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE following is our weekly selection of books, which we commend to the notice of our readers:—

"A History of English Poetry." Vol. VI. By W. J. Courthope. (Macmillan. 10s. net.)

"The American People: A Study in National Psychology." By A. Maurice Low. (Unwin. 8s. 6d. net.)

"The Evolution of Worlds." By Percival Lowell. (Macmillan. 10s. 6d. net.)

"Ancient and Modern Imperialism." By the Earl of Cromer (Murray. 2s. 6d. net.)

"L'Évolution des Dogmes." Par Charles Guignebert. (Paris: Flammarion. 3fr. 50.)

"Notes d'une Voyageuse en Turquie." Par Marcelle Tinayre. (Paris: Calmann-Lévy 3fr. 50.)

* * *

NOTWITHSTANDING the imminence of the General Election, a steady trickle of books is pouring from the press, and one or two of the publishers have issued their preliminary announcements. The most promising of the new books in Mr. Murray's list is called "An Eighteenth Century Correspondence," and will contain a selection of letters addressed to Sanderson Miller, of Radway, an architect who took a leading part in the pseudo-Gothic revival. Miller's correspondents included the elder Pitt, Deane Swift (cousin and biographer of the great Dean), Charles Jenkinson, Robert Nugent, Lord Dacre, Sir Edward Turner, the Grenvilles, the Lytteltons, and others of distinction in the days of George III. The letters written by the Grenvilles and the Lytteltons are said to give a good picture of the private lives and characters of men who have up to the present been known chiefly in their public capacity. The book should also throw some light upon the inner politics of the period, since in it such topics as the Broad Bottom Administration, the Oxfordshire Election of 1754, and the execution of Admiral Byng, are freely discussed.

* * *

AN important literary event of the season will be the publication through Messrs. Longmans of "The Letters of John Stuart Mill," which have been edited, with an introduction, by Mr. Hugh Elliot. The letters cover the period from 1829, when Mill began to put on paper the rough outline of his "Logic," to his death in 1873. Mill was a great letter writer, and as his correspondents included many of his great contemporaries both in France and England, a book of the highest interest may be looked for.

* * *

THERE is not any obvious connection between malaria and poetry, but the subject of Paludism, to give malaria its scientific name, will in the near future be able to claim its poet. Major Ross, who was engaged upon medical research work in India from 1881 to 1889, has not only written a medical treatise, "The Prevention of Paludism," but also a volume of poems inspired by the same theme. The latter book is to be called "Philosophies," and both will be published shortly by Mr. Murray.

* * *

MANY people in this country will be surprised to learn that the United States possesses an Academy. That institution was founded in 1898, and up to the present has pursued an unobtrusive and useless career. It has, however, now come into greater prominence, for Congress has just granted it a charter, and a volume of its proceedings is announced. Needless to say, it enjoys the approbation of Mr. Roosevelt, who is one of its members. Its forty-four other members number among them several politicians, college presidents and professors, a considerable number of artists, and a few literary men. It sets a good example to our own British Academy in ignoring such picturesque professions as the Church, the Army, the Navy, and the Stage. Its duties have not yet been defined, but it is expected that its chief use will be to furnish a bead-roll of distinctions. A writer in the Chicago "Dial" goes so far as to imply that it has been called into existence by a feeling on the part of Americans that they need an intellectual aristocracy possessing some sort of title-deeds and thus capable of being recognised by the ordinary person. "We talk," he says, "a great deal about democracy in America, but it looks to me as though we were making a quiet, disguised, but determined effort to create an aristocracy. And quite rightly in a way. We begin to want some tangible evidence of the existence of the best. The idea of a society composed of people of achievement and renown begins to appeal to us." Possibly in some hundreds of years the American Academy will fulfil these hopes, but the British Academy's present lack of prestige inclines one to the belief that only by tradition can such a body gain influence in the world of letters.

* * *

MR. G. K. CHESTERTON'S "Thackeray" is a notable addition to Messrs. Bell's "Masters of Literature" series. The series is intended to give, in separate volumes, extracts of some length chosen from the writings of the greatest authors. Each volume contains an introduction, and Mr. Chesterton upon Thackeray is suggestive as well as epigrammatic. As regards the silly discussion about whether Thackeray was a cynic, Mr. Chesterton seems to us to be quite right. "The argument," he says, "is a mere logomachy, the trick of taking a vague word and then asking if it applies precisely. If cynicism means a war on comfort, then Thackeray, to his eternal honor, was a cynic. If it means a war on virtue, then Thackeray, to his eternal honor, was the reverse of a cynic. It is absurd, in this sense, to call a man cynical whose whole object it is to show that goodness, even when it is silly, is a healthier thing than wickedness when it is sensible. The truth in the accusation is probably this: that his vile characters are drawn a little more vividly than his virtuous characters." And Mr. Chesterton adds that, in the small, artistic sense, the same is true of Dante.

* * *

THE judgments passed by Mr. Chesterton on the great novels will not be accepted by all Thackerayans. "Esmond" is the one work of Thackeray "which is, in the somewhat artificial modern sense, a work of art." But it is "a high and chaste tragedy, which one reads through with reverence and austere profit. . . . Over the great Queen Anne romance there broods a peculiar conviction that Queen Anne is dead." There is truth in this, but the real Thackerayan reads "Esmond" over and over again, and reads with enjoyment undiminished either by reverence or austere profit. Less open to question is the statement that "it is both the strength and the weakness of 'Vanity Fair' that it produces on the mind (I might say even on the nerves) the same impression of mixed voices and almost maddening competition as a crowded square on a market day." For our own part—it is purely a personal preference—we like "Pendennis" better than any of the others, and we hold Mr. Chesterton to be quite right in describing it as "an epic, because it celebrates the universal man." Arthur Pendennis's love for Miss Fotheringay is First Love, "the veritable divine disease which seems a part of the very health of youth"; his being plucked at Oxbridge is the recurring ruin of the pride of youth, "the eternal prodigal among the eternal swine." Messrs. Bell are to be congratulated on the excellence of the earlier volumes in their series, and those still to come are full of promise. These include "Emerson," by Mr. G. H. Perris, "Dickens," by Mr. Thomas Seccombe, "De Quincey," by Mr. Sidney Low, "Hazlitt," by Mr. A. V. Lucas, and "Sterne," by Mr. Sidney Lee.

* * *

WHENEVER the history of the second-hand booksellers of the nineteenth century is written—could there be a subject of more interest to the book-lover?—a large space will have to be found for the achievements of Mr. Bertram Dobell. For Mr. Dobell has not only attained distinction in his profession, but has also added greatly to our knowledge of the Elizabethan poets and dramatists. He has rescued from oblivion quite a number of old plays, he has been the first to print Strode and Traherne, he has taken from the files of the "London Magazine" many until then unidentified contributions by Charles Lamb, he has been of service to the unfortunate author of "The City of Dreadful Night," during that poet's lifetime, and done more than anyone else to secure his fame after his death, and lastly, he is the author of critical essays and of a couple of volumes of verse. The reader who wishes to inquire further into Mr. Dobell's achievements will find them set out in a pamphlet written by Mr. S. Bradbury, and called "Bertram Dobell: Bookseller and Man of Letters." He will be convinced that Mr. Dobell deserves to be held in high honor in the world of books.

Reviews.

THE PHILOSOPHIC DESPOTS.*

THE latest volume of the Cambridge Modern History covers the period between the Peace of Utrecht and the Revolution; but as the American War of Independence and the decline of the French Monarchy have been dealt with in previous volumes, it is in itself an incomplete record of the eighteenth century. Yet the main lines of development are firmly drawn, and the character and achievements of the sacculum rationalisticum clearly exhibited.

The era which opened with the death of Louis XIV. witnessed a remarkable shifting in the relations and significance of the actors on the European stage. Turkey is pushed steadily back, Sweden withdraws after the sensational performances of Charles XII., Holland becomes the shadow of a great name. In England the Hanoverian dynasty inaugurates a generation of peace, while France turns with relief from the stifling formalism of the Grand Monarque to the licence of the Regency and the golden bubbles of Law. The combatants in the great struggles that had arisen from the ambition of Louis XIV. allow themselves a breathing-space. But the age of Walpole and Fleury would not in any case have lasted very long in a world of restless intrigue and unsatisfied ambitions; and when the Emperor Charles VI. died in 1740 and was succeeded by his daughter, Maria Theresa, Europe plunged once more into a series of wars which lasted with little intermission till 1815.

The seizure of Silesia by Frederick the Great ranks with the partition of Poland among the indefensible acts of modern history. Its author indeed did not seriously attempt to defend it, cynically remarking that the jurists would no doubt invent a justification for his action. Mr. Atkinson bluntly calls it "outrageous," and there we may leave it. A much more controversial topic is Frederick's conduct in commencing the Seven Years' War in 1756. The orthodox Prussian tradition holds that though the king struck the first blow, the real responsibility for beginning the struggle lies elsewhere; and, when this view was sharply challenged some years ago by Max Lehmann and Delbrück, a fierce and bitter strife broke out among German historians. The difficulty arises partly from the immense volume of diplomatic materials that are gradually being unearthed from almost every Chancellery in Europe, partly from the uncertainty as to how much each State knew of the plans and relations of all the rest, and partly from the slow progress of the negotiations that led up to the momentous alliance between Maria Theresa and Louis XV. In the present volume Dr. Emil Daniels sums up strongly against Frederick. His mobilisation of half the army and the marches which it undertook had, he declares, "no object but that of sounding an alarm in order to force Austria into warlike measures which might furnish Prussia an excuse for attacking. For, as a matter of fact, it is out of the question that Frederick should have felt himself menaced. He knew, of course, that something was in progress against him, but he also knew that he had no reason for apprehending within measurable time the conclusion of an offensive alliance against Prussia." The question of responsibility is important, for the war was one of the bloodiest and most useless ever waged; but it is somewhat more complex than this passage suggests.

Frederick the Great not only represented the rise of Prussia into a Great Power; he also created the type of "Philosophic Despot" which was the outstanding feature of European statecraft in the eighteenth century. The "Aufklärung" is of peculiar interest because it made itself felt in the world of politics as well as of thought, and used autocracy no less than radicalism as its instrument. In the present volume we meet it almost exclusively in its former aspect. "The intellectual note of the century," say the editors, "is that of enlightenment; in other words, the self-confident revolt of the trained human intellect against tradition for tradition's sake and against whatever that intellect holds to be superstition or prejudice. In the great majority of European States, which were under strong monarchical rule, it was unavoidable that enlightenment, if it asserted itself at all, should prevail through the authority of a benevolent despotism."

The first and greatest of these autocrats was Frederick the Great, on whom all the others modelled themselves; but Frederick owed not a little to the work and example of his father. The traditional caricature of Frederick William I., based largely on the untrustworthy memoirs of his daughter Wilhelmina, has given place since Ranke to a juster estimate of the founder of the Prussian State system, and Dr. Daniels sketches his reforms in administration and finance with great lucidity. The devotion to duty which made the philosopher of Sans Souci describe himself as "le premier domestique de l'état" was learned from the father, whom he had come fully to appreciate before his premature death; his genius and his interest in literature and philosophy were his own.

The admirable chapters on Joseph II. and Catherine the Great should be read after those on Frederick the Great, for the three rulers stand out as the supreme examples of a special type. The distinguished Belgian historian, Professor Hubert, has drawn the portrait of by far the most attractive of the trio with skill and sympathy. No royal figure in modern history possesses a more pathetic interest than Joseph II., if only because he is the classic example of the ruler who fails because he is before his time. "His reforms," writes the Professor, "if for the most part fundamentally just, were not introduced with fitting discretion; but it is impossible to mistake either the purity of his intentions or that deep love for his fellow-men which was his inspiring motive. The violent animosity aroused by him was due, above all, to the fact that his projects injuriously affected all privileged persons of whatever class—and privileged persons are always hostile to any man who dares lay hands even on the most questionable of their prerogatives. Most of his reforms have been put into practice since his day, and there is scarcely one which has not triumphantly endured the test of time and experience." The portrait of Catherine is naturally much less pleasing; but Professor Höttsch, of Posen, reminds us of her brightness and kindness, and declares that her virtues far outweighed her shortcomings. He makes it clear, however, that her brilliant reign contributed virtually nothing towards the advance of European civilisation among the mass of the Russian people, from whose world she lived throughout in complete estrangement.

Though the kernel of the volume is formed by the enlightened autocrats and their States, other countries are in no way neglected. Dr. Ward opens the story by a brief dissertation on the coming of the Hanoverians, on whom he is the greatest living authority, and Mr. Temperley presents us with a sketch of Walpole which avoids equally the eulogy of Lord Morley and the severity of Lecky. Mr. Armstrong writes on France and Spain, emphasising the achievements of "the Termagant" Elizabeth, whose remarkable career he has traced in his well-known biography. Poland under her Saxon kings, Russia before Catherine, and Sweden under Gustavus III. are described by Mr. Nisbet Bain, whose recent death is a grave loss to history. The tragic story of Struensee and Caroline Matilda of Denmark, the "Queen of Tears," is judiciously related by Mr. Reddaway. Special prominence is given to India, the fortunes of which, from Baber to Warren Hastings, are related in a long and useful chapter.

The volume closes with sketches of the romantic movement in European literature, and of English political philosophy from Hobbes to Hume. The latter, by Mr. A. L. Smith, wisely concentrates on a few leading thinkers, and clearly marks their respective contributions to sound thought. The chief advance lies in the gradual development of an historical sense. "The great subject of the origin of government is handled on much sounder lines; it is seen to be a thing of slow growth. A true historical method is beginning to emerge. All this is a preparation for Burke."

FIELDING, THE MAN.*

THE contrast between the works of Fielding and of Richardson reflects almost too closely and symmetrically the contrast

* "The Cambridge Modern History." Vol. VI. "The Eighteenth Century." Cambridge: University Press. 16s. net.

* "Henry Fielding." A Memoir including newly discovered letters and records, with illustrations from contemporary journals. By G. M. Godden. Sampson Low, Marston & Co. 10s. 6d. net.

between their lives. Fielding passed through all kinds of vicissitudes in the various careers that he essayed; Richardson knew only one most lucky misadventure, the losses of his father, which turned him from a prospective parson into a printer's apprentice. Fielding was often in want. Richardson's progress as a successful man of business was almost uninterrupted; he printed the Commons' Journals, became Master of the Stationers' Company and law printer to the King, and retired to the house on Parsons' Green, that had afterwards another famous tenant in Burne Jones, with a considerable fortune. Fielding died, his ebbing life tortured with anxiety for his wife and children, before he was fifty; Richardson lived in serene comfort to seventy-two. Fielding indulged the tastes of his vigorous nature with a zest that shortened his days and undermined a constitution as hardy as that of Charles Fox; Richardson was a vegetarian and a teetotaler. Fielding took rain and sun alike, and knew how "to court the clouds of the south-west with a lover's blood"; Richardson's life, like most of his work, breathes a sheltered and artificial calm. Richardson the man is not a particularly interesting study, but his art presents one extraordinary problem. Nobody has explained satisfactorily how the author of one of the most immoral and sycophantic romances in existence, which taught that marriage with an aristocratic rake was the highest reward of the prudent chastity that had withstood his violence, could have risen to the sublime splendour of "Clarissa." A penetrating and original study of Richardson's genius would, therefore, be more welcome than a full biography. Fielding's work, on the other hand, if much of it is bad or indifferent, because it was hack journalism and hack play-writing, the shift of poverty, is much more of a piece. But his adventurous life has been wrapt in shadows and doubts, and it would be more interesting to learn about that life than to read an inspired criticism of his novels. It is Fielding's life that is the subject of Mr. Godden's book, and recording, as it does, the results of new and careful researches in a clear and agreeable manner, his book will be read with great satisfaction and interest. It is also adorned with some thirty reproductions of rare and interesting eighteenth-century prints. One of them contains the only sketch of Fielding, drawn during his lifetime, that is known to exist.

Mr. Godden has reconstructed Fielding's boyhood from certain Chancery proceedings preserved in the Record Office. Fielding's father married for his second wife an Italian lady, who was accused of being a Catholic and of having kept an eating-house. The result of a long lawsuit instituted by Henry Fielding's grandmother, Lady Gould, was to withdraw Henry and his brother and sisters from their father's custody, and to put them under their grandmother's guardianship. Fielding, whose education had begun under the clergyman who sat for Parson Trulliber in "Joseph Andrews," was at Eton when this decision was given, and accordingly his holidays were henceforth spent with Lady Gould at Salisbury. At Eton he formed a friendship with Lyttelton, which lasted through his life, and among his other schoolfellows were Henry Fox and Pitt, to whose oratory he paid a stately tribute in "Tom Jones." Pitt was one of a little party to whom Fielding read the manuscript of his great novel. Fielding's adventures began almost before he had left school, for it was while still a Chancery ward that he tried to carry off a beautiful heiress in Dorsetshire. Three years later, when he was twenty-one, he had entered on life in grim earnest. He found himself in London, with an allowance of £200 a year from his father, which "anybody might pay that would," with the alternative careers before him, as he put it, of a hackney writer or a hackney coachman. How hard he worked in the first of these professions may be judged from the fact that between 1728, when his first play appeared, and 1734, the year of his marriage, he wrote thirteen plays. These employments were diversified by a period of student life at Leyden, where his name appears in the University records of 1728 and 1729. Mr. Godden is unable to throw any further light on this chapter of his life. In 1734 he married Charlotte Cradock, of Salisbury, the original of Sophia Western and of Amelia, and they began a common life of struggle and courage and passionate devotion, which ended with her death ten years later. For a brief moment, indeed, the sun broke in on their poverty. Mr. Cradock, from whose will Mr. Godden gives us an extract, left all his money to Charlotte, cutting off her sister with a shilling precisely in the manner of Amelia's mother. Fielding and his wife were then able to live for some time at his little estate at Stour. Fielding's biographer, Murphy, said that by his magnificence and pomp he ran through his money quickly and gloriously, but Mr. Godden thinks that the picture is exaggerated. At all events their life at Stour was brief, though, fortunately, it was long enough to supply Fielding with models for Parson Adams and Squire Western.

The next two years of Fielding's life were given up to political drama. He took the little French theatre in the Haymarket, and employed all his wit and invective in support of the distinguished Opposition that fought Walpole with unrelenting fury down to the day of his fall. Fielding was a congenial ally in such warfare for men like Pitt, Chesterfield, and Lyttelton. Mr. Godden, by the way, enters so heartily into their case as to do rather less than justice to their unattractive opponent. But this chapter of his energetic life was closed by the Licensing Act of 1737, and Fielding's thoughts reverted to the Bar. In November, 1737, he became a student of the Middle Temple. Even Mr. Godden has been unable to discover much about his life or the life of his family during the next two-and-a-half years, except the record of the sale of his estate at Stour in 1738 for £260. At the close of 1739, he emerges once more into politics as the journalist, attacking Walpole with all his old energy three times a week in the "Champion." This genial occupation he combined with his new profession, though unfortunately little can be learnt of his career as a barrister beyond the fact that he attended the Western Circuit.

In 1740 there happened an event which was not more important to Richardson himself than it was to Fielding. "Pamela" appeared, took London by storm, rushed through four editions, and provoked Fielding to write "Joseph Andrews." The original parody was soon merged in the larger plan of the novel, and Fielding had discovered his art. But he was not yet free from the necessity of hack writing, for "Joseph Andrews" only brought him £183 11s., and the production of the next years included, besides "Jonathan Wild" and the "Journey from This World to the Next," a medley of miscellaneous writing. In the autumn of 1747 his wife died at Bath, an overwhelming blow that nearly destroyed his reason. After another plunge into political journalism, and another experiment at the Bar, Fielding settled down in 1748 to the final phase as a Westminster magistrate. It was amid the cares of this office, which he administered with a devotion to duty that can only be called heroic, that Fielding published "Tom Jones" and "Amelia." To the very last he kept his indefatigable spirit, and perhaps no part of Mr. Godden's book is more interesting than his account of Fielding's arduous life at Bow Street. He published during those years his scheme of a Labor Colony, and for some time he conducted the "Covent Garden Journal," in which he tried, so he expressed it, to serve the noble interests of religion, virtue, and good sense. In 1754, quite broken down by his labors, he resigned office, and sailed to Lisbon, accompanied by his second wife. There he died in the autumn.

Mr. Godden's book is extremely interesting in showing how large an element of personal experiences and impressions contribute to the actual drawing of character in Fielding's novels. Richardson was a story-teller from boyhood. Fielding wrote from what he had seen of life, and he wrote we may add, with a great moral purpose. Mr. Godden's book shows that his most conspicuous quality was a courageous and unsparing public spirit. If he was a hack writer, he was never a hack politician. He lashed classes and vices as he saw them, in play, pamphlet and journal, and it was with the same zeal for truth and sincerity that he painted the manners of his day. The difference between him and Richardson from this point of view was, in the range of subject, the difference between a Hogarth and a Reynolds. Fielding wanted his readers to understand what kind of a society was eighteenth century England. When a country is governed by one class, that class sees about as much of the world in which it lives as can be seen by a dark lantern; it sees, that is to say, the shadows thrown across a single path of light. This was all that aristocratic society knew of the poor. As Fielding put it, after describing the misery and squalor of the poor in London, "That such wretchedness as this is so little lamented, arises from its being so little known; but if this be the case with the sufferings of the poor, it is not so with their misdeeds. They starve or freeze or rot among themselves; but they beg and steal and rob among their betters." Fielding did not see only the England of the aristocracy, or only the England that its aristocracy saw; he did not assign to each class, like a Wilberforce, its proper virtues, recommending to the poor patience and subordination. He drew a faithful picture of the England with which hardship and adventure had made him familiar. He saw the rich without any of the illusions of a grand atmosphere, and the poor without any of the illusions of that sentimentalism which became a fashion in the eighteenth century, and even invaded the pages of French official reports on the peasants. Any reader of "Tom Jones," or "Joseph Andrews," might have learnt how justice was administered to the poor in an English village, how universal was the effect of the worship of rank and wealth in creating the sycophantic vices, how brutally the squires sometimes lorded it over their neighbors, how ruthlessly they protected their pleasures. In his novels, as in his life, he was the great critic of cant; but he was not so bitter as to be unjust. There is a rare sympathy, if there is a rare irony, in his art. He had strong prejudices on religion, and they are not suppressed in his pages, but they are not the prejudices of a man who is ignorant of life, or has been shut up in a tiny world. He was the prose Homer of human nature, as Byron called him, just because his magnificent and exuberant imagination could roam over a great territory of imagination and of life. As we read Mr. Godden's memoir we may be thankful that fortune had tossed into such strange situations one whose mind and sympathy could sweep over so wide a landscape.

ONE SIDE OF INDIA.*

THIS account of India is the result of three or four visits made by a German officer who travelled with good introductions to high English officials, and never troubled to look below the surface of official society. The book is of interest to the tourist, because the writer saw what every tourist sees, and formed the impressions that everyone forms who glances at India in an easy-going and complacent spirit. It is exactly the spirit that officials all the world over like to find in their visitors, and we cannot wonder that the Count was everywhere received among Anglo-Indians with a hospitality for which he pours out his gratitude in almost every chapter. For he draws just the picture that official classes would like to be presented to the world, and, indeed, to a large extent, they themselves believe to be true.

It is the picture of a handful of men and women from a fine and dominant race toiling disinterestedly day and night for the guidance and government of ignorant and spiritless multitudes, and maintaining their position by the prestige of inflexible justice, benevolence, and courage. So long as the dominance of race is maintained without question, there is room for patronising condescension and the forgiving amiability that grown-up people show to children at Christmas. It is the ideal of Mr. Kipling rather than of Mr. Joynson-Hicks, so far as the two can be distinguished. We mean that the commercial reasons for holding India, and the necessity of holding it by the sword, are not insisted upon with brutal frankness, but something noble and inspiring is assumed both in our purpose and our means. Nor can anyone deny the attractiveness of the ideal. If the people of one continent are to be held in subjection by a race far away in another, our method of doing it in India is probably the best yet discovered, and it has been accompanied by considerable material advantages for our subjects as well as for ourselves. The picture of a scattered band of officials and soldiers maintaining justice and order with great self-sacrifice in a benighted land is, as we said, attractive: it is the ideal of our best Anglo-Indian servants, and it is the picture given us by such books as this.

Twenty years ago it would have been truer than to-day, and there are moments when even Count von Koenigsmarck perceives he is speaking of a past age. The land is no longer either so benighted or so submissive, and the Count heartily regrets the change. "From a position of independence to one of presumption," he says, "is only a step," and "to what lengths," he asks, "will Indian education and prosperity and English toleration lead us in the end?"

"The days when a native stepped off the pavement or pulled up his cart to give the foreigner precedence are back-numbers. . . . Up country, maybe, a certain halo still surrounds the white sahib; the ever-increasing propaganda of the towns has, however, robbed it of a good deal of its aforetime glamor. . . . Among Mohammedans, Hindoos, and Parsees we meet people of a high standing of education and culture, men who matriculate at English universities, who have graduated in the languages and sciences of the West, who travel in Europe or America, who every year undergo their 'cure' in Homburg or Karlsbad, who take advantage of every amenity of the West. They wear European clothing, and live in close contact, both socially and in business, with the foreigner. But it is just these who at heart have remained most Indian of all. 'Home Rule' is their secret watchword."

Though the passage is quite misleading as to the motive power and meaning of the Swadeshi movement, we see in it that form of the Anglo-Indian spirit which expects a "native" to take off his shoes, never to enter an English compound with a carriage or umbrella, and never to travel in the same railway compartment with Europeans. In fact, we see in it precisely the root of those bad manners which, as Lord Morley has said, are disagreeable everywhere, but in India are a crime.

Of the growing sense of nationality and the deep unrest that is permeating all parts of India, far below the English-educated classes, the Count has noticed hardly anything. To him, as to the Anglo-Indian of ten years ago, it is all a little matter of "ink-slinging baboos," and, after an occasional sneer, he proceeds cheerfully with his shooting parties, his well-worn descriptions of the Taj, and his ecstasy over official dinners and British hospitality. With the real "natives" and their beliefs or manner of life he is singularly incapable of any sympathy. He sees little in Benares except its supposed insanitary condition, and nothing in its symbolic and beautiful forms of worship except "the shipwreck of human reason final and complete." He is even so ignorant of Indian feeling as to suppose the "natives" to be stingy and incapable of pity for the poor.

"At the portals of the shrine," he writes in Delhi, "beggars stretched their skinny arms out towards me. They live on the strangers; for there is no living to be made out of the lachrymal duct of their compatriots. India's soil has never been productive of the tender plant of pity."

Sentences like these show such blindness to perfectly obvious truths that the writer's comments on the peoples of India and their mind can always be disregarded, and, indeed, he does not trouble himself much about the peoples of India at all. He stayed at Baroda, for instance, but has not a word worth saying about the famous Gaekwar, certainly one of the most conspicuous men in India at the present time. For the rest, as an account of familiar tourist resorts and certain superficial aspects of Anglo-Indian society, the book is worth looking at, and it contains a few good photographs.

THE ENIGMA OF PASCAL.*

It would be an interesting and a useful task to do for Pascal what Miss Grace Norton has done for Montaigne, and bring together in a single volume the most suggestive of the judgments that have been passed upon him from his own day to ours. What a many-colored crowd would jostle one another in its pages! Racine and Bossuet, Madame de Sévigné and Madame de Lafayette, Voltaire, Condorcet, and Vauvenargues, Villemain and Victor Cousin, Prévost-Paradol and Chateaubriand, Sainte-Beuve and Scherer, Leslie Stephen and Dean Church, Brunetière and Sully-Prudhomme—all of them have felt and expressed the attraction of Pascal. And there is little cause for astonishment in this. Pascal touched life at several points and left upon them indelible marks of genius. The achievements of the solitary student are landmarks in the history of mathematical science. The man of the world and of fashion

* "A German Staff Officer in India." By Count Hans von Koenigsmarck. Kegan Paul. 10s. 6d.

* "Pascal." By Viscount St. Cyres. Smith, Elder. 10s. 6d. net.
"Blaise Pascal: A Study in Religious Psychology." By Humphrey R. Jordan. Williams & Norgate. 4s. 6d. net.

wrote a "Discours sur les Passions de l'Amour" which, as a psychological study, was unique in his own time and would be remarkable at any time. The fervid ascetic launched against the Jesuits a succession of controversial pamphlets from which the Order hardly recovered for a period of two centuries, and which, though concerned with a long-extinct controversy, may still be read with enjoyment. Voltaire declared that there was as much salt in the first of the "Provinciales" as in Molière, and that Bossuet contained nothing more sublime than the last. Finally, he left behind him the fragments of a work which, even in its incomplete state, is at once a manual of devotion, a philosophical classic, and the most telling of Christian apologetics.

But if Pascal can claim the world's applause for what he did, it is through his own personality that he most wins our attention. Like Newman, he belongs to the class of the sceptically orthodox, that small band of those who, holding that "the heart has reasons which the reason knows not of," have, in the interests of faith, used the weapons of reason to dethrone reason. This line of thought has led some into a sentimental pietism; others have found it the road to sheer agnosticism. Pascal employs all his psychological observation and keen dialectics to convert it into the strongest bulwark of orthodoxy. Reason, he says in effect, is a prey to a thousand passions and emotions which it fails to recognise and which, none the less, load the dice and bias all its conclusions. Take, first of all, Imagination:—

"She is the lying spirit in man, a mistress of error and deception, all the more treacherous because she is not always so; for she would be an infallible rule of truth, were she an unvarying liar. This proud enemy of reason delights to lord it over her foe, just to show how absolute is her power. She makes the intelligence doubt, affirm, deny. The senses wake or sleep at her bidding. She has her favorites and her wastrels, her rich and poor, her learned and unlearned; for, although she cannot give wisdom to a fool, she can make him happy.

Who but this capricious faculty decrees respect to persons, laws, achievements? She is the mainspring of nearly all the actions of everyone; for reason is routed and the wisest must fain take the caprices of his neighbors as his rule."

Imagination not only colors our judgments but decides what ideas will find a lodging in our minds, for, as Viscount St. Cyres paraphrases Pascal, they "do not attract us because our intellect thinks them true, but because our imagination finds them piquantly new or picturesquely old." "Think," says Pascal, "of the Sultan in his superb seraglio, surrounded by forty thousand Janissaries. Pure indeed must be the reason that sees in him a mortal man."

And imagination is not by any means the only foe of reason. Among many others there are two especially powerful, custom and self-interest. The latter is the concealed but determining factor in a great number of our judgments, and it is ably supported by that innate conservatism of the human mind which goes by the name of custom.

"We are not swayed by proof alone. It merely appeals to the reason; whereas custom appeals to the senses, and these drag the understanding after them without giving it time to reflect. Hence we must look to custom for our deepest, strongest proofs. It has made many a Christian; it makes Turks and Pagans; it determines walks in life. Intellectual convictions are worth little if the mechanical side of our nature is set in the opposite direction: we must win over the whole self. So soon as we know where truth lies we must ask custom to soak and steep us in that belief. For we cannot always be carrying proofs about in our mind; it is much easier to believe by force of habit. This uses neither violence, nor artifice, nor argument; but all unconsciously it brings a certain bias into play, and into that our mind falls naturally."

So convinced was Pascal of the power of custom over the mind, that, in the famous passage of the Wager, having proved to his sceptic that he has no choice but to wager on one side or on the other, he urges him to act as if he already believed. "Go on as others have begun, take holy water, have masses said, &c. Naturally that will make you believe and will stupefy you (vous abêtira)."

"But," says the sceptic, "that is what I am afraid of." "Why?" Pascal answers him, "What have you to lose?"

Viscount St. Cyres defends this attitude of Pascal. It does not mean, he says, that a man may lawfully hocus himself into accepting a creed which he knows to be untrue; "all Pascal maintains is that our 'machine'—our instincts, habits, associations—will never keep pace with our brain unless we call in custom to get them out of an old groove into a new one." This seems to us a begging of the question.

Mr. Alfred Benn has shown in a recent volume the implications that are hidden in the doctrine of the Wager, and the whole trend of Pascal's thought seems to lead to the conclusion that we can attain faith, not by an examination of the intellectual "proofs," but by the sacrifice of our intelligence.

A far more valuable side of Pascal's thought is the way in which he makes much of his argument centre in the Person of Christ. His mind was at once mathematical and mystical, and he had a rooted dislike for all systematic theology. Hence, like Hermann and others of the Ritschlian school, his religion was based upon direct experience, and he repudiated the view that the Person of Christ was dependent for us on any historical judgment. His Second Conversion and the papers found sewn up in his clothes after his death are a sufficient proof of this, and if more be needed it is to be found in dozens of passages from the "Pensées." Moreover, in adopting this attitude, Pascal laid so much stress upon Christ's humanity that some of his words have a curiously modern tone. "The Jews, while inquiring whether He was a God, discovered that He was a man." "Jesus Christ said great things so simply that He hardly seemed to have thought of them, and yet so clearly that it was easy to see what He thought of them." "Who taught the Evangelists to paint a perfectly heroic soul that they succeed so well with Jesus Christ? Why do they make Him so weak in His agony? Cannot they picture constancy in death? Yes, for St. Luke makes St. Stephen more steadfast than Jesus Christ." It would be difficult to find anything stronger than the words we have underlined coming from an orthodox pen until the Modernist movement began.

In truth Pascal is an amazing enigma. All parties find weapons in his armory, and all strive in vain to penetrate to his true mind. Viscount St. Cyres, whose account of Pascal is one of the best, as it is much the fullest, that has yet appeared in English, writes as an orthodox Catholic, and seems to have little doubt that Pascal was the same. Mr. Jordan seems to look upon Pascal as a subject for psychological inquiry. He certainly places him under a less attractive light than does Viscount St. Cyres. This may be due in part to the affected archaism of Mr. Jordan's style, which is not a good vehicle for sympathetic treatment; more probably it comes from a Protestant impatience with the Catholic and ascetic side of Pascal's temperament.

THE UNSOCIAL PASTIME.*

FASHIONS in gambling change, but the game goes on. The most elderly buck about town could not possibly remember the era when high play was the rage, when, in streets and squares grown decorous or somnolent, doors were nightly opened to plungers of all degrees. Those were the romantic days in which a gentleman might meet, hanging in chains, another gentleman whom he had last encountered at the hazard table. No longer ago than 1820 (as may be read in the derelict but amusing tomes of Steinmetz) there was produced a list of 500 names, in London alone, of "noblemen, gentlemen, officers of the Army and Navy, and clergymen, who were veteran or indefatigable gamblers, besides clerks, grocers, linendrapers, &c., and men of the very lowest walks of life"—quite an Epsom meeting, in fact. Interesting, of course; but we need not pretend to forget that the world sits as assiduously and anxiously as ever at Fortune's wheel. One mode vanishes, another comes up. Night by night in London—to the outermost edge of the circle—there must be twenty times the number of houses opened for bridge that were opened sixty or eighty years ago for any game of chance; and who would compare the volume of betting to-day with the few wagers made at Newmarket when Charles II. was riding a horse of his own on that celebrated course? Over one risk or another, Dryden's gamester—who is Everyman—"still shakes the box."

It is but yesterday since some hundreds of newspapers were issuing, by the hundred thousand, coupons for "missing words"; and had we not "treasure hunts," "showers of golden sovereigns," "five-pound note awards," and the "mysterious millionaire" who presented with £1,000 a year for life the first man at Piccadilly Circus whose tie rucked up at the back? At the height of this Laputan craze the Post Office ran out of sixpenny orders, and Sir Alfred Harmsworth was made a peer. By the way, did not the House of Lords promise us a Bill on this subject? Among modern instances, Mr. Nevill just peeps into the Stock Exchange, takes a glance at the Turf, and writes one of the best chapters that we have read on Monte Carlo. These three institutions do not, of course, exhaust the resources of the latter-day gambler, but each of them in its way has at present a somewhat special value for him. At Monte Carlo the player has the satisfaction (for what it may amount to) of knowing that his venture is one of gambling pure and simple; that is to say, the appeal to chance is the extent and limit of his risk. The turn of the wheel apart, he has nothing against him save the resources of the bank. At the other two games it is perhaps rather easier to-day than it ever was before to buy pigs in pokes—to millions of us a joy unparalleled.

* "Light Come, Light Go: Gambling—Gamblers—Wagers—The Turf." By Ralph Nevill. Macmillan. 15s. net.

If, as Butler somewhere says in "Hudibras," the pleasure of being cheated equals that of cheating, the uninstructed gambler in the cheap shares of companies that he knows nothing about should live in a perpetual paradise. He can bang five shillings or a sovereign every day of the year (sundry times a day, restricted only by the postal hours), and never know where it goes, or what becomes of it. "Wot larks!" Where are the one-pound shares of yesterday that South Africa absorbed? The buyer did not even buy them; the dealer and the broker "carried" them unobtrusively for him, and the buyer had the fun of being carried with them—to a limbo that must now be moderately full. South African gold and South African diamonds are but examples picked at large. Australia would furnish any number, and America heaps Pelion upon Ossa. "No risk at all," says the man in the bucket-shop; and, as applied to his own part in the deal, the statement is almost aphoristically true. Among the punters on the Stock Exchange (whose great opportunity came with the Limited Liability Act of 1862), it has been estimated by an expert of our day, Mr. A. J. Wilson, that the substantial winners are about one in a quarter of a million.

In a few weeks another racing season will begin, and some sporting prophets, who do not even know what horses will start, are already prepared to name the winners of the Grand National and the Lincolnshire. The vast army of backers must be more than decimated every year, but at the opening of a new season the places of the victims slain by the odds are very seldom vacant. The Ring hails the newcomers with delight; and the circulars, the flaring advertisements, and the rest of the traps are even now getting ready for them.

Betting is not necessarily the business of fools, but for the fools who make a business of it there is but one end. A small number of astute men live by backing horses, and there is probably no occupation more enthralling; but the brains employed by these steadily successful operators on the turf would almost certainly serve them better in any other calling. As Mr. Nevill says: "A few points in the odds make the difference often of some thousands, and it will require a man's whole time and attention to take advantage of any turn in the market." Not many men betting in this systematic way possess the restraint that is needed at critical moments, and then the stroke misses. As for the young man with means or a little capital who takes to the Turf with the notion of making money, he is "of necessity quickly disillusioned in the most unpleasant of ways. If he knows no racing men he is, of course, hopelessly at sea; but should he have means of obtaining really good information, his fate is generally even more deplorable, for some untoward incident almost invariably happens when a big coup is on, and the good thing goes down. Not a few, in despair at continual losses, make up their minds to wait for 'absolute certainties,' and lay heavy odds on some horse which it would seem cannot possibly be beaten, a method which usually proves very expensive in the end."

But the young idea with a few hundreds or thousands to fling into the Ring is but one in an enormous crowd. He begins gaily by betting on credit in Tattersall's, and, if he sticks to it long enough, drops down gradually from one ready-money enclosure to another till he at last goes under and disappears. He, however, is by no means the mainstay of the Ring. Not long ago, at a meeting of the British Association, it was conjectured by Sir Robert Giffen that the bookmakers pocket every year some £5,000,000 of the nation's wealth. There were those who said that Sir Robert's estimate was a moderate one. Perhaps it is safe to add, as a farther conjecture, that the greater part of this prodigious sum comes from the pockets of persons who should never bet at all, inasmuch as they cannot afford to do so. The small tradespeople, the clerks, the mechanics, the artisans, the laborers of kinds, the household servants—what money do they pour annually into the Ring? The bookmaker or his touts will have them all. Your maid who answers the back door is scarcely safer than the man in the factory or the public-house, for in many districts which are minutely mapped out by the master bookmaker, his agents call regularly for orders, and have been spotted in the disguise of the "vegetables" or the "milk." Strange were the disclosures made before the Lords' Commission. Talk about the interest in horseflesh: possibly not one person in five thousand taking the odds in shillings to-day has ever set foot on a racecourse, and it is conceivable that not many among them could tell the difference between the St. Leger and a maiden hurdle race.

Even at this day, on the subject of the Turf, the most absurd illusions are everywhere found, and it is to the interest of the sporting press to foster them. When the King won the Derby with Minoru, a frantic tipster (who had given the wrong horse) headed his report with the legend: "999 Years' Lease for Racing," and several notes of exclamation. Now this was one of the drollest victories ever achieved in a "classic" contest. Not only had his Majesty not bred the horse, he did not even own it. Minoru (by no means a tip-top performer) had been leased for racing purposes from some other magnate of the Turf. With the race and its result his Majesty, an unexceptionable sportsman, had rather less to do than the clerk of the scales, who was at least able to assure us that the jockey had weighed in correctly. There is little altruism on the Turf, but we honestly believe there are backers in a humble way who vaguely fancy that the shilling with which they cross the bookmaker's palm helps the King to a good night's rest.

And what of Monte Carlo, on which Mr. Nevill writes so excellent a chapter? The atmosphere of Monte Carlo is clearer than that of the bucket-shop, clearer than that of the betting-ring. If we are to gamble, let us take the pure odds against the blended ones; let us understand the game we are in for. No unsophisticated speculator in a mining hazard knows the worth of the prospectus submitted to him. The shrewdest backer entering the Ring cannot take account of the forces arrayed against him: how often does it happen that the "odds-on chance"—believed in by the bookmakers themselves, by the trainer of the horse, by the owner, by the jockey—is bowled over! The affair of the mine is frequently a swindle throughout; the issue of the race may be a "ramp" or a sheer accident. But the player at roulette—if the table is as honestly managed as it is at Monte Carlo—sits down to a game of chance at which the odds against him are as pure as chance can make them. He is beaten (after breaking the bank, perhaps), not because he is swindled, but because the force at the back of the impassive croupier stands for Fortunatus's purse or the lamp of Aladdin—and also because there is no reason why twenty runs on red should be followed by a twenty-first.

A chance, if we trace the word up, implies the notion of a fall; and, in every gambling risk we take, our devoutest hope is that the other party to the risk will land upon his head. It is the most exciting, the most unsocial, and the most disintegrating of pastimes. It is our win or the other man's; it is tooth-and-nail.

"MADNESS FROM WITHIN."*

THE publishers of these anonymous confessions, written by a lady after her return to sanity, state that the book is "a genuine record of a case of madness from the patient's point of view," valuable especially to doctors, but offered to the general public as "a weirdly sensational novel." No doubt the record is substantially authentic, and the word "sensational" is to be deprecated. The literature of madness undoubtedly gains by the book. Shaped by an artist of morbid talent, such as Strindberg, the material might have taken aesthetic form of permanent value, to which, as it stands, it, of course, lays no claim.

* "The Maniac. A Realistic Study of Madness from the Maniac's Point of View." Rebman. 6s.

The heroine is a London woman journalist, fagged out by her daily duties, as well as by the strain of writing a number of stories of "borderland experiences" out of office hours, the material for which had been given her by a fellow clerk, a lady spiritualist, though not a professional medium. The heroine disclaims being a spiritualist herself, though familiar with the literature of psychical research. She states this as an explanation of the workings of her mind during insanity. No indication is given as to the history of the mental soundness of her family stock. The attack (which develops rapidly into acute mania) begins, following a few days of exceptional fatigue, by a man's voice asking the heroine a number of ordinary questions, one night directly she had placed her head on her pillow. The presence of the bodiless Voice in her room seemed perfectly natural, which shows, in turn, that her sane self was splitting up, so to say, into insane selves. This man's Voice appeared to be that of "Ray Hall," an artist unknown to her, whose work she had seen and admired, and round it speedily crystallise all her moral, altruistic sentiments, and her feminine longing to be loved.

Now begins the narrative of the patient's growing obsession by a variety of fresh Voices, all suggesting to her irrational ideas and lines of conduct which her critical faculty seeks to put to the test. The value of the document lies in the perpetual struggle it reveals between the diseased centres of the brain and those which hold out and remain fairly normal. The sufferer's mind may be likened to a sheet of paper over which rivulets of ink are streaming, gradually forming into an elaborate network of trunk and branch arteries. An idea which enters the sufferer's consciousness passes from a sane into an insane conception accordingly as it drifts from the white surface and is deflected down the black channels. The author, with good reason as it appears to us, asserts that the most highly-trained "mental" doctors and nurses are evidently utterly at sea with regard to a lunatic's consciousness. The location, the extent, above all the limitations, of a mad person's consciousness are wholly misjudged and misapprehended. The sane centres may seem to be entirely blotted out, to the onlooker, but probably they are actively taking part all the time in the internal drama of the madman's consciousness, and they may be likened to prompters in the wings who keep giving cues and instructions to drunken actors on the stage. It has often been remarked that people out of their wits show flashes of piercing intuition and understanding that are beyond the normal range of their sane selves. This would seem to be because the inflamed brain, working at intensely high pressure, is abnormally sensitive to every mental impression, just as the body, in some states of illness, is agonised by vibrations of sound or light which in health scarcely affect our consciousness. A madman will detect fear in the mind of his attendant by other than visible signs. The present writer remembers an occasion when he found that the only way of outwitting a certain madman lay in deliberately banishing all feelings towards him but those of affection and sympathy. If it be asked what is the gain of viewing "madness from within," and of following the patient's protean flow of wild impulses, disjointed ideas, and monstrous delusions, it may be replied that in order to soothe and control the diseased mind it is highly important to realise that motives which are absurd on our plane of consciousness are highly rational on the sufferer's plane. A clever suggestion to the patient may accomplish what force or argument is powerless to effect. "Suggestions reaching the brain will take effect quite irrespective of the lunatic's consciousness, whereas attempts to 'reason' a patient out of his delusions can produce no effect whatever," says our author. A striking illustration of the futility of employing argument may be quoted:—

I said at last to the voices—

"What am I to do? I really think that these are not nurses—nor women—but fiends in disguise."

The voices answered—

"Perhaps they are. You must test them to find that out."

"How am I to do so?"

"Now that they are bringing you the medicine again to kill you, sit up and spit in their faces. If they are fiends, that will exorcise them, and compel them to resume their true forms and cease personating other people's forms. That is your only way of testing who they are. Now! do it!"

The nurses were trying to make me take and drink a wineglassful of medicine.

I turned away from the glass, and from the nurse who was offering it to me, at my right hand, and I spat in the face of the other nurse, who was standing at my left side, and who was quite unprepared for such sudden attack.

She exclaimed angrily—

"Don't be so disgusting!" And she remained a nurse, and was not exorcised into revealing herself as anything else!

Seeing this, I felt most ashamed of what I had done, and I said mentally to the voices—

"They really are nurses and not fiends. I wish I hadn't spat at that woman."

"Yes," answered the voice, "they are, but it was absolutely necessary that it should be proved. It is evident the nurses are not fiends; but, for goodness' sake, look out and don't lie down! There is a real, most terrible fiend just approaching to the foot of your bed! It is going to attack you at this instant! If you don't at once go for it, it will go for you!"

I inquired in terror how I was to "go for" it? (I saw nothing.)

"Lean forward in bed and spit and spit and spit at it until it is routed and we tell you to leave off. It is standing exactly behind the central foot-rail of your bed. Be quick!"

With the courage and fury of intense fear, I sprang towards the end of the bed and spat into vacancy, without ceasing, for the space of several minutes.

The nurse said, "Drink it!—you must! Take the glass!" I thought "I won't take it and drink of my own accord. To be compelled, against my will, to commit suicide, is a little too much! If these people insist upon a murder, they shall, at least, commit it themselves, and not force me into committing it for them! And they shall not kill me without their own deliberate intention, and thorough understanding of what they are doing."

I said to the nurse—

"If you insist on my taking this medicine, which kills me, you yourself must give it to me. You must hold the glass to my lips and say, 'If it be God's will!' Otherwise I refuse to drink it."

The nurse held the glass to my lips, and repeated the formula upon which I had insisted. She tilted the glass until I had drained the very last drop.

I did not attempt to evade doing so; but as I drank I thought—

"Now, if it is God's will that I must die again, I die! But if there is a God of Justice anywhere in the Universe, I will go straight to Him and find Him, wherever He may be! I will demand justice!"

The curious sequel to the above scene shows how the patient passes, in sleep, through Limbo into Heaven, where her case is stated and answered in a single flash of thought-transference before the Judgment Seat. She is told that she may remain among the elect, but she does not feel particularly enthusiastic at the prospect, and asks, "Where is Ray Hall?" "He is still on earth battling with the fiends." "Then I will go back to earth," she promptly replies, to the great astonishment of the heavenly host. The megalomania of the insane is reflected in her satisfaction that she should be causing this general sensation, but her reply shows how vague and chill a hold has the conception of Heaven in the depths of the human consciousness. And the sound sense of this decision (since "Ray Hall" incarnates to the sufferer all that is best in life) is typical of a mad mind even when the patient is utterly bewildered by "finding oneself, in some utterly unaccountable, inexplicable way, thrust in and out of bodies which do not belong to that identity . . . bewilderment amounting to perfect hell-torment of suffering." It is, indeed, in the vivid description of the fearful agonies of body and mind endured by the heroine that this volume should be studied attentively by the student of medicine. The legion of fiends which possess the maniac, the frenzy of terror, the thousands of mad voices yelling in his ears, the bloodcurdling sights and sounds, and the hideous spectacles which constantly change and interchange, leave one wondering whether treatment may not often aggravate the states it is meant to alleviate. The author suggests that an unexpected touch on the skin, forcible compulsion in acts such as taking a bath, the use of draperies in the sick room, and such-like simple factors, may bring on, or acutely intensify, the agony borne by the diseased brain. It is undoubtedly the case in states of acute hyperaesthesia in certain illnesses that much unnecessary suffering is caused by the friction of wrong conditions, and, as the mad patient cannot explain his terrors and intense aversions to his attendants, there is all the more reason for the most careful watch to be kept for trifling causes that aggravate his condition. It is not to

FORTY YEARS AGO AND AFTER.

By J. GEORGE TETLEY, D.D., Magdalen College, Oxford, Archdeacon-Designate of Bristol, Canon of Bristol Cathedral. With a Frontispiece. Large crown 8vo, cloth 6s. net (post free, 6s. 4d.).

The Author has collected in this volume some sketches of English life based on a long knowledge of city and country alike. There are anecdotes connected with his own College, Magdalen, which have not hitherto been in print, and reminiscences of old friendships, and the talk of more than one man of note no longer alive.

Besides these, there is some work of a more serious historical character, and studies on the religious aspect of Art.

T. FISHER UNWIN.

PRACTICAL HOUSING.

By J. S. NETTLEFOLD. With a Preface by the Rt. Hon. ALFRED LYTTTELTON, K.C., M.P., and 38 Illustrations. New and Revised Edition. Paper covers 1s. net, and cloth 2s. net (postage 4d. extra).

The contents include: The Housing and Town-Planning Act, 1909: An Explanation.—English Examples of Town-Planning.—The Pioneer Co-Partnership Village.—Municipal House Building.—Individual Ownership.—Rural Housing, etc., etc.

T. FISHER UNWIN.

THE FIRELESS COOKERY BOOK.

By MARGARET J. MITCHELL. 4s. 6d. net (post free, 4s. 10d.).

"This book presents in simple form all necessary directions for making and using the inexpensive hay box, or fireless cooker, as employed by the Scandinavian housewife. No up-to-date housekeeper or cook will be long without this guide to real labour-saving in housework."

T. FISHER UNWIN.

THE HUNGRY FORTIES. Country Life Under Protection.

By Mrs. COBDEN UNWIN. Paper covers, 1d.

The Athenæum says:—"These peep-holes into the actual life of the labourer in the 'hungry forties' have something in them of the quality which is permanent in memory."

Supplied for distribution purposes on the following special terms—

100 at 6s.	500 at 25s.
250 at 13s. 9d.	1,000 at 45s.

T. FISHER UNWIN.

H. DE VERE STACPOOLE'S GREAT NEW ROMANCE. GARRYOWEN.

By the Author of "The Blue Lagoon," "Patsy," etc. 6s. post free.

Ladies' Field:—"It is an excellent romance, well thought out, well written, developed with the utmost ingenuity and skill in detailed scenes so vividly described that the reader's excitement increases with each obstacle overcome."

Obtainable at all Libraries and Booksellers.

T. FISHER UNWIN.

BOOKS IN DEMAND

Published by STANLEY PAUL & CO.

THE DAUPHINES OF FRANCE

TIMES.—"The author is a lively memoir writer who has already, like many others, found in French history an abundant supply of bait wherewith to lure a greedy public."

SCOTSMAN.—"Carefully studied and gracefully written, it has much in it to interest readers who like true tales of the ceremonies and sorrows of royalty."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"Mr. Hamel has the right touch, and treats history in a mood of gay vivacity. The reader will find the various studies always animated, well informed, and excellently phrased. Certainly these stories make romantic reading, and Mr. Hamel handles his material with dexterity and force. In his glowing pages he seizes every opportunity for lively and impressive description."

STANDARD OF EMPIRE.—"Its four hundred large pages are full of racy, picturesque, anecdotal history of the inner life of the Courts of France—probably the most splendid and interesting of all the Courts of modern history. The period covered is extremely attractive, and a more genuinely suitable book for a winter fireside would be hard to find."

THE DAUPHINES OF FRANCE

By FRANK HAMEL.

Demy 8vo, Illustrated, 16s. net.

OUTLOOK.—"Mr. Hamel has worked with much discretion, aided by a light hand, a fascinating manner, and an entire absence of pretentiousness. We have not met within the same compass so faithful and complete a revelation of the life of the royalties and of the noblesse. We are told what they ate, what they wore, and what they said; and we are told of their delight in pageants and processions and banquets, of their childish extravagance, of their ceremonial and etiquette. The portraits in this entertaining volume are instructive and admirably reproduced. The frontispiece is charming enough to be removed and framed on its own merits as a picture. On the whole a book suitable for presentation by uncles and guardians."

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"Miss Hamel is the first writer to bring together in one volume the fifteen Dauphines of France. Of each of the Dauphines Miss Hamel has given us a brief but finished study. If any gentleman is still hesitating over a seasonable present for the most intelligent girl graduate of his acquaintance, let him go forthwith to the bookseller."

MORNING LEADER.—"Miss Hamel does for French history what Miss Strickland did for the lives of the English queens. An admirable volume."

THREE GOOD 6s. NOVELS

LOVE BESIEGED CHARLES E. PEARCE

DUNDEE ADVERTISER.—"This active and finely emotional novel I have read with equal attention and admiration, and heartily commend it to those who are ready for a well-studied and sympathetic romance that without extravagance surrounds facts with the glamour of imagination and sentiment. I am putting 'Love Besieged' aside near at hand for a speedy re-reading, for its heroine and her regenerated lover are characters that one likes to keep company with."

TIMES.—"A well-written romance."

LIVERPOOL DAILY POST.—"Distinctively interesting, and the reader is not likely to lay the book down until he has read to the end."

BROAD ARROW.—"The love story is sufficiently dramatic to enthral the most blasé novel reader."

TROPICAL TALES DOLF WYLLARDE

DAILY NEWS.—"The author's cleverness is unquestionable. We could scarcely imagine her writing a dull story."

GOLDEN APHRODITE WINIFRED CRISPE

MORNING LEADER.—"Very vivid and interesting."

DUNDEE COURIER.—"Runs without a dull moment; told with considerable literary power."

COUNTRY LIFE.—"The book has all the readable qualities of its predecessors, and can be recommended for a dull afternoon. The situations are excellent."

GLOBE.—"An attractive story in which the interest never flags."

LIVERPOOL DAILY POST.—"The situations which the problem produces are cleverly dealt with."

TIMES.—"Here we have a tense drama."

ABERDEEN JOURNAL.—"We make bold to say that every reader of this truly novel novel will lay it down after perusal with genuine satisfaction. A model of condensation."

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"A quite powerful story, well told."

OUTLOOK.—"A thoroughly feminine composition full of limelight effects."

STANDARD.—"A novel that demands serious criticism; by far the best novel Miss Crispe has yet written."

NO POLITICIAN SHOULD MISS THIS BOOK

THE DOOKS' DOOMSDAY BOOK

Includes "Weppys' Diary," "Dook Dulliver's Travels," "Fitz of O'Mark Hyam," "The Rime of the Smiling Chancellor," and many other parodies of well-known poems, nursery rhymes, and comic songs; and a host of other bright and breezy miscellaneous items. "THE DOOKS' DOOMSDAY BOOK" is Fully Illustrated. Sixpence. Sold everywhere.

STANLEY PAUL & CO., Clifford's Inn, London.

be expected that in a case of acute mania the delusions should be of a beautiful nature, but it is highly interesting to find that the mere external manifestations of violent and indecorous behavior, ribald talk, and so forth, may coincide with an internal drama in which the sufferer's moral nature is making a gallant fight against the tormenting and evil forces of which it is the victim. There is one beautiful passage in the book which describes how the spirit of a beggar-girl, whose despairing and beautiful eyes had haunted the heroine in her youth, comes to the bedside and tells how she had killed herself in her misery. The psychological value of "The Maniac" is all the greater since nothing seems to have been concealed by the writer, but we regret that the "London specialist," who had charge of the case, and "at whose instigation it was written," has not prefaced it with a criticism from the medical standpoint.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

WHEN the Low Countries, emerging from the wars of the Middle Ages, ceased to be known merely as the battleground of Europe and began to lay the foundations of that commercial prosperity which was theirs, in spite of Spanish aggression, during the succeeding centuries, the commercial growth was accompanied by a strong demand for art and architecture. Men gave freely of their wealth for the encouragement of artistic talent; in the sixteenth century flourished a school of painters who, despite the checking of their natural development by Italian influence, have left a mark on history; and, in architecture, churches rose from the builders' hands in vast numbers, to bear witness to both the national enthusiasm for religion and the national generosity with its wealth. Many of these churches are dealt with very thoroughly by Mr. T. Francis Bumpus in "The Cathedrals and Churches of Belgium" (Werner Laurie, 6s. net). The author is not wholly laudatory in regard to the Belgian churches. While doing full justice to the finer examples, he contrasts them as a whole with the French churches, to their disadvantage. The effort that produced them was neither so well organised nor so educated as that which was responsible for the architectural growth of the neighboring country, and he is probably right in suggesting that herein lies the secret of the comparative failure of certain ostentatious Belgian cathedrals. We think, however, that he is on less sure ground in suggesting that the commercial prosperity of the country and the national greed for money were detrimental to the spirit of religious architecture. History has shown that commercial keenness is by no means incompatible with strong religious feeling; rather, that both art and religion are among the natural safety valves of a nation engaged in the feverish pursuit of wealth. There is more in the theory that the want of unity observable in Belgian church architecture is due to the independence of character which, in this, as in other departments of life, was the Netherlander's prominent attribute. Generalisations apart, Mr. Bumpus shows his firm grip of the subject in every line of this volume. Beginning with a short sketch of Belgian history—a most necessary adjunct to the intelligent study of Belgian architecture—he takes us through a selection of the most notable buildings, and then to the general character of the church furniture and decoration, the latter, of course, including pictures. The second part of the book is in the form of a personally conducted tour through Tournai and Ypres, Malines and Brussels, Antwerp, Louvain, and Oudenarde, to mention but a few of the places visited; and here the reader whose ideas of Belgian cathedrals are based on Antwerp Cathedral, or that of Bruges, and whose knowledge of Flemish ecclesiastical art is confined to the Rubenses at Antwerp and the Van Eyck altarpiece at Ghent, will find much new and fascinating matter revealed to him. Mr. Bumpus's knowledge of ecclesiology and his life-long study of church architecture have served him well in this work, which must be considered one of the most successful he has written.

MR. G. F. ABBOTT is always a lively and entertaining writer, and he has produced nothing more readable than his "Turkey in Transition" (Arnold, 12s. 6d.). It is much less obviously a special pleading for the Greeks than was his book on Macedonia. It is an artistic combination of travel sketch with political study. It contrives to give a lively and human picture of contemporary types, from the old-world Cadi to the most advanced Young Turk. It is also a history, as well-written as it is commendably fair, of recent events in Constantinople. At bottom Mr. Abbott, like every good Greek, doubts whether any good can come of any Turkish movement, and he reveals his bias with a frankness which at once warns and disarms. But we have had so much writing inspired by the contrary bias, that this book comes as a most welcome corrective. We are in full sympathy with all he has written of the Young Turkish tendency to chauvinism and centralisation. But, perhaps, he has hardly done justice to the readiness which some of the wiser leaders of the Committee have shown to profit by experience and to modify their rigid theories.

"A HISTORY OF MALTA DURING THE PERIOD OF THE FRENCH AND BRITISH OCCUPATIONS, 1798-1815" (Longmans, 21s. net) is a work upon which the late Mr. William Hardman, of Valetta, was engaged at the time of his death, and which now appears under the editorship of Dr. Holland Rose. Its main value consists in the very full series of English and foreign documents referring to events in Maltese history which it contains, but there is much that will also interest the general reader. The opening chapter, for example, describes the condition of the Maltese people at the close of the eighteenth century, and is justly severe upon the tyranny, corruption, and dissoluteness of the Knights of St. John. Dr. Holland Rose contributes a long introduction in which he analyses the motives that led Napoleon to seize Malta as the first step in an enterprise which was intended to make him master of India. Napoleon thought at first of making Corfu the chief pawn in his game, but he soon realised the strategical importance of Malta, though, for reasons explained by Dr. Rose, the policy of Great Britain in regard to the island was at first lacking in determination. It is by no means easy to disentangle the threads of intrigue which were spun around Malta during the Napoleonic wars. But the industry of Mr. Hardman has brought together materials which will be valued by all students of the period. Dr. Holland Rose—upon whose knowledge of Napoleon and the Napoleonic period no comment is necessary—has written a lengthy introduction, revised Mr. Hardman's manuscript, and added a number of notes.

"OUR NATIONAL DRINK BILL," written for the National Commercial Temperance League by John Newton (Nisbet, 1s.), presents in a compact and largely statistical form a statement of the annual cost to the country caused, directly and indirectly, by the consumption of alcohol. While the moral and humanitarian side of this question is not neglected, the book is primarily addressed to those likely to be influenced by a discussion from the business or economic point of view. Many of the remoter consequences of the drink habit are not capable of statistical treatment, but the mere enumeration of those losses which can be more or less accurately estimated leads the writer to the truly appalling conclusion that the indirect loss to the community is somewhat greater than the direct cost of drink, i.e., £180,000,000 as against £160,000,000 annually. Although these figures should not be pressed too closely, when every allowance for possible error has been made, the grossly wasteful and demoralising nature of our national drinking is forcibly impressed upon the mind of an impartial reader.

MISS WINIFRED KNOX's monograph on Louis IX., "The Court of a Saint" (Methuen, 10s. 6d. net), is a sound piece of work much above the average level of modern historical biography. She has read and mastered her material, and her work not only enables the reader to form a picture of St. Louis and his surroundings, but also helps him to grasp something of the spirit and controlling ideas of a fascinating period. Miss Knox's style is picturesque, vivid, and allusive, though not altogether free from over-elaboration. She is a great admirer of St. Louis—what reader of his life is not?—and her portrait shows that the monk-ridden, ascetic king whom the chroniclers drew, is a Just out. 2s. 6d.

The People's Progress.

By FRANK IRESON.

A study of the economic progress made during the last sixty years by the people of the United Kingdom. It discusses the distribution of income and the rewards of capital, and is offered as a corrective to the many exaggerations concerning the alleged wealth of the rich, so freely placed by Socialists before the public. Its chief object is to show that the efficient artisan class, who form 65 per cent. of the population, have nothing to gain, and much to lose, by supporting the cause of Socialism.

Just out. 2s. 6d. net.

Ancient and Modern Imperialism.

BY THE

EARL OF CROMER, G.C.B., O.M., G.C.M.G.

"... what could be more fascinating than to have these reflections on the Imperialism of the ancient world written by one who has himself taken a leading part in the Imperialism of the modern world? This little book deserves to be closely studied from cover to cover by all who are interested in the future development of the British Empire."—The Daily Chronicle.

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW.

No. 422. JANUARY, 1910. 6s.

- | | |
|--|---|
| 1. BYRON AND BONAPARTE. | 8. DEMOCRACY IN SWITZERLAND. By W. S. LILLY. |
| 2. THE NATIONAL ARCHIVES. | 9. GEORGE MEREDITH. By PERCY LUBBOCK. |
| 3. JACAPONE DA TODI: THE POET OF THE STABAT MATER. | 10. ORIENTAL ART. By ROGER FRY. |
| 4. ANCIENT JERUSALEM. By the Rev. Dr. BURNEY. | 11. BEFORE AND AFTER THE DESCENT FROM ELBA. By the Right Hon. Sir CHARLES W. DILKE, Bart. |
| 5. THIRTY YEARS OF GOLF. By HORACE G. HUTCHINSON. | 12. ANGUS. |
| 6. THE RISE OF THE NATIVE. By Sir H. H. JOHNSTON, G.C.M.G. | 13. THE APPEAL TO THE NATION. |
| 7. WHAT THE POOR WANT. By STEPHEN REYNOLDS. | |

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

Labour in Portuguese West Africa.

By WILLIAM A. CADBURY.

Crown 8vo, with a Coloured Map, 2s. 6d. net.

Under the advice of counsel the publication of this book was postponed pending the libel action recently heard in the Courts. It is now issued with an additional chapter. It contains a full account of the author's personal experiences in S. Thomé and Príncipe, and on the Angola coast, and also reprints Mr. Burt's report of his previous visit and long journey to the Hinterland of Angola.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS, Ltd., 68-74, Carter Lane, London

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. By Post, 9d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2 COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME V. OF THE NATION

Is now ready, and can be obtained free on application to the Manager.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S LIST

Trans-Himalaya:

Discoveries and Adventures in Tibet. By Dr. SVEN HEDIN. With 388 Illustrations from Photographs, Water-Colour Sketches, and Drawings by the Author, and 10 maps. 2 vols. 8vo, 30s. net.

Light Come, Light Go.

Gambling—Gamblers—Wagers—The Turf. By RALPH NEVILL. With 9 Coloured Plates and other Illustrations. 8vo, 15s. net.

VOLUME VI. NOW READY.

History of English Poetry.

By W. J. COURTHOPE, C.B., M.A., D.Litt., LL.D. Vol. VI. The Romantic Movement in English Poetry; Effects of the French Revolution. 8vo, 10s. net.

* Previously published Vols. I-V. 10s. net each.

SECOND IMPRESSION NOW READY.

Time's Laughingstocks and

Other Verses. By THOMAS HARDY. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

The Athenæum.—"The same faculty which has made Mr. Hardy a master of rustic tragedy, and which has placed the great drama of history within his grasp, enables him also to handle the subtlest of themes and analyse the most transient of emotions with an exactitude worthy of the great names in our literature."

Dionysius of Halicarnassus on Literary Composition: being the Greek Text of the "De Compositione Verborum." Edited, with Introduction, Translation, Notes, Glossary, and Appendices, by Professor W. RHYS ROBERTS, Litt.D. 8vo, 10s. net. [Classical Library.]

A Project of Empire. A Critical

Study of the Economics of Imperialism, with special reference to the Ideas of ADAM SMITH. By J. SHIELD NICHOLSON, M.A., D.Sc., F.B.A., Professor of Political Economy in the University of Edinburgh. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

The Times.—"This singularly able book... attractive not merely by the acuteness and knowledge of the writer, but by his transparent fairness... full of interest and instruction. It is written for to-day; it deals with questions discussed on every platform."

The Government of England.

By Professor A. LAWRENCE LOWELL. 2 vols. 8vo, 17s. net.

The Times.—"Professor Lowell's work has in reality no rival; its extraordinary merit is due to his possession of two qualities, each rare in itself, and still more rarely found in combination. The first of these qualities must be patent to every intelligent reader. It is Professor Lowell's thoroughgoing knowledge and complete mastery of his subject."

Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution.

By A. V. DICEY, D.C.L., of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. Seventh Edition. 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

The Rhythm of Modern Music.

By C. F. ABDY WILLIAMS. Extra crown 8vo, 5s. net.

The Globe.—"We heartily congratulate Dr. Abdy Williams on this work... The author has treated his subject with a suggestive skill and an intimate feeling for all that is best in the music of our time, which makes this volume one of extreme value, and one which all musicians will read with real pleasure."

The Evolution of Worlds.

By Professor PERCIVAL LOWELL, A.B., LL.D., &c. Author of "Mars and its Canals," "Mars as the Abode of Life." Illustrated, 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

The Promise of American Life.

By HERBERT CROLY. Crown 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

THE EDINBURGH REVIEW

No. 431. JANUARY, 1910. Price 6s.

Articles—

- | | |
|--|--|
| I. INDUSTRY AND EMPLOYMENT. | VI. THE REFERENDUM. |
| II. LORENZO DE' MEDICI. | VII. THE TYRANNY OF THE NILE. |
| III. PITT AND THE TRIPLE ALLIANCE (1788-1791). | VIII. GOVERNOR PITT. |
| IV. MOLIERE. | IX. EDGAR ALLAN POE. |
| V. THE TRICENTENARY OF THE TELESCOPE. | X. L'EMPIRE LIBERAL. |
| | XI. THE HOUSE OF LORDS AND THE BUDGET. |

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., 39, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

mere travesty of a strong, brave, unselfish, and engaging personality. But she is also alive to the evil results which the consecration of the monarchy, due to St. Louis's reign, brought upon his country. "The very virtues of the king," as she points out in the last page of her well-balanced and convincing estimate, "led to the perfection of a system which meant ruin to the liberties of France." His true greatness is to be found in the spiritual ideals towards which he strove, and Sainte Chapelle is his fittest monument.

* * *

MR. W. P. BAINES has acquitted himself well of a very difficult task by his translation of "Egypt," by Pierre Loti (Werner Laurie, 15s. net). The charm of Loti (for those who find charm in his later writings) is, above all, in his atmosphere, and to render an atmosphere is the greatest difficulty of a translator. Loti is an impressionist and a sentimentalist, and in these sketches of Egypt we do not see him at his best. There is more than a touch of the insincerity and striking of attitudes that beset the sentimentalist, and of the striving after effect that few impressionists avoid. But Egypt is a land of fascination; its spell has been cast over so many that there are a crowd of English readers who would like to look at it through Loti's eyes. It is presumably for these that Mr. Baines has made his translation. They will lose much that is conveyed by the original, but they are to be congratulated on having so capable a translation as Mr. Baines has produced.

* * *

"LORD KELVIN'S EARLY HOME" (Macmillan, 8s. 6d. net) seems intended to supplement the biography by Dr. Silvanus Thompson, which is now in the press. It contains the recollections of Lord Kelvin's sister, the late Mrs. Elizabeth King, together with some family correspondence. The recollections were not intended for publication, but jotted down from time to time by their writer and intended solely for the benefit of her children and grandchildren. The notes open with an account of Lord Kelvin's father, Professor William Thomson, of Belfast, who sympathised with the rebellion of 1798, and appears to have impressed upon his children the cruelties inflicted upon the rebels by Castlereagh and Londonderry. In 1832 the household migrated to Glasgow where Lord Kelvin began his literary career at the age of ten. Seven years later, he went to Peterhouse, to return to Glasgow as Professor of Natural Philosophy. The book gives us a delightful glimpse into the family life and early training of the famous man of science, and is also to be recommended for the simple and unaffected style in which Mrs. King's reminiscences are set forth.

* * *

It is rather late in the day for scholars to assume as a matter of course that no prose rendering of an ancient poet "can represent verse aesthetically." Mr. Lang's "Homer" and Mr. Mackail's "Vergil" are a sufficient refutation of that pessimism. In their new translation of "The Plays of Aeschylus" for Bohn's Libraries (Bell, 3s. 6d.), Mr. C. E. S. Headlam and the Dr. Walter Headlam disclaim any intention of producing a version that pretends to "any value in artistic form." Their vocabulary, in fact, is often quite wantonly prosy, and the structure of their sentences so close to the original as to be often obscure. But on the other hand the pains which have been taken to make the version minutely accurate make it a valuable aid to the student. A reader who has ever had the pleasure of hearing Professor Gilbert Murray's lectures on "Aeschylus" knows, however, that accuracy is not incompatible with an exquisitely chosen diction and a rhythmical swing in the sentences.

The Week in the City.

	Price Friday morning, Jan. 7.	Price Friday morning, Jan. 14.
Consols	82½	82½
Midland Def.	57½	58½
Union Pacific	207	202½
Mexican 1st Pref.	134	133
U.S. Steel	90	89½

BUSINESS has been fairly lively, and if political uncertainties were removed, it seems likely enough that hopes of active markets might be realised. Very easy conditions have prevailed in the Money market, and Thursday's Bank return showed a strong position, chiefly owing to the reflux of currency from the provinces as usual in January. The Stock Exchange is still very confident about a Unionist victory, and if its hopes on this subject are disappointed, a good deal of hasty selling may be expected. Investment business has been on a large scale, but fresh creations of capital are likely to feed the demand very freely; a big Indian loan was only a very moderate success, half of it being left to the underwriters, and now a large Canadian loan is talked of. Speculative activity has been chiefly centred in mining and rubber shares. The West African market has been active with an up and down tendency, and there have been enormous dealings in rubber shares, rather too enormous in the view of cautious observers.

Wall Street's position is attracting more attention than usual at present, owing to indications of weakness to which I have recently referred. Some of the more pessimistic critics of American financial methods are shaking their heads ominously and saying that the state of affairs is not unlike that of 1907. This is perhaps unnecessary eagerness to look for trouble, and though the state of public opinion in the United States is at all times a very difficult matter to gauge, it is probably true that the most important cause of the crisis of 1907, which was the general mistrust among the public of Wall Street with its ways, is at least not nearly as acute now. Then, as will be well remembered, a series of scandals and disclosures concerning the management of insurance companies and other matters had made the American public so nervous that they began a run on trust companies, and would have run on the banks likewise, if the latter had not adopted the simple expedient of refusing to meet claims on them in cash. Since then, however, confidence has been to a great extent restored, and unless events should occur to undermine it again, there seems to be no reason to anticipate a repetition of the events of 1907. At the same time there can be no doubt that the United States have been, as usual, in too much of a hurry to make paper and call it wealth. They have forced up prices both of goods and of securities, and consequently find that a pyramid of credit has been built up on a slender metallic foundation. And an adverse trade balance, due to the eagerness with which they have bought foreign goods, makes it difficult for them to retain their gold and forces them to do all that they can to obtain credit abroad. Liquidation is evidently necessary, instead of which they indulge in grandiose schemes for financing the Manchurian railways and incidentally upsetting the balance of power in the Far East.

GENERAL DULNESS.

General markets have been rather dull, and it is evident that the eagerness with which professional operators anticipated an outburst of business in New Year has been bad for the technical position, by creating a host of weak and nervous bulls frightened by every breath of adverse rumor. The announcement of a big Indian loan was an untimely blow for the Consol market, which is already in rather a top-heavy condition owing to the difficulties which at present beset the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the requirements of Irish land finance, and the maturing in April of the War Loan.

JANUS.

EVANS'

ANTISEPTIC THROAT PASTILLES

are THE remedy for Loss of Voice, Huskiness or Soreness of the Throat, Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, &c. These Pastilles have an unrivalled reputation for their wonderfully soothing qualities for all Throat troubles. Made to a formula of the Liverpool Throat Hospital.

1/- and 4/6 per box
of all Chemists, Stores, &c.

Write for Sample enclosing 1d. stamp to cover postage to
EVANS SONS LESCHER & WEBB, Ltd.,
Hanover Street, Liverpool.

Ask for EVANS' Pastilles and refuse all imitations.

TANGYE'S
TYPE "AA" OIL ENGINE

*For Farm or Estate Work,
Country-House Lighting, &c.*

TANGYES LTD., BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE
& BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.
In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

TOURS.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."

£12 12s. OPORTO, GIBRALTAR, TANGIER, ALGIERS,
PALERMO, February 15th.

£26 5s. PALESTINE, EGYPT, CONSTANTINOPLE, GREECE,
March 3rd.

Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

£7 7s. —SKI-ING, SKATING, TOBOGGANNING
TOURS, including Second-Class Return Ticket
and Accommodation Hotel Aubepine, Ballaigues. Also Hotels at Mantana, Villars. St. Beatenberg, Wengen, Lenzerheide, etc.—
Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, London, S.W.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED).

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it
WILL BE REPLACED.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,

LISTS SENT POST FREE. 53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

The 1s. Illustrated Bible, 1s. 3d. post free. The Red Letter Bible, from 5s. 4d.
The Indexed Salvation New Testament, 1s. 6d. post free. [post free.
The Red Letter New Testament, 1s., 1s. 6d. post free.
The Sunday School Prize Bible, with Coloured Illustration, 1s. 6d. post free.
Wide Margin Reference Bibles, from 3s. 9d. post free.
The Self-Explanatory Teachers' Bible, 12s. 6d., 15s., and 21s. post free.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

WHO WAS SWEDENBORG ?

A Lecture on "EMANUEL SWEDENBORG: HIS LIFE AND CHARACTER," will be sent FREE AND POST FREE to ALL applicants on their sending their names and addresses to the Secretary of the SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury-street, London, W.C.

HIGHEST QUALITY
TURKISH TOWELS
AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY

BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;

And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

The January BOOK MONTHLY, 6d. net, bringing the record of the book year to its close, is now ready.

CONTENTS.

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR. Chatty Paragraphs about all
Literary Matters, with many Portraits and other Pictures.

CHRISTMAS CHEER! The Book Beautiful as the Ideal Present—by A. J. PHILIP.

BARRACK-ROOM BOOKS. What the British Soldier reads in his Leisure Hours—by HORACE WYNDHAM.

THE TYPOGRAPHER. His Growing Place in the World of Letters.

THE MEMOIRIST. An Art on which a Duchesse Instructs us.

A LONDON LETTER. The Circulating Libraries and the Unspeak-able Novel.

POINTERS! As Americans say on the Short Story.

LIGHT AND LEADING. New Fact and Current Opinion Gathered from the Book World.

THE GENERAL READER. Snap-Shot Reviews of the Best and Best-Selling Books.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY. Particulars of Interesting
Volumes Likely to be Published this Month.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH. A Classified Catalogue of the Noteworthy Books, New Editions and Reprints of December.

THE PERIODICALS. Contents of this Month's Reviews & Magazines.

Publishers: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

THE INDEX TO VOLUMES
I.—V. OF THE NATION

may be had free on application to the Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER. Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School. G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to PRACKENBURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Spring Term commences January 14th.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.

BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.

(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

TETTENHALL COLLEGE,
STAFFORDSHIRE.

500 feet above Sea Level.

Headmaster—R. L. AGER, M.A. (Rugby and Corpus Christi College, Oxford).

FREE CHURCH PUBLIC SCHOOL.

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey. Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK.
K. M. ELLIS.

STRAMONGATE GIRLS' SCHOOL, KENDAL.

Founded by the Society of Friends in Kendal.

A Boarding School for the daughters of gentlemen, where Domestic Science forms part of the ordinary course of studies.

Full particulars from the Headmistress.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD, HASLEMERE, SURREY.

COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Sandy Soil. 600 feet above sea level.

Re-opens January 21st.

Healthy outdoor life, combined with thorough education on modern lines. Usual curriculum, including citizenship course, extension lectures, &c. Preparation when required for University and other careers. Handicrafts, gardening, riding, nature study, archæology, &c.

Principal: Miss AMY KEMP.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL.

HEAD MASTER:—ARTHUR ROWNTREE, B.A. (Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History and Practice of Education Cantab.)

Preparation for Universities.
Citizenship Course. Leisure Hour Work.

The Spring Term begins on January 18th.

For prospectus, etc., apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

The Daily News
YEAR BOOK.

PREFACE BY

The Rt. Hon. D. Lloyd George.

ON SALE EVERYWHERE.

Price 6d. net.

RILEY'S BILLIARD TABLES

Social amenities make necessary the entertainment of your friends. To entertain them successfully is not always easy. And nothing disheartens a host more than a slow evening. The evenings will always be a delight if you have a Billiard Table in the house. An adjournment to the Billiard Room is always welcomed.

RILEY'S COMBINED
DINING AND
BILLIARD TABLES

will be found most convenient where space is limited. Are made in all sizes. Fitted with Riley's patent automatic action, enabling the table to be converted from Dining to Billiard Table and vice versa in less than a minute. A handsome piece of furniture and a perfect billiard table.

Prices from £13 10s. CASH OR EASY PAYMENTS.

Riley's Standard Tables

(as used in the Championship matches).

These tables are designed on most artistic lines, and built of the finest materials in the best possible manner. They are fitted with low frost-proof cushions, patent pockets, and are fully warranted for ten years. Prices from 55 guineas upwards.

FREE On receipt of postcard, full detailed Illustrated Catalogue of Billiard and Dining Tables, and small or full-sized tables and sundries.

E. J. RILEY, LTD. Willow Bank Works,
ACCRINGTON.

London Showrooms: 147, ALDERSGATE STREET, E.C. 3.

RILEY'S
Billiard Tables.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Bathrooms on every Floor,
Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading,
Billiard and Smoking Rooms.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) Single from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc.,
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) Hotel. Close Pier; 1st Class; moderate.SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week.BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.*BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.BRIGHTON.*THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.BUXTON.*ST. ANNE'S HOTEL. First Hotel.DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.*THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara.DEAL.*BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.EASTBOURNE.*CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House. Sussex Gdns. 5/- day.HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.EDINBURGH.*ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel.GREAT YARMOUTH.*MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day.GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.*THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.ILFRACOMBE.*COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 rooms. Facing Sea.KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCs.*CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments.LANCASTER.*BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh.LEEDS.*HOTEL METROPOLE. 2 minutes' walk from either station.LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANDUDNO.The WHITE HORSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea.LLANELLY.*CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LYNTON (Devon).ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres.MALVERN.*HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson.MATLOCK.*SMEDLEY'S HYDRO. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand.ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes).NELSON.*RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station.OXFORD (near).*SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boar's Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c., Lecture.PENTRE.*PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.SOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment.

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas. Tel. 647

ROCKLEY HYDRO. Electric and other baths; Excellent cuisine.
Lift. Near Golf Links. From 7s. per day. Tel. 422.

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclist's Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop.WHITBY.*WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

Your Week End
Is Not Complete

WITHOUT

The Saturday Westminster

(The Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette.")

It is the only Weekly Magazine Review of the kind.

"F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week.
A Unique page of "Problems and Prizes,"
Book Reviews and Special Literary
Articles by the best known Writers.

ONE PENNY. Post 6/6 per annum (home), 8/8 (abroad).

Offices: Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for
copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION
Office, 14 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION
PUBLISHING Co. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-
sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—
Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions
are received.

A Chorus of Enthusiasm

THE SPHERE says: "The firm of MILLS & BOON is doing excellent work in publishing in many directions."

BLACK & WHITE says: "MILLS & BOON have made up their minds to please the great reading public, and are going about it in the right way."

THE BYSTANDER says: "MILLS & BOON are doing excellent service by bringing new work before the public. THE VEIL, MARY UP AT GAFFRIES, and MISS PILSBURY'S FORTUNE were all most promising."

THE DAILY EXPRESS says: "MILLS & BOON have the enterprise that should always accompany youth."

MILLS & BOON will issue during the early Spring a magnificent list of fiction, including long novels by many of the best known writers of the day. Their list includes new novels by B. M. Croker, H. W. C. Newte, Robert Barr, Claire de Pratz, Gaston Leroux, Mrs. Baillie Reynolds, J. E. Buckrose, Lady Troubridge, &c., &c. They will also publish volumes of stories by Sir Gilbert Parker, Mary E. Mann, Percy White, and H. B. Marriott Watson. The following is a complete list:—

MILLS & BOON'S NEW NOVELS

6s. each.

A WARDOUR STREET IDYLL By Sophie Cole
THE ANGER OF OLIVIA By Thomas Cobb
BRUMMELL AGAIN By Cosmo Hamilton
THE FOOL OF FAERY By M. Urquhart
A GOLDEN STRAW By J. E. Buckrose
NUMBER NINETEEN By Edgar Jepson
A BLOT ON THE SCUTCHEON By May Wynne
BOUND TOGETHER By Mary E. Mann
MARCOT MUNRO By M. E. Hughes
CALICO JACK By Horace W. C. Newte
AN AVERTED MARRIAGE By Percy White
THE WOMAN WHO FORGOT By Lady Troubridge

THE SWORD MAKER By Robert Barr
FAME By B. M. Croker
FIRST LOVE By Marie Van Vorst
THE EDUCATION OF JACQUELINE By Claire de Pratz
THE KING'S HIGHWAY By H. B. Marriott Watson
BY FORCE OF CIRCUMSTANCES By Gordon Holmes
THE PHANTOM OF THE OPERA By Gaston Leroux
WHEN LOVE KNOCKS By Gilbert Stanhope

MILLS & BOON'S GENERAL LITERATURE

HOME LIFE IN IRELAND. By ROBERT LYND [2nd Edition]
 8s. net.

"An irresistible book." Outlook.
 "Most entertaining."—Daily Mail.

AN ART STUDENT'S REMINISCENCES OF PARIS IN THE EIGHTIES. 10s. 6d. net. By SHIRLEY FOX, R.B.A.

"Written with rollicking freshness."—Pall Mall Gazette.
 "The illustrations are quite out of the common."—Daily Mail.

SPORTING STORIES. 10s. 6d. net.

By "THORMANBY"
 "A goodly collection."—Times.
 "An interesting collection of gossiping chronicles."—Pink 'Un.

MY THIRTY YEARS IN INDIA. 8s. net.

By Sir EDMUND C. COX
 "Very good reading."—Spectator.

BRITISH MOUNTAIN CLIMBS. 7s. 6d. net.
 By GEORGE D. ABRAHAM

PURE FOLLY: all about "The Follies."
 With an Original Song by H. G. PELISSIER. Fully Illustrated. 2s. 6d. net.

SIX HANDICAP GOLFER'S COMPANION.
 By "TWO OF HIS KIND." 2s. 6d. net. With Chapters by H. S. COLT and H. H. HILTON.

THE NEW THEOLOGY. By Rev. R. J. CAMPBELL
 Popular Edition. With a Full Account of the Progressive League, including the Speeches of HALL CAINE and BERNARD SHAW. 1s. net. [Twelfth Thousand]

MILLS & BOON'S SHILLING NOVELS

THE DOLLAR PRINCESS By HAROLD SIMPSON
 (The Novel of the Play.)

ARSENE LUPIN By EDGAR JEPSON and M. LEBLANC
 (The Novel of the Play.)

PETER PAN: His Book, His Pictures, His Career, His Friends. By G. D. DRENNAN
 (The Authentic Theatre Book and Fairy Story of the Play.)

MILLS & BOON will publish in February an entirely New Volume of South Sea Stories (never before published) by Sir Gilbert Parker, entitled CUMNER'S SON. Cloth, One Shilling net. This volume is of Six Shilling length. Also BEWARE OF THE DOG, by Mrs. Baillie Reynolds. Entirely New. One Shilling net.

Please write for Spring Catalogue, which is now ready.

MILLS & BOON LTD., 49, Whitcomb Street, London, W.C.

The Nation

VOL. VI., No. 17.]
Registered as a Newspaper.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 22, 1910.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., 4d. Abroad, 1d

CONTENTS.

	PAGE		PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK ...	661	Protection and the Price of Wheat. By Tariff Reformer	677
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—		Light Dues at Constantinople. By George A. Saldil	678
North against South ...	664	POETRY:—
The Strength of England ...	665	From the Golden Book. By James Stephens	678
The New Tory Demagogy ...	666	THE WORLD OF BOOKS ...	679
Europe and the Elections ...	667	REVIEWS:—
LIFE AND LETTERS:—		The Decay of the Dramatic Spirit	680
Our "Educated" Classes ...	669	Napoleon and the Bourbons	681
The Element of Calm ...	670	Dr. Rashdall's Religious Philosophy	682
Life in Old Crete ...	671	Menander	683
Nature the Radical ...	672	The Captain of Kent	684
LETTERS FROM THE EMPIRE:—		Psychology and Adventure	684
What Canada is Thinking. By Scotus	673	Two Illustrated Poems	685
COMMUNICATIONS:—		BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
The Law of Electoral Corruption. By S. D. S.	674	The Literary Profession in the Elizabethan Age	686
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—		The Isle of Man	686
The Law of the Surplus. By Andrew Carnegie	675	By the Waters of Egypt	686
The Character of the Indian Police. By Sir William Wedderburn	675	Chats on Old Silver	686
The Psychology of Conversion. By Adela Constance Smith, V. P., and Dr. Maurice B. Wright	676	London in the Nineteenth Century	686
Etonian Manners. By Mrs. L. Barbara Hammond and J. S. Boothroyd	676	Irish Ways	688
Magyar Persecution of a Roumanian Poet. By R. W. Seton-Watson	677	The Two Empires: The Church and the World	688
		Love Intrigues of Royal Courts	688
		THE WEEK IN THE CITY. By Janus	688

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

THE General Election is more than half over as we write. The mass of the boroughs have polled, but the county constituencies have not polled in sufficient numbers to give us an adequate impression of their mind. The urban vote is an improvement on the results of 1885, a year of decisive Liberal victory. The county constituencies appear to indicate a decline from the standard of that year, when the agricultural laborers first joined the electorate. On no day have the Unionists achieved the result necessary to the attainment of a majority—the winning of one out of every two Ministerial seats in England. The defeat of Protection therefore would seem to be assured, and that, in its turn, denotes a victory for the Budget and a defeat for the Lords, the single issue defined by the Prime Minister in his electoral address, and rehearsed by him with unfaltering firmness throughout the progress of the election.

* * *

THE one subject of debate is the size and character of the Ministerial majority, which seems likely to range from 100 to 150 votes. As for topics, the Tories almost absolutely ignored the House of Lords. "If we had fought on that issue," said one of their organisers to the present writer, "we should not have held fifty seats. We had one cry, 'Tax the foreigner,' and we had no other." In other words, they have a single issue, Protection, which restores their party strength, but on which they cannot win. The aggregate vote seems to be decisively against the Lords, and this (Friday) morning, the plurality in our favor was about 70,000 votes. Labor almost maintains its status quo, and the splits with Liberalism have been rather less damaging to the common cause than was expected. Up to the time of writing, however, six seats have thus been lost. But the most significant features of the election are, first, the appearance of two Englands—North and South—one Radical, Constitutional, Progressive, and Free Trade, the other Protectionist and indifferent to or ignorant of the constitutional issue; and, secondly, a class stratification similar to the geographical one. The Government has the great middle mass, the Opposition the top layer and some of the bottom. The Government has organised, independent labor, the Opposition the more dependent classes.

* * *

THIS serious and probably permanent cleavage appears less strikingly in the industrial North, where a united stand for Free Trade has been made by masters and men in the cotton trade; in Scotland, where the tidal wave of 1906 seems to have barely receded; and in Wales, where, as in Scotland, the Free Churches exist as a moderating and yet progressive force. Ireland, like every other Celtic element in our population, stands indifferent to the emotional disturbance of the Anglo-Saxons. Having secured the re-assertion of Home Rule, she has joined hands afresh with Liberalism and shown the utmost loyalty and warmth. On this point political leaders like Mr. O'Connor and journalists like Mr. Diamond have done service which deserves the clearest recognition.

* * *

THE personal results are singularly suggestive. Every Cabinet Minister who has gone to the poll—Sir Edward Grey, Mr. Churchill, Mr. Birrell, Mr. Buxton, Mr. Burns, Mr. Runciman, Mr. Samuel—has been elected, but four minor Ministers, Mr. Pease, the chief whip, Colonel Seely, Sir Henry Norman, and Mr. Causton, have been defeated, Sir Henry through no fault of his own, but through the same kind of party work which cost Sir George Doughty his seat at Grimsby. Powerful personalities, joined to the Party machine, have done extremely well—Mr. Churchill has actually a majority of over 6,000 votes in Dundee, a remarkable tribute to intellectual and magnetic force. On the other hand enforced absence from constituencies—such as Sir Henry Cotton's, Mr. Crooks's, Professor Stuart's—has been blindly avenged, the electors requiring the closest and most strenuous courting. Only Mr. Chamberlain, permanently cut off from the life of his town and country, remains a kind of electoral Svengali, whose mesmeric power is even increased. Intellectual aloofness, such as that of Mr. Cox and Lord Robert Cecil, has been ruthlessly flung aside in this close and heated war of the big battalions. So far as geography is concerned, Liberalism triumphs in Wales, and from Scotland to about the northern Midlands, Yorkshire and Lancashire practically repeating, even in majorities, the unparalleled verdict of 1906. The East will probably be Liberal, and perhaps also the West, with some marked exceptions. On the other hand, a solid and broadening reef of Toryism and Protection stretches from Birmingham and the western Midlands to the Southern Counties, broken by industrial London.

If we range the leading cities of Great Britain according to their economic faith, the preponderance of Free Trade is at once made evident. Thus:—

FREE TRADE.	PROTECTIONIST.
Industrial London, including the Port.	Residential London.
Manchester.	Liverpool.
Glasgow.	Birmingham.
Leeds.	Sunderland.
Bristol.	Portsmouth (?).
Bradford.	Devonport.
Edinburgh.	Brighton.
Sheffield (by votes).	Preston (?).
Hull.	Bath.
Salford.	Chester.
Nottingham (by votes).	Oxford.
Newcastle.
Leicester.
Derby.
Dundee.
Norwich.
Plymouth.
Southampton.
Blackburn.
Bolton.
Halifax.
Northampton.
Aberdeen.
Oldham.
Stockport.
Ipswich.
Cardiff.
Merthyr Tydvil.
Rochdale.
Huddersfield.
Swansea.
Hartlepool.
Darlington.
Stockton.
Middlesbrough.
Grimsby.

* * *

EVEN from these results a deduction must be made, and it is doubtful whether either the Portsmouth, or the Devonport, or the Preston results were other than nominal and accidental victories for Protection, or whether on that issue alone the result would not be reversed. As for the Liverpool verdict, it is incomparably less conclusive, on the one side, than that of Manchester on the other.

* * *

ON the other hand, as we approach the smaller populations, the homes of the little industries—which would be swept up into trusts under Protection—the valetudinarian resorts (Bath, Bournemouth, Brighton), the suburban, sub-London constituencies (otherwise the Home Counties), the cathedral towns (with the exception of Norwich, York, and Lincoln), the dockyard and arsenal centres, and finally the hole and corner boroughs, relics of an obsolete electoral system, like Falmouth, we find the Protectionist strength growing stronger and stronger. In a word, the moral force of the Protectionist case is far weaker even than its voting power. When iron, steel, cotton, mining, shipping, call for the retention of Free Trade, no effective demand for a change to Protection can arise from the small industries, the retailers, and the middlemen. England cannot be governed from its bath chairs.

* * *

IN London the division of opinion is acute and, as in the country, largely geographical. The North and the industrial East (a city of a million poor or poorish men) are predominantly Free Trade, and the same may be said of the inner Southern ring. Probably the same results will accrue in the densely populated suburban quarters of East London, modified by the hostile vote of the clerks, protectionist against every economic interest that their daily life yields. On the other hand, the West End stretches a long arm from its central squares and palaces to the suburban towns and the villa cities, with their boundaries of green fields or downs and golf courses, which stretch at intervals to the Sussex and Kentish coasts. Never was there a more distinct and absolute class cleavage, aggravated and made humiliating to the actual citizens of these dependent areas by swarms of freehold and faggot voters. On the one side stand the very rich in a compact body, voting as they never voted before, and operating on sections of the very poor by a flashing display of wealth, direct and indirect bribery, intimidation, or mere cajolery, backed by an overwhelming use of motor cars, the scientific machinery of the new electioneering. Indifferent to this display of arrogant and patronising wealth, and even bitterly and ominously resentful of it, are ranged the mass of the organised and more skilful workmen, pupils of the Board Schools, and sternly resolved to keep their constitutional rights free and their bread untaxed.

* * *

WITH regard to the counties, the results declared up to this (Friday) do not seem to be particularly promising. Some of the least stable constituencies have been put first in certain instances, we are informed, by the deliberate action of the returning officers—a distinct breach of a public trust for party purposes. In the North the returns follow the verdict of the towns, with equal strength in the industrial districts, only a little less notably in the agricultural centres. In the Home Counties, Midlands, and Eastern Midlands, the Tory wave has mounted higher than in the towns; indeed, each current swells as the election goes on. Anti-Socialism in the governing classes, and timidity, imitativeness, aided by the grossest forms of social pressure, in their dependents, appear to be the ruling motives in this part of England, where the majorities for reaction are as sweeping as those of the North for progress. One seat has been lost in Scotland, and one in Wales, but both the constituencies and the majorities were insignificant, and the general tendency has been to emphasise even the tremendous progressive verdict of 1906. Of more direct electoral significance are the signs that the agricultural laborer has, to some extent, been frightened out of his usual steadfastness to the only political cause in which he believes. Liberal seats have been lost in Lincolnshire, Wilts, Somerset, Huntingdonshire, Suffolk, and Norfolk, and the Essex returns are unfavorable.

* * *

MEANWHILE, we hope that all Liberal candidates will keep in the forefront of the argument in the counties the salient fact that the contract notes of millers all over the country now specify in the clearest language the decision of the trade to put up the price of flour to an amount corresponding to the change effected by the duty, whether the wheat actually used in its manufacture has paid the duty or no. In other words, the price of the entire home product will be raised the moment the foreign product is taxed, and Mr. Balfour's pretended theory of cheapness as the result of food taxes has the lie given it in advance. We quote the following from a contract note sent out by the Battersea Flour Mills, which lies before us:—

"Should a Duty on Wheat be imposed, repealed, or varied, the price per cwt. of all flour to be delivered under this contract is at once to be increased or reduced by the same amount as the alteration in the Duty per cwt. on Wheat, whether the Wheat used in its manufacture shall have been affected by such alteration or not."

* * *

WE shall be glad to receive from Liberal members, candidates, and agents, accounts of bribery, treating, intimidation, the eviction of tenants, attempts to undermine the secrecy of the ballot, and other illegal and corrupt practices that have extensively prevailed during this election, especially in the counties.

* * *

THE correspondent of the "Times" in Pekin sends to his journal a full and optimistic account of the first deliberations of the consultative provincial councils which met for the first time throughout China in October. They were elected on a mixed property and education qualification, and among the members the official and graduate class predominated, while the leadership has often gone to young men trained in China and Europe. They are as yet rather an experiment in free speech than in representative Government. There was some academic discussion about the constitutional ideal. But, in the main, the deliberations seem to have been very practical. There was a general approval of the honest efforts which almost everywhere are being made to suppress the sale and use of opium. One assembly talked much of the improvement of agriculture. Another debated the means to be taken to eradicate superstition and suppress the custom of foot-binding. Another proposed the simplification of the Chinese script. Several engaged in successful conflicts with Viceroy or President to safeguard their rights of free discussion. The general tone was one of frank and fearless criticism. The whole result is to prove the reality of a progressive movement, and the ripeness of educated China for the present cautious advance.

* * *

ON Wednesday the Chiragan Palace, in which the Turkish Parliament has been installed, was almost totally destroyed by fire. The mere financial loss is serious; the archives of the Chamber have perished in the flames, and in the Palace itself and its decorations is involved the loss of a beautiful and characteristic piece of architecture. The news that the Turkish masses seem to regard this mishap as an intervention of Providence against Liberal ideas is as interesting as it is deplorable. Ahmet Riza Bey, say the old-fashioned, has brought no luck with him, and the clergy are ready enough to point the moral. It will be the work of a generation for the educated Turks to leaven this old-world lump. Meanwhile, the news from Macedonia is decidedly better than it had been for some months past. The recent repression of the Bulgarian element had gone dangerously far. The split in the Bulgarian ranks, which the Young Turks had done everything in their power to accentuate by backing the weaker and less reputable faction, has latterly occasioned several political murders. But the new Grand Vizier, Hakki Pasha, with the aid of the Bulgarian Dr. Daneff, promptly undertook a work of conciliation which seems to be meeting with a rapid success. The new régime has repeated some of the faults of the old. The vital difference is that it does strive for better things, that it has the candor to repair its mistakes, and that none of its lapses are irremediable.

* * *

THE annual statistics of repression in Russia seem at a first glance to be relatively encouraging. There were only 543 executions last year as against 782 in 1908. These statistics, however, may be incomplete. The number of persons exiled without trial has fallen even more signally—from 10,166 to 2,200. These totals are still painfully high, and there has been no relaxation in the severity of the prison treatment or the rigors of Siberian exile. Indeed, on reflection it is doubtful whether any happy augury can be drawn from the apparent decline in the figures of repression. For there is, after all, nothing to repress. The Azeff scandals have ruined terrorism, and the Social Democrats are concentrating chiefly on a brave effort to maintain some sort of trade union activity. A Government which really wished to be mild might without risk have abandoned coercion altogether. So far is that from being M. Stolypin's intention that he still magnifies every ground of suspicion, and rakes up offences long since buried in oblivion. It is significant of the attitude of the Court that the two assassins recently convicted in Finland of the murder of the Liberal Deputy, Hertzenstein, in 1906, were last week released by the Tsar's orders after a few months' imprisonment. The Tsar it was who also intervened to screen the Black Hundred leader, Dr. Doubrovin, from taking his trial for planning this same murder.

* * *

THE French Chamber has been busied during the past week in a debate which does honor to its intellectual repute on the attitude of the "neutral" State schools towards religion. The cruder phase of the attack was delivered by certain Clericalist deputies, who complained that some of the text-books used in the State schools contain passages offensive to religious minds, and that the teachers deliberately preach atheism. To the first of these charges M. Briand had a good answer. One text-book at least was open to reproach, and it had been frankly withdrawn on the complaint of a Bishop. The charge against the teachers was put in a more plausible way by M. Barrès. They are inspired by a positive scientific spirit, and he finds in them a certain intellectual arrogance. Another orator described them as bringing to their work a missionary spirit, an almost religious fervor which in an early generation would have made them the devoutest of believers. The fact seems to be that they have an ardent and serious professional spirit, which leads them to value their moral and intellectual influence. Many of them are Socialists and the rest are Radicals. It is probable that even when their words are discreet, the tone of their teaching offends old-fashioned parents.

* * *

THERE is no doubt that the German Empire has gained a more conciliatory Chancellor and Prussia a slightly more Liberal Minister-President in Herr von Bethmann-Hollweg. But the shade of opinion which separates him from Prince Bülow is on some questions too fine to be discerned. He had on Wednesday in the Prussian Diet to answer the charge that he had transferred to other posts officials, including even minor teachers and postmen, who committed the offence of voting for a Polish candidate in a by-election at Kattowitz. His answer was an unflinching justification. The Polish movement, he said, is a danger to the Empire, and every Prussian official must learn that he dare not vote for a Polish candidate. In short, he reaffirmed all the harshest features of his predecessor's policy of repression, including, of course, the expropriation of Polish landowners. The honesty of this persecution is its only redeeming feature.

Politics and Affairs.

NORTH AGAINST SOUTH.

WHATEVER may be the final result of the General Election and the precise balance of parties it may produce, it is clear that the Government will maintain office, resting on forces strong in character and representative quality, as well as in numbers and resolution. Broadly speaking, these forces will represent the more northerly population of these islands with a large contingent from the Southern capital. They have, indeed, been cruelly miscounted under a system whereby the vote of Falmouth and Colchester has been made to stop the mouth of Leicester or Newcastle. But the force and direction of the two great electoral currents is clear. The North stands out against the South—Scotland, Wales, Yorkshire, Lancashire, the north-eastern and eastern corners of England against the Midlands, the Home Counties, and a nearly solid Southern Coast. This is not precisely a new phenomenon in our politics. It faintly crossed the Liberal sweep of four years ago, and set its mark on the earlier triumphs of 1880 and 1885. But it was never so deeply scored across our political life as it is to-day. There is no reason to deplore it, or to regard this schism in national politics as other than a sign of where lie the strong and progressive elements in modern British history, and where the feebler and more conservative ones. We have three nations out of the four, and the best half of the fourth. We have the Britain that has always been right; they have the Britain that has always been wrong. Roughly speaking, we have the makers and distributors of our wealth; they the spenders and manipulators of it. We hold the staple trades—cotton, woollens, iron, steel, tin-plates, shipping, mining; they the smaller ones, backed by the great parasitic speculative class, with its immense appanage of domestic or semi-domestic labor, which has found the funds for this money-primed assault on the liberties of the people, and has carried a wave of anti-democratic feeling right through the chief pleasure-ground of England to stem the movement of its working centres. This is a formidable confrontation. Nothing can more clearly be deduced from it than that it means the definite failure of "Tariff Reform." Southern England seldom won anything in modern politics. It has neither the courage nor the steadiness of which a winning line of battle is made up. Cheltenham cannot force a tariff on Manchester: Protection, as the Prime Minister well said, will never stand against the fixed decision of the productive energies of the nation. The Tories may think that it makes a good trump card. But it is a losing one. Manchester, Glasgow, Leeds, Bradford, Newcastle, have settled that bit of English history for ever.

Nevertheless the immediate and the proximate consequences of this voting are such as to cause grave searchings of heart among those who have always foreseen the seriousness of the situation that must follow upon the elections. A nation peculiarly wanting in the historic sense has come plump upon an old and deep quarrel, of which the minority, at least, have taken little heed. The assault of the Lords on the Constitution has failed in the country; and it is a fact of great moment that their nominal defenders have, from the first, allowed the constitutional case to go by default. They have not dared to talk about the Lords; they have talked (and threatened) unemployment instead. They assumed that, if they succeeded, the country would give the go-by to the trifling fact that the unrepresentative House had claimed the dominant power in the Constitution. Absorbed in their burlesque arguments and bullying tactics, they chose to ignore the political crisis, which happens, nevertheless, to be the master-key to the economic one. The trade of Great Britain is absolutely secure under our Free Trade system; its Constitution lies in ruins by the act of the House of Lords, and must be rebuilt.

Now, it is a fact of great moment that this breach with the past has been effected by a revolution of the rich, seeking not merely to resist an attack on property, but to shift taxes from land to food, and to change the balance of political power. From the beginning this false start spoiled the Protectionist case. Now its whole consequences appear. It is certain that the country is for the Budget and against the Lords: it is not yet certain what majority, in mass and in kind, the Government will possess for dealing with the usurpation of the peers. But whether it be great or moderate, the party has placed itself under a definite engagement to secure the undivided supremacy of the House of Commons in finance, and the removal of the legislative veto. Clearly this pledge cannot be affected by the size of the Liberal majority—the only point of the electoral struggle now seriously at issue. If that majority is moderate, there is no chance that the Lords, who failed to respect a majority of 350, will consider it. If it is large, we have still to deal with a body that never resigns and never goes out, and will never abandon or qualify its fixed Toryism, let the electors say and think what they will. This body has held up the finances of the country. Not one Budget, but two Budgets, will be called for almost as soon as the new Parliament meets. Who can guarantee their fate? Who could guarantee a single Bill that the Government might propose to the representative Chamber? The "deadlock" that Lord Salisbury foresaw in 1894 as the result of the rejection of the Harcourt Budget, is upon us; and, even if it were resolved, the Liberal Party would still have to recover its lost power to legislate. A desperate challenge to the principle of representative Government lies under trial; involving the most momentous decision that the British Monarchy has had to take during its later history.

We must, therefore, regard the present elections as the opening chapter of a great political struggle, for which we stand equipped in advance with all the most stable elements in British politics. These elements have not been bribed or seduced or frightened; their verdict is already given with the utmost emphasis and weight, both of numbers and of enthusiasm; they are the Ironsides of this conflict. Armed with their support, the Liberal, Labor, and Nationalist parties will march forward to the object to which they are unitedly and irrevocably fixed, the destruction of the political power of the House of Lords.

THE STRENGTH OF ENGLAND.

THE electoral returns that have come to hand teach us one lesson clearly enough. They show the world where the strength of democracy lies, and with it the security for freedom and the hope of progress. The Cathedral cities, the "residential" boroughs, the clerk populations of West London, are sped like dead leaves before the blast of vain doctrine. They have reverted to their normal Toryism, indifferent to their own rights, ignorant of their national history, and content with the rule of the Peers. The relatively unorganised trades of the Midland region have gone with them. Elsewhere, throughout the North and in the industrial quarters of the South and West, organised labor stands firm as a rock against the assaults of reaction. If we save our liberties, we have the artisan classes to thank for them. We do not ignore the work of the isolated thinkers and leaders in the professional and business classes, or the enthusiasm which the new Liberalism has generated among them. It is probable that their leadership has been essential to give shape and form to the democratic movement, or to save it from the danger of losing itself in divisions between Socialist and Liberal. Nor do we undervalue the signal services of Liberal Nonconformity in keeping true to the colors a considerable proportion of the middle class, in holding up the banner of social freedom in the English counties, as well as in rallying Welsh and Scottish democracy. But when heads come to be counted, these forces would have been overwhelmed if the independent workman had not exercised his own judgment and made up his mind on the constitutional and on the tariff issue. It is this class whose vote has swept Manchester, Salford, Leeds, Bradford, Halifax, Newcastle, Hull, and, in a word, presents an almost solid phalanx for a free Constitution in the English boroughs north and south of the Mersey and the Humber.

Never have the forces dividing parties been more clearly shown by the geographical distribution of victories and defeats. The party of the Peers depends in the first place on society and wealth. Upon society and wealth the bulk of the professional classes and the vast population of clerks follow like sheep, and by methods well known in electioneering, they are able to sweep into their net large numbers of the poorer and dependent work-people. Lastly, by plural voting they are able to double and sometimes treble or quadruple their strength. In large measure the reactionary victories are parades of a stage army. Those who march through the polling booths to triumph at Norwood or Chelsea one day are counted over again in the smashing majority for Mr. Balfour a day or two later. Against these forces—against property counted twice or thrice over, and against the submissive clientèle of property—stands the organised workman, and, if the agricultural laborer stands with him as of old, he wins. It is here that the democratic principle lives, and here it is now revealed as so vital, so well-founded in intelligence and character, that we can no longer fear that it will die. An electoral defeat even now would not extinguish its spirit. We know at length that we have the heart and strength of England with us, and that our problem is that of dealing with its weakness. We can put off those doubts of democracy which in later days have infected some men of strong human and popular sympathies. We want more democracy, not less, freedom from the chicaneries which give every advantage to wealth and privilege, organisation that will make democratic sentiment everywhere the living force that it is to-day in Manchester, Leeds, and Newcastle.

The secret of this force is revealed, we think, in the comparison between the political attitude of the clerk and the workman. The workman of the North is a democrat, not in politics alone, nor at times of election alone. He has for three generations been building up great organisations of his own, the friendly societies, the co-operative societies, and the trade unions. In these organisations the individual is not lost, as he is in the community of forty millions. His share in public life is a real share. He has duties as well as rights; he has responsibilities that come home to him; his decisions, as, for example, if he votes for or against a strike, definitely affect events; he is taught by clear, and sometimes hard, lessons the interaction of public and private affairs. For a generation he has enjoyed elementary education, and his leaders are making a beginning with University education. He is at once learning to think for himself and to act in concert with his fellows. The class of clerks, on the other hand, has had no such fortunate experience. By its economic position, it might conceivably have placed itself at the head of the labor world, in which relation its educational advantages would have given it weight and authority. But the social influences, always so strong in this country as to bewilder foreign observers and often to checkmate domestic reformers, have set its face in the opposite direction. The clerk differentiates himself from the workman, and yet organises no independent movement on his own behalf. He ranges himself with his employer and with the social powers that be, and in these days he is deeply impressed with the illusion of national decadence and the necessity of standing shoulder to shoulder in defence at once of our shores and of our commerce against the insidious Teuton. If he was more of a humorist, he would see the oddity of a tariff system to preserve our trade which is championed by Salisbury and Exeter and repudiated by Manchester and Leeds. But he is very serious in his alarms, and he knows that there are regions to which the pure milk of the word is not borne daily by the patriotic organisation of Messrs. Harmsworth or Pearson. Four years ago he, like many of the professional class, was much cooled by the manifest deficiencies of Mr. Balfour's administration, and he would not stir himself. To-day he is convinced that the crisis of the nation is at hand, and he has rallied to his cause in numbers sufficient to bring back the party vote to its normal figure or something more. For he has not worked out public questions with organisations of his own making, but has been content to take his politics by hearsay and on trust.

When we contrast these two classes—which have been the backbone of victory on the two sides—who can doubt about the future? We are standing not for the lifeless forms of a merely political democracy but for a new social order, a higher freedom secured by economic emancipation, and a firmer solidarity based upon the rational and clear-sighted co-operation of equals. Inevitably, as we make clear the meaning of our programme, we enlist against it every force that selfishness, and stupidity, and privilege can command. The question was, would the body of the working population respond to our call in proportion sufficient to show that as a body they had gripped our meaning and were determined to realise the possibilities opened out to them? This response has been made. The brighter hopes which opened last year can no longer be dismissed as the dream of a few enthusiasts. They have taken hold of the mass of men who are doing the work of the country to-day and keeping Great Britain in the van of the world's civilisation. These are the men of grit and purpose, and though they have a heavy load to carry, they will win through with it, as in older and darker days they saved themselves and their children from ruin, by the historic effort of voluntary union and co-operation.

THE NEW TORY DEMAGOGY.

THERE is no feature of the elections which deserves closer attention than the way in which the party that stands for privilege has sought its prey among the class which, by small knowledge and intellectual skill, it thought to be the most open to assault. Not one weapon of so-called Conservatism has been forged or handled for the fairly trained mind. Its first task was to lower the tone of the controversy. Mr. Balfour coarsened the whole political appeal by calling an able and honorable opponent a liar. At once, the tone of the election declined. The word "lie" became common currency; it was applied to any kind of mistaken or strongly resented assertion, and it was habitually used by men who showed themselves most indifferent to accuracy of statement, and most ignorant of political or economic truth. This was a serious, but by no means the most serious, fault of the Tory campaign. Men who use money in order to influence opinion, as money has been used during the last few weeks, must mean to influence it for falsehood. And untruthfulness has been the governing feature of the Tory propaganda.

But the main dealing of the Opposition—who, happily, are likely to remain an Opposition for some time to come—has been in a new kind of base coin. They could not state a case on its merits and argue its strong points as earlier and fairly instructed controversialists were content to argue it. Every question must be begged. The very name "Tariff Reform" was an intended evasion, for the English tariff was "reformed" by a Conservative statesman more than sixty years ago, and cleared of the maze of taxes with which the neo-Tories are trying to cumber it afresh. But when the merits of Protection were debated, it was not enough to claim for it, as it is possible for an honest though uninstructed controversialist to claim, that it might increase employment. Mr. Balfour, having deliberately stated in 1903, that if a duty on corn was a benefit to the British farmer, it could only be an injury to the British consumer, must needs claim, in 1910, that it would reduce rather than increase the price of bread. Thus an attempt was made in scores of constituencies, to advocate Protection, while attributing to it the special merit which every one familiar with the controversy knows to belong to Free Trade. Protection puts the producer before the consumer. This is its grand premiss; from it the whole Protectionist theory flows. No honest Protectionist dreams of arguing that import taxes, if they have the desired effect, benefit consumer and producer by the same stroke. One gains, the other loses. But the elegant contortionist of the new Protection took his line from the coarser acrobats of his troupe, and every Tory hack essayed the mental feat of declaring that everything was to be taxed and everything to be made cheaper.

The same process was applied to old age pensions. Mr. Ure's original statement was the perfectly truthful one that no Protectionist Budget would ever finance old age pensions, a statement which could not be disputed after Mr. Balfour's reduction of the revenue accruing from the new food taxes to zero. But the Tory Party were not content with denying the clear implication of their own muddled essays in economics. Their record in old age pensions was clear. They promised them. They squandered the money that would have paid for them on the South African war. When the Government introduced them, they opposed and belittled the scheme, condemned its finance as profligate, and finally settled with conviction on a scheme of contributory pensions. In other words, their direct policy, endorsed by Lord Lansdowne on the eve of the elections, was to change the basis of old age pensions from a free gift of the State to one of contribution. Under their Protectionist system the aged worker would have paid for his pensions twice over. He would have subscribed to them directly, and also in the enhanced price of his food. Yet, in the process of the evolution of a lie, a party with this record, and this express and implicit declaration of policy, went to the final length of declaring, in scores of thousands of posters, that old age pensions was the gift of the Unionist Party, and even, in a special degree, of the House of Lords! Had not the Lords passed them? And could not the credit of that act, one of obvious duress, be somehow snatched from the Liberal friends of the pensions policy and claimed for its sullen and resisting foes?

The first work of Tory demagogy was, therefore, its attempt to dazzle the mind of the people by doubling the merits of opposite policies, and especially of Protection and Free Trade. The old Protectionists were, at least, honest; the aristocracy took without shame their slice off the poor man's loaf, and made no bones about it. They did not produce a hocus-pocus loaf out of a conjuror's trick-bag, and pretend that it was good wheat and full measure. So far as morals were concerned, there was little to choose between the crude violence of the attack on the helpless poor of 1820 and the glozing, hypocritical approach to the half-armed democracy of 1910. This desire and plan to deceive have spread like an ulcer through the entire tissue of Toryism. Thus there never was a time in the history of the country when, judging by material strength, the power to resist invasion was greater than it is to-day. Yet the audacious attempt was made, first, to treat every foreigner who sold goods to us, if he happened to be a German (the business of buying was suppressed), as a kind of thief and anti-British conspirator, stealing our workmen's job, in the same act in which he accumulated a fund for the building of "Dreadnoughts" and the imminent destruction of our fleet. In scores of constituencies the natural, healthy, indispensable, unchangeable, processes of international trade, from which they draw their life, were represented as poison in the nation's blood. Here, again, Mr. Balfour invented and nursed the legend and watched it grow into the gross forms into which it swelled, until one of his elected followers, Mr. Clyde, declared that the building of more German warships ought to be regarded as "an unfriendly act"—i.e., the occasion for an immediate declaration of war—and one of his former colleagues, Lord Cawdor, asseverated that Belfast was in danger of becoming a German dockyard, while a clerical supporter in Essex, not to lag behind in this holy war, pictured the Germans landing at Harwich, and, having "battered" that "poor little town," "taking a great big train and rushing on to London from Manningtree in three-quarters of an hour."

But over great spaces of country all forms of intellectual persuasion, even the crudest, were abandoned in favor of a direct invocation of terror, and a vote for the peers was extorted by every form of social pressure. Money and beer flowed like water, and hired bullies made their appearance in many constituencies. Here and there a local brewery practically directed the election. Sir Henry Norman tells a really terrible story of the eviction of poor men in Wolverhampton for showing Liberal bills, and the dismissal of workers of known Liberal opinions. From all parts of the rural districts come reports of the dismissal of employees on large estates last summer as a minatory hint to vote against the Budget. We are informed by candidates that "Vote Tory or lose your job" was the marching order very generally dealt out to the more dependent class of worker. This is the basest form in which corrupted and corrupting wealth has sought to make good its usurpation of political power. By threats barely disguised as canvassing, by the ostentatious collection of polling cards, coupled with the marking down of suspected Liberals and the direct assertion that the voter's identity would be disclosed through his number on the register, the men who possess all the social power have tried to dive down into the secret of the poor man's vote, and dodge the law's provision against discovery of it. We have reason to suspect a gross abuse of power by some returning officers; and we have accounts of the deliberate arrangement of a sequence of contests in adjoining constituencies, so that those most likely to give a win for Toryism might set an example to the others. The second form of frightening tactics, which was a thought less discreditable than the first, was to follow each wave of unemployment and work, often by means of carefully coached touts and imported spies, in places where it had left the deepest mark on the spirit of the population. These tactics were successful in Sunderland, in Nottingham, and in one or two other places, and the resistance to them has been nothing short of heroic.

Here and there an honest "Tariff Reformer," hanging on the hopes of a protective duty for his articles, dealt in a kind of conditional bribery. One manufacturer, assembling his workmen, promised them a five per cent. advance in wages if a duty were put upon his goods, and threatened to close down a factory if Free Trade were maintained. Where the workmen were massed in large factories, where the spirit of comradeship and mutual support existed, these tactics failed. Where they were isolated, or were only formed in petty groups, the plan not infrequently succeeded.

From the body of this appeal every worthy human element was eliminated. Patriotism put on the mask of hatred and fear. Charity became a threat, a hand that pointed the gulf of poverty at the end of the path to freedom. The cards were shuffled and re-shuffled so that no issue could be clearly discerned, and the plot to steal the workman's bread and vote could be hidden beneath a litter of false promises and false pictures of the nation's trade and politics. The Tories have not achieved their end, for Tariff Reform has no more chance in this Parliament than in the last. But they have shown that virtue has gone as much out of the English aristocracy as out of the class that made and paid for the French Revolution.

EUROPE AND THE ELECTIONS.

THERE was never a time when a General Election in Great Britain could have been a matter of indifference to Europe. Even when the Manchester School preached a universal policy of non-intervention in the affairs of the Continent, even when Lord Goschen boasted with a proud bitterness of our "splendid isolation," we were still a world-Power. The issue of the Midlothian Campaign affected European history as intimately as any other contest of the century, with the exception of the ballot which made Louis Napoleon President, and perhaps of that other struggle in which Gambetta worsted MacMahon. But we stand to-day within the European family as we have not stood for two generations. Our policy is a concern of close moment to France and to Russia, and it may affect not only the diplomacy but the finances of Germany. The tradition of continuity confines the perturbation, which a change of Government might naturally cause, within certain limits. Sir Edward Grey has introduced no innovations in the policy laid down by Lord Lansdowne, and if Lord Lansdowne were to return to Downing Street the main lines of our diplomacy would remain unchanged. But behind the framework of a continuous diplomacy, every reality of our world position would have undergone a change. The affirmation of the authority of the Lords in finance would have taken us out of the category of the Liberal Powers. The abandonment of Free Trade would complicate all our dealings with friend and rival alike. A retaliatory tariff might conceivably be used to make still more intimate our relations with our political friends. It would almost certainly involve us in a tariff war with Germany, which might precede and might even be intended to produce the "inevitable conflict" on the seas. In the background lurk other possibilities—at the least a reckless quickening of the race of naval armaments, at the worst some dallying with conscription, to prepare the arm with which we could alone intervene effectively in a Continental struggle for the balance of power. These are the possibilities. But the plain man in Continental countries cannot be expected to know how impotent for revolution a small Protectionist majority would be, how little Lord Lansdowne has in him of the incendiary or the adventurer, how wide is the difference between Mr. Balfour on a platform, faced with an audience that cheers every muted echo of a Blatchford or a Beresford, and the same Mr. Balfour among "Souls" and Cecils in the decent calm of a council room.

The attitude of German opinion towards the elections needs no explanation. The Germans have seen the more responsible organs of the Conservative Party engaged, with hardly a break through some six years, in preaching a struggle for ascendancy between the first sea-Power and the first land-Power of Europe. The Moroccan complication, the Balkan turmoil, and the naval controversy, have each been used to familiarise the governing class with the idea, if not of an inevitable war, at least of a necessary antagonism, in which the victory would lie with the heavier armaments. They have seen the same attitude caricatured and exaggerated in every note of panic and hatred by the meaner organs of the party. The echoes of Mr. Balfour's disingenuous toying with the cry of a national danger reached them last week. They know that the "big revolver" of a tariff would be pointed first of all at Hamburg. They know that a party which takes its information as to German preparations from Mr. Mulliner and other witnesses interested in contracts would either involve them in a yet more accentuated rivalry, or present them with the menace of a wantonly expanded fleet. It is inevitable that German opinion should desire a Liberal victory at the polls. Perhaps the most significant comment on our recent nervousness is the remark of the "Kreuz Zeitung," that it hopes that the election may result in the return of a strong Government in order that our self-confidence may be restored. Under normal circumstances it is probable that the sympathies of the greater part of the German Press would have been with British Conservatism. In their fiscal theories, in their hatred of Socialism and their faith in force, our Tories are at one with the Prussian Agrarians and the National Liberals. But Imperialism is a creed which sunders its votaries. Socialism is an international link, and Liberalism was, and is, a European faith. But the Jingo of each nation commonly passes the harshest of all judgments on his fellows in neighboring lands. The exception, of course, is to be found, for obvious reasons, among the ruling classes in France and Russia. The "Temps" has expressed, with unusual decision, its desire for a Conservative victory, and the "Novoe Vremya" has echoed its tone. There is no reason here for surprise. For the "Temps" has repeatedly insisted that our alliance with France could be of only secondary value until we were pleased to adopt conscription. It naturally favors the militarist party. It doubtless remembers, moreover, that the Liberal Press sought to exert a moderating influence in the Moroccan adventure, while the Conservative Press urged French diplomacy to extremes. To a Russian reactionary, on the other hand, the attack on the prerogatives of our Duma must seem a splendid precedent to be encouraged at all costs.

These interested calculations on the consequences of our election make matter for reflection. More significant because more disinterested are the comments that touch the real matter of the dispute. Everywhere the same financial difficulties confront the European Powers, and everywhere they are due to the same causes—the parallel pressure of the ruling classes to secure great armaments, and of the democracy to extort costly social reforms. It is no exaggeration to say that every thinking man of humane opinions throughout Europe is watching the fate of the Budget, certain that if it succeeds it is a model which his own leaders must imitate. British precedents are closely watched abroad, because the general faith in our sanity and prudence makes any appeal to our experiments an argument to which moderate opinion will bow. The Budget has everywhere that pioneer significance. If a country which hardly knows the theory of the "class war," and had in its last Chamber only a single representative of revolutionary Socialism, can still adopt the super-tax on great incomes, and apply the doctrine of ransom to the increments of unearned wealth, there can be no necessary connection between these innovations and the red flag. Everywhere else, even in France, Radicalism has halted in its constructive work. It seems in France impotent to carry even a contributory scheme of old age pensions and a mildly graduated income tax. Hesitating and apprehensive, it looks now with hope and now with anxiety to the bold initiative of British Liberalism. The comments of the French Radical Press on Mr. Lloyd George's work have, on the whole, betrayed a deep and friendly interest. But even more significant is the pains which M. Jaurès, on their left flank, has taken in a series of articles in "l'Humanité" to expound the whole scheme of the taxes and the pensions, the insurance projects, and the development grant. None of these ideas are absolutely new. Several of them may be paralleled from Germany. But Frenchmen do not readily assimilate German precedents. In their German dress these expedients are apt to seem only a variety of Prussian discipline. In their English version, on the other hand, they come recommended by a warm humanity and an unquenched faith in liberty. Not in France alone, but in Italy, in Sweden, and even in Spain, the fiscal and social aspects of the Budget have been eagerly and sympathetically debated. It is hardly too much to say that when the Budget has passed the test of this election, it will have become, not merely a starting-point in our own development, but a model for European finance. It will give courage to timid statesmen, and support to the ambitious; above all, it will furnish to the Left Wings of every progressive party a standard which they will apply to the halting work of the moderates. British Liberalism has regained in this Budget a leadership and a moral ascendancy in Europe, which it has not possessed since the greater days of Gladstone.

Life and Letters.

OUR "EDUCATED" CLASSES.

It is clear that a large proportion of the "educated" classes of England are supporting unrepresentative government and Protection. Our University seats stand, for the most part, uncontested, the Cathedral cities and the pleasant residential towns, which for generations have justly claimed to be the homes of literary culture, have, with rare exceptions, declared against the cause of popular liberty. Even in the great industrial centres, a West end, representing property and "trained intelligence," has set itself in antagonism to the common people. Five-sixths, or, in many cases, nine-tenths, of the "gentry," the rich men of commerce, and the professional classes, are ranged on the side of reaction. What does this signify? Does it mean that the intellect and the enlightened conscience of the country is organising against the growing menace of ignorant mob-rule to defend the cause of civilisation against the assaults of predatory demagogues and a Socialism which is "the end of all things"? Or does it mean, upon the other hand, that the professional and intellectual classes, always dependent for their support and their career upon the possessing classes, are rallying consciously or instinctively to the defence of their patrons and paymasters?

Both these crude interpretations can be ingeniously and plausibly defended. But, when the facts are more closely inspected, neither proves quite satisfactory. In the first place, it is untrue that the best intellects of the nation stand for authority and oligarchy. Take those men who are in the front rank of uncontested eminence in literature, the first twenty of our living writers and thinkers. Not four of them would be found siding with the lords against the people. Nor would the proportion of reactionaries be much greater among the men of science, the leaders of the learned professions (with the exception of the Church), while in those departments of intellectual activity which bear most nearly upon politics, law, history, and economics, the condemnation of those causes to which English Conservatism has now committed itself is overwhelming in its preponderance. We do not contend that the preponderance of high intellectuality is definitely "Radical" in its political proclivities. A certain timidity, bred of a lack of sympathy and understanding of the people, commonly prevails in intellectual castes and coteries, precluding our great intellectuals from exercising that powerful and direct influence over the popular mind and movement which is visible in such countries as Russia, France, and even America, not to mention those little countries whose higher rate of progress is primarily due to the larger and freer service rendered by the illumination of the few to the instruction and inspiration of the many. Such fruitful and inspiring leadership is not common here, and we have some reason to complain of the too persistent severance which persists, in what we call an age of popular education, between the advanced intellect of the country and the awakening populace. Perhaps the time is now coming when the free connections may be made by which the ripper culture of our Universities and our little groups of philosophers and literary men may be transmitted to inform and stimulate the rude forces of intellectual curiosity which are stirring in our great industrial centres, receiving from them in return a wholesome flow of popular thought and feeling.

But this full sympathy between the intellectual leaders and the people lies rather in the future. In our analysis of present conditions we cannot go further than to claim that the best intellectual culture of the nation severs itself from the definitely reactionary policy to which the larger "educated" classes commit themselves. For our most instructive lessons we must look more closely to the state of mind prevailing among this larger class. A short-sighted community of direct material interests certainly goes some way to explain why, in an ordinary industrial or residential town, five out of six doctors, lawyers, accountants, or large shopkeepers side with local landowners and other men of property. Our "educated" classes, in the accepted sense of the word, are our upper and our middle classes; they alone have had access to "higher education" hitherto. These upper classes are the large property owners, whose privileged and superfluous wealth is attacked, and who are defending themselves by a resuscitation of the obsolete "rights" of the Peers. The bulk of the middle classes, manufacturing, trading, professional, erroneously but quite intelligibly identify themselves with the upper classes. By the instinctive habitude, to which the term "snobishness" is given, they are always "looking up" to persons in a "better position"; this attitude of admiration, sometimes of aspiration, maintains a sympathy which disposes their minds to adopt readily any strong political suggestions from their "superiors." Even middleclass men with better intellectual equipment and capable of thinking for themselves are amazingly susceptible to these influences of rank, and our universities to-day retain plenty of instances of boot-licking almost as crude as those which Thackeray portrayed. But while this ineradicable snobishness is undoubtedly one mode of reactionary influence, it cannot sufficiently explain why the crudest scares and the most transparent fallacies should so completely dominate these "educated" men. Their property, their commercial and professional interests, are not really in jeopardy, they do not stand to gain in income, in position, or in any way, by backing up the wreckers of the Constitution and the tariff-makers. Most of them stand conspicuously to lose. Their present position as traders or professional men is one of increasing and precarious struggle amid growing hazards of unregulated competition and ever-increasing chances of failure. It might be expected that they would welcome a constructive social policy aiming to regularise industry, to develop national resources, to enlarge the incomes of the less capricious spenders, and especially, to afford increased security of employment to the medical, legal, and educational professions by enlarging the public side of their work.

Another explanation must be sought for this combination of shortsightedness with the lack of sympathy with popular power. We find it in the defects of our "higher education." The mass of lads who have passed through our great public schools and Universities or professional colleges have never had their intelligence and their sympathies stirred by any serious endeavor to teach the moving drama of history, to educate their passion for justice and liberty by the intelligent interpretation of the growth of those social institutions which surround and influence their lives. Such slight strains of history or of philosophy as they acquire are commonly sterilised by antiquity. The noblest and most nourishing of all food for English youth, that literature which is the greatest contribution of England to humanity, is deliberately and of set purpose excluded from their intellectual table, or, worse still, is served up in dressed dishes of academic philology. This wicked conspiracy against true education has been frequently denounced, but the vested intellectual interests which it serves have hitherto kept the fountains of our national literature sealed against the minds of English youth.

But this is only the central charge in a far wider indictment against an educational system which has hitherto excluded from that training in "humane letters," that should be the birth-right of every member of a civilised nation, all adequate initiation into the study of history, economics, literature, and philosophy. Where these studies are followed at all, they are made subordinate and are mutilated by the avoidance of those live issues which can best serve to stimulate the curiosity and to stir the generous love of knowledge in our youth. With such an education, from which all that is most vital to the understanding of modern society is excluded, it is no wonder that the ordinary "educated" man, soon immersed in a profession or a life of ease, should fail to understand the play of living forces in our public life, that he should realise no intelligent responsibility, and should delegate his judgment to his party leader or his newspaper. A little veneer of literary and scientific culture, soft, superficial, decorative, involving no earnestness or fervor of intellect, no arduous exercise of reason in the test of evidence or inference, no plain understanding of the continuity of history, such is the mental condition of the great majority of "educated" Englishmen to-day. It is perilous, for themselves and for the nation. For to these persons the growth of popular liberties in the exercise of self-government, broadening down through many centuries, all the eventful struggles, the great deeds and personalities that were evoked, the whole purpose and proper destiny of gathering democracy, appear to be entirely without meaning; it contains nothing that appeals to their hearts or understandings. They do not like something in a Budget, or their daily paper tells them they can tax the foreigner, and they are ready with no question or hesitancy to fling any log that lies to hand across the stream of their nation's history to dam its course. Surely it is time to do something for the education of the "educated" classes.

THE ELEMENT OF CALM.

ALL are aware that we have no abiding city here, but that, says the hymn-writer, is a truth which should not cost the saint a tear, and our politicians appear to lament it as little as the saints. Their eyes are dry; it does not distress their mind, it seems hardly to occur to them, unless, perhaps, they are defeated candidates. One might suppose from their manner that eternal truths depended on their efforts, and that the city they seek to build would abide for ever. Could all this toil and expenditure be lavished on a transitory show, all this eloquence upon the baseless fabric of a vision, all this hatred and malice upon things that wax old as doth a garment and like a vesture are rolled up? We should think from their preoccupied zeal that every politician was laying the foundation stone of an everlasting Jerusalem, did not reason and experience alike forbid the possibility.

May it not rather be that the politicians, like the saints, keep the tears of mortality out of their eyes by contemplating this passing dream under the aspect of eternal realities? This month the heavens at night are filled with constellations of peculiar beauty. May we not suppose that the politician, emerging from the Town Hall amid the cheers and execrations of the voice that represents the voice of God, lifts up his eyes unto the heavens, where prone Orion still grasps his sword and Auriga drives his chariot of fire, and the pole star hangs immovable, by which Ulysses set his helm? And as he gazes, he recognises with joy in his heart that the stars themselves, with all their recurrent comets and flaming meteors and immovable constellations, hardly cast a stain upon the white radiance of eternity, under which he has been striving and crying and perpetrating comparatively trifling deviations from exactitude.

It is a consolation which a large proportion, probably more than half, of mankind shares with our politicians. Like them, the greater part of mankind is aware that there is peace somewhere beyond these voices, that life with all its unsatisfied longings and its repetition of care is transitory as a summer cloud, and that the only way of escape from the pain and misery, the foulness and corruption, of this material universe is by the destruction of all desires, except the one engrossing desire for non-existence. That is why the majority of mankind has set itself to overcome the unholy urgings of ambition, the pleasure of selfish and revengeful purposes, and the deeply-implanted delight in cruelty and unkindness. Such conquest, as our politicians also know, is the essential part of the Fourfold Path by which the bliss of extinction may be attained. Let him cease to be ambitious, let him purge himself of selfish aims and revengeful or unkind thoughts, and a man may at last enter into Nirvana, a politician may be extinguished. Life follows life, and each life fulfils its Karma of destined expiation, working out the earthly stain of previous existences. "Quisque suos patimur manes." The sin that most easily besets us fixes the shape of our next incarnation, and, did not a politician strictly follow the guidance of the Fourfold Path, the first election after his death might see him re-appear as a sheep, a cave-dweller, or a rat.

Never to have been born is best; never to be born again is the hope and motive of all good men among the greater part of mankind. It is not only the teaching of the most famous Buddha which has told them so. A Preacher more familiar to us has said the same, and our Western churches do but repeat an echo from the East. "I praised the dead who are already dead more than the living who are yet alive," he wrote; "yea, better is he than both they which hath not yet been, who hath not seen the evil work that is done under the sun." And there was a greater writer than the Preacher, who longed for death, but it came not, and dug for it more than for hid treasures. Had he but died before his birth, he cried, he would now have lain still and been quiet, he would have slept; then had he been at rest with kings and counsellors of the earth, which built desolate places for themselves; there the prisoners rest together, they hear not the voice of the oppressor; wherefore is light given to him that is in misery? From age to age Job's question has been asked by far more than half the human race, and yet the human race continues, miserable and unholy though it is.

But the widest expression of this common cry is found in Buddhism, and there is found also a doctrine of peace that seeks to answer it. From the turmoil of the street and market-place, from the atomic vortex of public meetings, ballot stations, and motors decked with flags, let us turn to the "Psalms of the Sisters," those Buddhist nuns whose utterances Mrs. Rhys Davids has edited for the Pali Text Society (Frowde). In this inextricable error of existence—this charnel-house of corrupting bodies wherein the soul lies imprisoned too long—time and space do not seriously matter. But let us turn from Haggerston and Battersea and the Lancastrian triumphs of to-day, and visit the regions where the great mountains were standing and the holy Ganges flowed within two or three centuries before or after the birth of Christ. Somewhere about that time, somewhere about that place, these women, having, in most cases, fulfilled their various parts in life as wives, mothers, or courtesans, retired to the Homeless Life in mountains, forests, or the banks of streams where they might seek deliverance for their souls. With shaven heads, and clad in the deep saffron cloth such as the ascetic wanderer of India still wears, furnished only with a bowl for the unasked offerings of the pious and compassionate, they went their way, free from the cares and desires of this putrifying world. As one of them—a goldsmith's daughter, to whom the Master himself had taught the Norm of the Fourfold Path—as one of them explained to the tire-some relations who tried to call her back:—

"Why herewithal, my kinsmen—nay, my foes—
Why yoke me in your minds with sense desires?
Know me as her who fled the life of sense,
Shorn of her hair, wrapt in her yellow robe.
The food from hand to mouth, glean'd here and there,
The patchwork robe—these things are meet for me,
The base and groundwork of the homeless life."

Some sought escape from the depression of luxury, some from the wretchedness of the poor, some from the abominations of the wanton, some from the boredom of tending an indifferent husband. One of them thus utters her complaint with frank simplicity:—

"Rising betimes, I went about the house,
Then with my hands and feet well cleansed I went
To bring respectful greeting to my lord,
And taking comb and mirror, unguents, soap,
I dressed and groomed him as a handmaid might.
I boiled the rice, I washed the pots and pans;
And as a mother on her only child,
So did I minister to my good man.
For me, who with toil infinite then worked,
And rendered service with a humble mind,
Rose early, ever diligent and good,
For me he nothing felt, save sore dislike."

Others sought freedom of intellect, others the free development of personality; but, in the end, it was deliverance from earthly desires that all were seeking, for it is only through such deliverance that the final blessedness of total extinction can be reached. Then, as they cry, they cease to wander in the jungles of the senses, re-birth comes no more, and the peace of Nirvana is won. A poor Brahmin's daughter who had been married to a cripple, thus exults in a multiplied redemption:—

"O free, indeed! O gloriously free
Am I in freedom from three crooked things:—
From quern from mortar, from my crookback'd lord!
Ay, but I'm free from rebirth and from death,
And all that dragged me back is hurled away."

But more truly characteristic of the spiritual mind is the joyful advice of one who, having perfected herself in meditation, could thus commune with her soul:—

"Hast thou not seen sorrow and ill in all
The springs of life? Come thou not back to birth!
Cast out the passionate desire again to Be.
So shalt thou go thy ways calm and serene."

Thus only by the recognition of the sorrow of the world, by the conquest of all desires, and by the exercise of kindness to all that breathe this life of misery, is that Path to be trodden of which the fourth stage enters Nirvana's peace. Thus only can we escape from this repulsive carcass—"this bag of skin with carrion filled," as one of the Sisters calls it—and so be merged into the element of calm, just as the space inside a bowl is merged into the element of space when at last the bowl is broken and will never need scrubbing more.

It is thought that Gautama, the great Buddha, whose effigy in the calm of contemplation is the noblest work of Indian art, fondly believed that all mankind would seek deliverance along the path he pointed out, and that so, within a few generations, the human race, together, perhaps, with every living thing that breathes beneath the law of Karma, would pass from sorrow into nothingness. Mankind has not fulfilled his expectation. The task of expiation is not yet completed, and, in the midst of anguish, corruption, and the flux of all material things, the human race goes swarming on. We suppose it is about as numerous as ever, and, though something like half of it accepts the teaching of the Buddha as divine, they seem in no more hurry to fulfill its precepts than are the followers of other Founders. We cannot say that mankind has gone very far along the Fourfold Path, for there are still many of us who would rather be a mouse than nothing; yet it remains an accepted truth of the Buddhistic doctrine, that above this fleeting and variegated world there abides the element of calm. As the final Chorus Mysticus of "Faust" proclaims: "All things transitory are but a symbol," and if any politician during the late storm of worldly desires has for a moment lost sight of truth's eternal stars that guide his way, let him now turn to the "Psalms of the Sisters." Even if he has been successful, he will there find peace, discovering in Nirvana the quiet Chiltern Hundreds of the soul.

LIFE IN OLD CRETE.

THERE were kings before Agamemnon; there were sacked cities before Troy. Not once but twice did barbarians from the North overturn the civilisation of Greece, and the glories which we used to reckon as the first flowering of a European culture were themselves in some sort a renaissance. Our texts are all palimpsests; under every "old master," when once the archæologist begins to scrape it, there lies hidden an earlier triumph. That is the lesson of Dr. Evans's discoveries in Crete. He has enlarged the dials of our clocks, flung back our reckonings of time, and taught us, where we had counted in years and centuries, to measure also in æons. The ancients invented the water clock. He has given us instead an earth clock. Reckon that in so many centuries a given number of feet of earth settle with their intelligible refuse upon the monuments of forgotten glories, and you may make of the sediment which covers Knossos and Gortyna a measure of the tides that have submerged the ages of stone and bronze, to yield at last to our spades of steel. It would be miracle enough if it were, like the diggings in Mexico and Central Asia, the uncovering of a cradle in which alien cultures were reared. But the real romance of these excavations in Crete is that they reveal the forgotten foundations of Greece. Whatever breaks of conquest there may have been, whatever superpositions of one race upon another, this, at least, is clear—that Hellenic civilisation evolved from these beginnings in a line jagged and meandering, but never wholly broken. Euripides, in the "Trojan Women," guessed, with the sympathy of divination, at the process. Professor Gilbert Murray in his "Andromache" has reconstructed one of its typical tragedies even more completely.

Enough has been done in ten years of archæological and anthropometric work to piece together the records of this buried civilisation. In "Crete the Forerunner of Greece" (Harpers) Mr. and Mrs. Hawes, who themselves did pioneer work among the diggers, have put together an admirable summary of the results. The evidence of skull measurements and of paintings goes to show that the Cretans of this Bronze Age, whose remains stretch in an unbroken line from about B.C. 2800 to B.C. 1200, belonged to the original Mediterranean race. They were short, long-headed, and dark, and their features seem distinctly European when compared with contemporary Egyptian portraits—a difference which the Egyptian artists themselves emphasised when they sketched "a prince of the isles in the midst of the Great Green Sea." They were clearly a mercantile and seafaring people, who exchanged wares and ideas with Lycians, Hittites, and Egyptians. War can have played no great part in their lives, for their cities were not walled. But in their later period, from which the Hellenic tradition of Minos dates, they controlled a sea-Empire over the Aegean, repressed piracy, and doubtless held settlements on the Greek mainland. Their culture, despite its debt to Egypt and Asia, was not simply imitative. It advanced through stages whose development makes a continuous series which can be understood without invoking foreign influences. Their art, indeed, in its best periods is markedly superior to anything which Asia Minor or Egypt produced. It has at times a delicate power of suggestion and impressionism which seems almost Japanese. It loved, above all things, to depict motion. It had a dramatic instinct which seized the meaning of a boxing match or a hunting scene. It delighted, as Greek art alone did in the old world, in the faithful rendering of the naked human body. There is nothing before classical times to compare with the two ivory statuettes of leaping youths from Knossos. In low relief it faced problems of perspective as intricate as anything on the Parthenon friezes. It went for its ornament to native flowers, and the long stages from naturalism and realism to the free treatment of conventionalised designs can be traced century by century. It is possible to form a guess at the social structure of these ancient towns. Their princes were wealthy and powerful, but they cannot have been Asiatic despots removed from their subjects by terror and superstition. Wealthy and comfortable houses of traders and craftsmen crowded round the palace. The scenes of pageants and games suggest an easy and almost democratic world. Its basis was probably matriarchal, and the women were not only free but prominent. The ladies of the Court of Knossos sit before us on the frescoes, with their elaborate coiffures, their puffed sleeves in yellow, their low-cut corsages in blue, and their ample skirts. Their gestures betray an animated conversation, as they incline slightly, one to another. It might be Portia running over the list of her suitors with some sprightly Nerissa. The fashionable, the royal sport was obviously bull-baiting. The Minotaur of legend was simply a bull of a large and shapely breed, who plunged and capered in some prehistoric arena of the labyrinthine city for the pleasure of the Minoan Court. The youths and maidens whom Athens sent as her tribute to the thalassocrat of Crete, were destined to be trained as toreadors and acrobats. They seem incredibly modern, as the old Cretan artist has painted them, with their light clothing, their pinched waists, their spurious grace of the footlights, and the pretty confusion of their long, black tresses, as they whirl in the air above the angry bull.

One can read the epic of Troy from the Trojan side as one glances at these records. For Troy must have lived a similar life to that of these Cretan cities. Vases of Cretan origin have been found at Hissarlik, which suggest that commerce and a community of civilisation united them. The Achaean chieftains who fell upon Crete as they had fallen on Troy must have burst upon this ancient civilisation as the Crusaders or the Catalan Company burst upon Byzantine culture. The victory of the Aryan invaders over Pelasgians, Cretans, and Trojans must have been everywhere the triumph of a rude and predatory stock over a settled, sedentary, and, it may be, an over-ripe civilisation. They were raiders and pirates, these Homeric heroes, but their tribal system gave them a strong polity, and they brought with them the Aryan myths and the Aryan tongue, which were to be the basis of a new civilisation. One can imagine the wonder with which the sea-wolves saw the marvels of Cretan craftsmanship. The legends about the miraculous machines of Daedalus perpetuate their astonishment. The metal-workers of the island were for them, as for all primitive peoples, dwarfs, or fairies of more than human origin—the “dactyls” of Ida. They carried off as much as they could of golden ornaments and wrought swords, and this Cretan work is now dug up at Mycenae. It is probable also that they carried away, doubtless as slaves, craftsmen, artificers, and architects to adorn their palaces for them. One can imagine what was the life of the captive women and artists of the more cultivated race. The Achaeans absorbed something of the conquered civilisation. But they must have impoverished and disturbed it before they could assimilate it. Cretan art shows in its later period a marked decadence, a loss of originality and confidence, a decline in which only the conventions survived. Amid the sacking and burning of cities and the overthrow of ancient dynasties, while the dark, short people of the island coasts crept up to the mountain caves for refuge, a civilisation must have been destroyed. Some of its ruder crafts survived. But the spirit of these luxurious courts, the gay, idle life of its theatres and palaces, must have been overwhelmed as completely as the later barbarians overwhelmed the Roman world, and much more suddenly. Some blending of the two cults there was. The Aryan invaders adopted the Cretan goddesses. Zeus was born anew on the Cretan mountains and forcibly married to Hera, who seems, like Artemis and Demeter, to represent some aspect of the Minoan Earth-Goddess, who was the protectress of the wild things of the wood and the patroness of “every feathered mother’s callow brood.” But if this polite people had any life of speculation and thought, if that mysterious dumb script on the clay tablets of Gnosso was ever used for poem or revelation, if there were minstrels and prophets as well as “dactyls” and artists, their thoughts perished with their language in the sack of these cultured cities.

It is a very mundane, a very positive revelation, that Dr. Evans has raised up from the dead. There is no hint in the brisk externality of this ancient world of anything that is spiritual. Those massive jars of clay were only prehistoric safes. Those tablets were only the inventories of treasure houses and the ledgers of merchants who fetched from Tyre the blue of Astarte’s eyes and from Marseilles the tin of distant Cornwall. In those cool stone chambers idle courtiers lay abed in the sultry hours of the Cretan dawn, until the cold breeze from the Northern Sea blew in at the windows four hours before noon. They rose to muster their chariots, to stamp their seals, to essay the machines of Daedalus, to ogle the latest arrivals from Athens, and to bet on their prowess in the bull-ring. So much we know. The coins and the implements, the arms and the palaces, the sports and the crafts—these things survive. But the dreams, the doubts, the aspirations of this ancient world have perished utterly. We have the coffins of their dead. We know nothing of its visions of an after-life. Its admirable system of sanitation has defied the ravages of time. But if it had its hermits and its ascetics, no stone remains of their lonely cells. If there was some Cretan Harmodius who wreathed “in myrtle boughs” his tyrannicide sword, the song that tells of his deed is hushed. If there were preachers, their protest is forgotten; if there were rebels, their flags have mouldered into dust. Poets and prophets, preachers and leaders, their very memory is gone. The men who worked in bronze and stone will live for ever. They sang, we may be sure, while their mysterious language survived, and dreamed that they were raising monuments “more lasting than brass.” And yet it is the brass which lives.

NATURE THE RADICAL.

It is a truism that Nature has no countenance for the doctrine of primogeniture and little or none for the claims of heredity over nurture and environment. The appositeness of the analogy to human society is generally acknowledged now by impartial inquirers. If the aristocracy maintains its own as an hereditary institution, it is more by reason of the extra nourishment and education that its sons are able to obtain than by force of its specialised blood. That blood, indeed, must be constantly renewed by admixture with a more strenuous strain, and in spite of every advantage, is frequently ousted by men who have lain in the hardest of cradles and been schooled under the most drab conditions. Now that an enlightened civilisation has extended the opportunities of advancement, there is a thin, but constant, spring from the Council schools piercing all the superincumbent strata and spouting out far above the average brilliance of Eton and Harrow.

So much for an aristocracy. In the lower ranks of creation there is no room for it. It has only been preserved in human society by means of the strictest of artificial barriers, which have never been proof against the insurrection of the conventionally degraded. Yet, compared with the unpardonable blunder of primogeniture, the doctrine of a permanent aristocracy is a monument of wisdom. From a physical point of view, and that mainly includes the mental, the first-born is not merely not the best but the least efficient unit of the family. No stock breeder expects the first foal of any mare or the first calf of any heifer, at whatever age she may be bred from, to become a show beast or the founder of a new strain. (Yet, be it noted, among cattle-breeders great and small are to be found the slowest disparagers of the human error of primogeniture.) Nature, aided by another human convention, commonly saves us from the full effect of the error by giving as the first child a girl who, for the purposes of primogeniture, counts as no child at all. In other cases the first son dies early or the whole family fails and the line is transferred to a younger collateral branch. Lastly, the constant suggestion that the first-born must be the prince of the flock produces in man the effect. For this the more unimaginative mind of the animals is not prepared. It is safe to say that if the same hypnotism could be transferred to the second or the third son, secundogeniture or tertigeniture would rest on a firmer basis than does primogeniture to-day.

Primogeniture is, of course, not an aid to civilisation, but an embellishment upon it. If the race goes forward, it is not because of but in spite of this and a hundred other quaint amusements in which an overfed society can indulge. The nations that strive one with another have to shed this and other impedimenta and cultivate Spartan virtues. The social virtues are at their height with the bees, and it was an age very much blinded by human predilections that insisted on seeing in the bees’ communities signs of aristocratic privilege, monarchical rule, or even democratic order as we understand it. The little ring of bees round the “queen,” which Maeterlinck called maids of honor, are, in reality, as any observer must testify, task masters urging her on to lay the greatest requisite number of eggs, and the sum of their attention to her is to feed her adequately for her task, and in other ways keep her efficient for the performance of her particular part in the hive. In winter, when no eggs are required, the “queen” is not bothered by attendants, and makes her way or keeps her place in the silent, idle hive just as unregarded as any worker bee.

But what in particular is there that we can learn from the ways of the bee? It is that the wealth of the community is the wealth of every citizen; that the danger of the hive is the affair of every inhabitant; that an attack on the city will be promptly avenged, at the cost of her life, by the first soldier that discovers rightly or wrongly the thing to be stung. As far as we have been able to discover, there is only one life entitled to regard itself as more precious than any other. The "singing mason," the "busy porter," the "rich merchant," the "sad-eyed justice" are, in so far as they exist at all, equally bound to take up the sword and, as a necessary and abrupt consequence, perish by the sword. Or, if there is one class of them all that belongs to the reserves, it is that of the nurses, busy, in the shock of the most disturbing catastrophes, tending the children. If there is any order of bee with anything like a privilege, it is the children. As long as there is store of honey and pollen in the hive it is fed to the children. The intention is perfectly clear that, whatever may be the deserts of the present generation, the rising generation shall not start life hampered with an avoidable handicap. This precept of justice and expediency has a curious corollary. When it becomes evident that supplies from outside are suffering a check, not only is the laying of eggs stopped, but such grubs in the cell that, as it seems, cannot be brought up properly, are taken out and destroyed. "Better no children at all than starved and crippled ones" would not be a bad ideal policy for a human society that meant to get on, though we could scarcely expect human nature to run it with the inexorable logic of the bee.

There is one ant that seems to supply the missing link between private and state capitalism; between the taxation and the owning of the millionaire. It is that not too well-known ant of Mexico that in time of prosperity feeds up almost to the bursting-point of their abundantly elastic skins certain chosen members of the community. When these are distended to nine or ten times the usual ant proportions, they hang themselves up by the hooks on their legs and await the time when they may be of further service to the community. When other supplies run short, the "millionaires" are tapped, no doubt to their own relief as well as that of the nurses who want honey for the rising generation. We cannot doubt that the honey-pot ants ask and get the sympathy of the others on account of the burdens of wealth. They possibly get some sort of favored treatment by reminding their compatriots that the lot of the capitalist is an important one. If they spoke of capital flying away, their warning would be received with showers of derision. It would be as difficult for a mine-owner to carry his mountains across the sea as for one of these to take its huge abdomen to another ant-hill.

It is almost or quite impossible to put to Nature the question of Free Trade or Protection. There is no Protection in Nature. It may be true that the intestinal worm perishes on contact with the open air. But so will a creature of the tropics perish as soon as you submit it suddenly to arctic conditions. A flannel jacket might see it through a winter, but it must only be used as a temporary expedient. Left reasonably to the climate, the emigrant from warmer parts grows for itself and its descendants a special winter pelt. The rule of Nature is to accept seeming evils as they come and to turn afflictions into blessings. We desire no better illustration of this than the whole of what we call the nobler part of vegetable creation. When the ancestors of our innumerable flowers were propagated by means of promiscuous spores (as the testimony of the rocks teaches us they were) the visits of marauding insects must have seemed sheer disaster. The first instinct would be all for protection, and to this day such organisms as the common horsetail have struggled on in defiance of the insects. Few flies trouble about the horsetail, either because the plant has made its spores distasteful or because the pollen of the flowers is a much improved product. A spore carried accidentally by the first winged trader, crossed with new blood and raised sturdier progeny. The exchange method increased in certainty with the slow centuries. Some sporangia became petals—placards to advertise the presence of honey, a new invention to attract the best insects. They still came as marauders, wicked foreigners, but they were more and more harnessed to the uses of the plant. They made the flowering plants from semi-fungi; the plants made of them bees, butterflies, and the others that we usually consider the nobler part of insect creation. If the plants had done this of their own conscious set purpose we should have been able to argue for ever as to whether they or we might be the wiser. But seeing that it has been done for them by inevitable chain of consequence, to argue about it is like arguing against the law of gravity. Muscles, faculties, intelligence, are only strengthened and developed by stress of competition. You cannot make an athlete swift by shutting him up in a box, or increase the records of Henley by barring-out the Belgians. Protection may be said to have given us the porcupine, the hedgehog, and the armadillo. Even the rabbit is worth them all, and among rabbits the continent-dweller is much the superior of that which has been immured for a long time on an island. The Shetland pony is a pretty little creature, an aristocrat in some respects among horses, but still a pigmy. It is just an island dwarf that has been protected from the stream of horse evolution and has retained the dimensions if not the form of the long extinct hipparion.

Letters from the Empire.

WHAT CANADA IS THINKING.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Imperialism killed by the so-called Imperialist Party seems a strange paradox, but such may well be the effect in one section of the Empire, if the House of Lords are sustained by the electorate in their recent usurpation of unconstitutional power. In the Dominion of Canada there exists to-day a large element of sane, moderate men, who, while they dislike and disavow the Imperialism of Birmingham and the "Morning Post," are not totally content with the existing relations between their country and the Motherland. They would fain see some rational scheme of closer union and co-operation between Britain and the Dominion, partly to secure some more equitable adjustment of the burdens of Imperial defence, and partly to compass a great mutual benefit through a better system of organised emigration which would simultaneously relieve the congestion of an excessive industrialism at home and assist in the development of the vast unpeopled spaces in the West.

But the action of the House of Lords has dealt a severe blow to these aspirations, and has probably set back for an indefinite period the Imperial movement in Canada where it has always numerous active opponents. Amid a multitude of exaggeration there is a certain leaven of truth in the stories of the Englishman's unpopularity in Canada, an unfortunate state of affairs for which various causes, irrelevant to the point at issue, are responsible. But the cold fact remains that in many quarters of the Dominion the English element is neither prominent nor popular. Apart from French Quebec, the dominating strains in Canada are the Scottish and Irish, two stocks which seem to retain their national characteristics and prejudices for a much longer period than the English families. Latterly, too, since the extraordinary development of the Western Provinces has begun, the American element is both numerous and powerful. Hitherto the Scottish and the Irish have set the political tone of the country, such as it is, and their political sentiments are strongly in sympathy with the electors of the lands of their forefathers, whom they know to be bitterly opposed to the unconstitutional action of the Lords. They are well aware that the vast majority of the people of Scotland and Ireland are determined to end once and for all these attempts at oligarchic domination, and, while etiquette forbids the political leaders to speak, the sympathies of the Canadian democracy are strongly with the Liberal cause. Again, the Tory Press is never tired of uttering solemn warnings about the Americanisation of Canada and of the necessity for educating the American immigrant to be a good Imperialist. But there is little in common between the House of Lords and the American pioneer farmer, who is an unbending democrat, and the doctrines of Lord Curzon about hereditary capacity and virtue would scarcely appeal to him. Needless to say, the American papers, which the American emigrant to Canada still reads, have lost no opportunity of taunting him with the fact that his destinies are really controlled by a few English aristocrats in London, and he has ceased to be a free citizen.

Here, then, is a country where there is a certain prejudice against Englishmen, where there is a strong leaven of fierce American democracy, where the majority of the Anglo-Saxon inhabitants are imbued with a bitter dislike of the social inequalities and feudalism which they themselves or their ancestors emigrated to escape, and where there is no reverence for, nor even understanding of, the hereditary principle, or of any aristocracy save that of brains and enterprise; yet when a clique of English aristocrats (the Scottish and Irish nobility have for the last century been an element apart from the national life of their countries) take a step which most competent authorities agree is unconstitutional, and reject a great scheme of democratic finance to save their sacred land system, the subservient Tory Press call that country to testify in favor of the Lords and their partisans that they are the sole saviours of Empire, and that the overseas States pine for their return to power.

The assumption is a transparent absurdity, and no amount of money spent by a few Toronto Protectionists in cables to English Protectionists who may, perhaps, come under the class described in the West as "Imperial Drummers," will suffice to veil the true opinion and sympathies of the Canadian people on the merits of this crisis. If the British people are supine and stupid enough to stem the course of progress in order to save a feudal system which is the laughing-stock of the Anglo-Saxon world, and to restore in a spirit of temporary snobbery a few arrogant aristocrats, some of proven incapacity, to power, Canadians will wonder, sympathise, and mayhap despise, but they will also silently and firmly resolve to draw no closer for the time being to a country which could be guilty of such folly and short-sightedness. They certainly do not intend to commit their destinies to the control of an irresponsible oligarchy, and a Tory victory means that the "de facto" control of the Empire vests in the hereditary House. Let those of the British people who cherish dreams of Imperial Federation realise once and for all that until the power of the House of Lords is curtailed, and Britain ceases to be merely a nominal democracy, the consummation of their dreams must be very, very distant. A victory for the Lords would give great impetus in Canada to the Laurier doctrine of "the ripe apple dropping off the tree," and might in time lead to an impasse which no British-born Canadian would desire to see.

On the question of Protection, Canada is perennially paraded as an example of its saving graces. Yet it is the naked truth to say that the existing Canadian Protectionist system will not for one moment bear examination by sane citizens or disinterested students. If it has contributed to the industrial progress of a few eastern cities where the evils of British industrialism are being faithfully reproduced, it has placed outrageous burdens upon the vast agricultural and lumbering population which constitutes eighty per cent. of the community. Only the recent phenomenal prosperity due to the development of the vast natural resources of the West has enabled the country to endure the load of the tariff, and as soon as the inhabitants of the Dominion either are forced or have time to take stock of their true position, the present tariff will receive some rude shocks. From a variety of circumstances, Free Trade has to-day no place on political platforms at Ottawa, but a movement in its favor is growing in volume day by day. The farmers are organising in every province, and their Associations now pass annual resolutions denouncing the tariff. For the time being the manufacturers have secured control of both political parties by skilful contributions to election funds, and the day of reckoning must be deferred till the Western Provinces, which have everything to lose by Protection and everything to gain by Free Trade, obtain a sufficient population and political representation, both inevitable sequences to the present tide of immigration, to enable them to control some Government at Ottawa.

A Free Trade movement in the West, which is now imminent, might lead to Imperial Free Trade, but the present Protectionist propaganda in England will only serve to delay that end. To-day the chief supporters in Canada of the Tariff Reformers at home are the extreme Ontario Protectionists, but a Tariff Reform Chancellor would find these same people the worst opponents of any scheme of Imperial Preference tending to lower the Canadian tariff, which he might propound. Their hypocrisy would best be exposed by the formulation of such a scheme, but, until they are actually confronted with it, they see in the possible success of Tariff Reform, alias Protection, in the great Free Trade stronghold an excellent pretext to press demands for more Protection in Canada.

To a large majority of the people of Canada the doctrine and sentiments of the Imperial Protectionist Party which owns Mr. Balfour as its titular leader are offensive and repugnant. Canada is to-day a cosmopolitan nation, and many of its inhabitants have other national sympathies than those relating to the British Empire, however great their loyalty to it as an institution may be.

Modern Tory Imperialism implies hostility and antagonism to a variety of other nations as well as an insular selfishness and arrogance which is alike unworthy of our traditions and dangerous to our safety. It stands for militarism, commercial strife, and an impossible system of centralisation, whereby Lords Milner and Curzon would shape our destinies at the end of cables in their London offices, and consolidate the Empire by long and bloody wars with Germany or tariff strife with the United States. Such ideals and schemes will never find favor in Canada where the Liberalism of Sir Wilfrid Laurier extends both gratitude and sympathy to the Liberalism of Mr. Asquith, and British Toryism is regarded with a suspicion begotten of past relations, and it is a safe prophecy to make that when any scheme of Imperial Federation is brought to pass, a Liberal Government will be in office at Westminster. Let all who profess to set Imperialism above all other things in their politics weigh these aspects with care and consideration.—Yours, &c.,

SCOTUS.

Communications.

THE LAW OF ELECTORAL CORRUPTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Little likely is it that the General Election will fail to bring its crop of petition cases, when we may expect some dissatisfaction with verdicts which deal too easily with flagrant guilt and the usual promise of the Law Officers that the whole question of illegal practices at elections shall be re-considered.

Now, whatever may be said as to judicial eccentricities, it is a fact that little or no fault can be found with the Acts affecting corrupt and illegal practices at Parliamentary and municipal elections. Although lengthy, they are signally free from obscurity or verbosity. Their length is due solely to the painstaking and exhaustive exploration of every path and bye-way to and from the polling booth in order to discover and penalise any action which erring men might perchance take to influence wrongfully the result of elections.

Each Act gives the most careful and concise definitions as to every word used which might be open to doubt. Once granted agreement as to the facts of a case, and there is no room for difference as to the intentions and scope of the Statutes. Taken together, they are models of what Acts of Parliament should be, beautiful in their lucidity and concision, literally formidable in their precision, and, remembering that their object is to prevent wealth and social power from over-riding all else, they may fairly be claimed as the most democratic measures existing.

So far, then, as the law can provide, his Majesty's Petition Judges have a finely meshed net which can be cast so far and wide that no conceivable form of overt corruption shall escape condemnation. Nor can the wrong-doer imagine that the more subtle and remote practices will escape if intention be once proved. THE PROMISE OF EMPLOYMENT, OF THE EXERCISE OF INFLUENTIAL PATRONAGE, OF THE GRANTING OF A LEASE, OR CONTRACT, OR SUCH-LIKE FAVOR, MAY ALL BE LEGAL BRIBERY, even though there should have been no intention of keeping the promise. The guilt extends to the bribed, to the briber, and to anyone who stands at the back of the briber. To promise a labor leader a snug billet on condition that he influences the votes of his union members; to pay a householder's rates in order to qualify him as a voter; to withdraw a summons on promise of a vote; any of these may land all the parties concerned into the net. Any such practices and any form of treating may be pursued by the Public Prosecutor, the penalties running up to £200 in fines, or one year's imprisonment with hard labor, with deprivation of vote and ineligibility for any public or judicial office in the borough or county for the succeeding five years.

A candidate may even be rendered for ever incapable of election in that constituency.

One corrupt practice, namely, personation, is a felony and may bring two years' hard labor to the personator or anyone guilty of aiding and abetting.

"Undue influence" covers not only threats or the use of force to compel or restrain, or even only impede, a voter, but ANY FORM OF CRAFT OR OF APPEAL TO MATERIAL INTERESTS. "Spiritual intimidation" is a corrupt practice, although obviously difficult to prove.

It is equally corrupt to bribe a candidate to withdraw, whatever form the "bribe" may take, or to bribe a third party to compel him to withdraw, or to spread a false report of his withdrawal, or to make assertions against his character. Actions brought under the last-named head, however, seldom succeed.

The minor forms of corruption are well-known, consisting mainly of payments for prohibited objects such as flags, torches, bands, badges, or for vehicles or horses or other conveyances for voters, or for displaying bills except by professional bill-posters. The fact that a vehicle accustomed to ply for hire must not even be "lent" is but one of many instances of the law stepping in to prevent its own defeat. "I only lent my cab. No one paid me," pleads the proprietor. "Guilty, none the less," says the law. "You are required to be not only beyond proof but above suspicion."

To destroy the best-laid schemes of secret corruption, the law provides that an indemnity against criminal prosecution may be claimed by voluntary witnesses whose evidence has been well and truly given. The chance of saving their skins is too tempting to be resisted by some at least of the culprits, and others soon follow suit.

Even supposing a conspiracy too cleverly concealed to yield evidence of the chains of connection between the corrupted voter and those whose interests are thus served, the judges may, upon evidence of any general state of corruption, void a seat even though no single one of the acts can be brought home to either of the candidates. They may even, of course, disfranchise an entire constituency.

On the whole the Acts by which Petition cases were transferred to judges have worked well, although the transference originally was strongly opposed by the Bench. The principal flaw is that the petitioner has no appeal, although an unseated Member may appeal by leave of the Petition Judges. The Court of Appeal's decision in that case is final, since the conventional "jealousy" of the Commons will not allow Peers to decide upon an election case, nor are Law Lords allowed to sit on such cases in the Court of Appeal. In actual fact the peer, as a peer, is less likely to be prejudiced than the party man who has been elevated to the Bench rather for political services than judicial qualities. The judges whom one would be most sorry to see sitting upon a Petition case are not among the Law Lords, nor are likely to be.

Election agents and workers on the democratic side are often annoyed by the multiplicity of things which must be or may not be done, and even evade the provisions of the Acts on points which seem non-essential. They do not realise that the excessive stringency and comprehensiveness of the law is one of democracy's greatest safeguards, and democrats therefore should be the readiest to give loyal and scrupulous acquiescence. The slightest of the prohibitions may be the one point at which the wrong-doer is caught, and thus serve as a starting-point from which to discover a whole conspiracy to debauch a constituency.

With a more conscientious regard for the Acts on the part at any rate of the popular parties, a stricter interpretation on the part of the judges may be induced.—
Yours, &c., S. D. S.

January 18th, 1910.

Letters to the Editor.

THE LAW OF THE SURPLUS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I notice it has recently been stated in letters from your correspondents that I had made the statement that "owing to their great home market American manufacturers could and did send steel abroad at lower than cost prices."

This is a mistake. What I have often stated is that a great home market enables manufacturers to reach markets abroad and sell at lower than the home sales net and yet be gainers, i.e., it is more profitable to run their mills full and get a lower price for what may be called the "surplus" exported abroad, than it is to limit production. This idea is now known as "the law of the surplus."—
Yours, &c.,

ANDREW CARNEGIE.

2, East 91st Street, New York,
January 7th, 1910.

THE CHARACTER OF THE INDIAN POLICE.

SIR,—In your editorial on the Indian Police, for which well-wishers of India will feel grateful, you indicate the unhappy—indeed, tragic—position of the well-meaning Anglo-Indian official, "the impartial and honest Englishman," who is responsible for the welfare of a vast dominion, but who is a mere catspaw in the hands of evil-doers, because he depends for information and advice upon a "dishonest and tyrannical" police. How is he to free himself from this ignoble servitude, and become master of the situation? There is only one way: he must get into real touch with the people; and find for himself non-official advisers from among the independent men of good character, who are trusted by the local community. This sounds simple. But it is not as easy as it might appear. For the European officer must not expect such independent and self-respecting men to come to him uninvited; their motives might be misunderstood, and they would be liable to affront from underlings. No; this is not a thing that settles itself automatically. On the contrary, considerable trouble must be taken, and no little circumspection must be exercised, in order to discover the right men, and to win their confidence. Will you allow me, from personal experience, to explain how desirable local advisers can best be discovered and secured?

No sensible person would expect help in this quest from a corrupt police. Their interest is adverse; for the independent man is a standing menace to their supremacy, and to their illicit gains. They want him deposed; especially if he is educated, and of a blameless life. Fortunately, effectual help can be obtained elsewhere. For in the great town centres are to be found educated Indian gentlemen of recognised position—Judges of the High Court, members of Council, knights of the Star of India—who are trusted alike by the Government and by the community. With their assistance the right local men can be found. Thus, in my early days in Bombay, it was my privilege to have as friends men like Mr. Justice Ranade, Rao Sahib Naráyan Wishwanáth Mandlik, and Sir Mungaldás Nathubhai; and with such friends in Council I was able, when proceeding to a new district, to obtain a trustworthy list of desirable local acquaintances; not necessarily persons of wealth or great influence, but quiet, self-respecting men, averse from intrigue. In this list would perhaps be comprised a pensioned Judge or deputy-collector, a learned Shástoi or Mauloi, a retired schoolmaster, charitable merchants or bankers, one or two old-fashioned Patels, and even simple cultivators. Starting with these introductions, and continuing the original method in a lower stratum, it was easy, when on tour in the district, to extend, among the villagers, my circle of desirable acquaintances; until I found myself in touch with representatives of every class and creed, who kept me posted in current affairs, and gave me timely warning of any rocks ahead.

Pending the establishment of District Councils, as recommended to the Decentralisation Commission, it is open to every well-meaning official to follow this plan. He may thus win the confidence of the people, and convince them that he is not in the hands of police spies and sycophants, who desire to keep him isolated, and in antagonism to the popular sentiment.—Yours, &c., W. WEDDERBURN.

Hyères, France,

January 16th, 1910.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF CONVERSION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—One is tempted to answer a phrase in Mr. Caldecott's letter, in your last week's issue, by the time-worn question: "What is truth?" Surely "false beliefs" and "true ones" are but relative terms at the best. What is truth to Mr. Caldecott may not be truth to me, and certainly is not truth to the Hindoo, who yet receives acts of grace after his kind. Neither is religion of any sort whatsoever, nor faith of any description, necessary to conversion from alcoholism, or from any other of the many vices into which humanity may fall. Conversions of the highest order may be brought about through no other appeal than to the mind or sub-conscious self on purely rational grounds, and that these cures, effected through no religious medium, "can settle down into permanent sanity," is both probable and proved.

No suggestions are "baseless," but that their basis must necessarily be found in religious truths or divine promises is an assertion which science stands to disprove. One of the greatest of all conversions, which is to secure a sane mind in a sound body, can be achieved and maintained by suggestion apart from all appeal to the "Divine order of the world," or "the preaching of a Divine promise of forgiveness and spiritual help" in the ordinary acceptance of these terms.—Yours, &c., ADELA CONSTANCE SMITH.

January 20th, 1910.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The view one may take of "conversion," apparently turns on "there may be a miracle, but we must not expect one," for those who do not accept, more or less, Mr. Sidney Low's attitude, except the miracle, and consequently are not interested to inquire further, the supernatural proving a most effectual barrier to continued research.

Mr. Sidney Low is for further research, and there are two aspects of conversion that I found no reference to in his excellent article—the not infrequent overstrain on the mind; and is it, or is it not, an acquired characteristic? Conversion is productive of a certain amount of insanity. The personal stimulus is too strong, the mind under the rush of anthropomorphic idealism finds it impossible to re-adjust itself quickly enough to its inevitable continuance of the past synthesis of life. There is a conscious unassimilable alternation of personality, the elimination of which lies apparently in a return to the pre-conversion state.

Then comes the question, Is it, or is it not, an acquired characteristic? If it is a natural growth or development of certain temperaments, then presumably such influence might be passed on to the children, the converted man being so inherently. But if it be acquired, must we not hold that as the man was before conversion, so for all inherent propagating influences in his children he remains. As Father Tyrrell said, "Between natural and supernatural reality there can be no conflict, but only between the theories of one and the other, between natural and sacred science."

With Mr. Low, I hold that natural science has thrown considerable light on conversion—it remains yet for sacred science to do so, for at present it only continues to point us to the reality we all recognise.—Yours, &c., V. P.

January 18th, 1910.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have read with great interest the letters on this subject in your current number. I for one am extremely glad that the cudgels have been taken up by those who hold opposite views to Mr. Sidney Low and others like myself, who believe that the phenomena of conversion can be explained by the methods of psychological analysis. What, if any, are the essential differences between the two schools of thought? In the first place, what are the phenomena of conversion which are under analysis? Both schools of thought will, I think, agree that conversion, as described by Mr. Harold Begbie, implies a sudden change in the moral attitude of an individual, the breaking up of old, firmly associated ideas, and a sudden formation of entirely new mental associations. There are three salient features in these conversions: firstly, the change is a sudden one; secondly, it is ushered in by some form of strong emotion; thirdly, the change is out of proportion to the means used to produce it when judged by everyday experience of the relationship between cause and effect.

From the point of view of the Churchman, the apparent disproportion between cause and effect is explained by the action of a power extraneous to the organism, which, using the preacher as an instrument, produces the effect upon the person converted.

From the point of view of the psychologist, the apparent disproportion between cause and effect is due to the non-recognition of a power within the mind of the convert, the power of some stratum of mind or personality under certain conditions, to act upon suggestions received to an extent which would be impossible under normal conditions.

To the Churchman his view is correct, because of his reasoned belief in a certain form of dogmatic teaching, which to him represents the spiritual order of the universe, and upon the acceptance of which depends the true relationship between the mind of man and the world in which he lives. To the psychologist his view is correct, because the observed phenomena are in parallel with other observed psychological phenomena, and because, as a scientific inquirer, he is bound to infer similarity of causes when he observes similar results obtained under similar conditions. However much the Churchman may be right in his view, he is, to my mind, wrong in denouncing any scientific inquiry into the observed facts of our mental life, he is endangering the very cause for which he is fighting; if his beliefs represent truth, they will fit in with all knowledge, and with all theories which are the logical outcome of that knowledge. I cannot see how a reasoned belief in the functions and powers of the sub-conscious mind and in the influence which suggestion may have upon these powers and functions, can influence anyone towards "abandoning trust in the rationality of the universe on which true religion takes its stand." No amount of psychological knowledge will disprove God, but, as in other branches of scientific inquiry, it may alter one's conception of the way God deals with man. On what grounds does Mr. Caldecott deny the objective reality of anything which can be conveyed by suggestion? The object aimed at by both suggestor and preacher is alike, to re-educate the will, to break up old faultily associated ideas, and to form new associations which will tend towards right thinking and acting. In neither case are the suggestions baseless.

I agree with Mr. Caldecott in believing that no healthy mind is ever self fed. A healthy mind depends upon healthy reactions to the objective realities of life. If we can interpret the world in which we live rightly, if our ideas are rightly associated in every direction, we shall need neither the emotional appeal of conversion nor treatment by suggestion. We shall act according to the truth which is in us which is God.—Yours, &c., MAURICE B. WRIGHT, M.D.

33, Wimpole Street,
January 20th, 1910.

ETONIAN MANNERS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Stanley Wightman has written to you this week, regretting that all the members of the present Cabinet have not "enjoyed the privilege of being Etonians." "In my humble opinion," he adds, "we could with advantage to the dignity and tone of our public life have very much more of Eton, and the type for which she stands . . ."

Fortunately, since Mr. Wightman wrote, the Headmaster of Eton has given us an admirable display of Etonian "dignity and reserve." I quote from the "Observer" for January 16th:—

"The Headmaster of Eton, the Rev. the Hon. E. Lyttelton, speaking at Windsor last night, said it was twenty years since he had stood upon a political platform. Then it was on the Liberal side. The reason why he was not on that side now was because Liberals then were very different from Liberals now. Liberals then told the truth.

"There were eight hundred and sixty millions, the savings of working men. Did they think it likely that in the course of a few years Mr. Lloyd George would not cast his eyes on that sum? He thought that when the people of England began to understand these things they would do as they did to Henry George—the other George—in Edinburgh twenty-three or twenty-four years ago, when he had to bolt away from a meeting which rushed forward to turn him out. It would not be the first time, however, that Mr. Lloyd George had to run away from a hall. (Cheers.) 'I fancy,' added Canon Lyttelton, 'he knows the way out by the back door as well as anyone.'

"In conclusion, he said that he would rather put a number of blind kittens in the place of Government than be governed by Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Winston Churchill. (Loud and continued cheering and cries of 'Good old Eton!')

—Yours, &c.,

L. BARBARA HAMMOND

Hollycot, Vale of Health,
Hampstead, N.W.

January 15th, 1910.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Exquisitely apropos comes the report of the speech of Canon Lyttelton, Eton's headmaster, with its sneers at Mr. Lloyd George for vulgarly escaping from his would-be murderers, and its unfavorable comparison of the Government to a "lot of blind kittens in a basket."

Through the thin veneer of Christian sentiment and society polish in this Anglican dignitary may be clearly discerned the average English aristocratic barbarian. The Canon gives dramatic and convincing proof of the thesis of your article on "Our Lost Romance." The letter of your correspondent, Mr. Stanley Wightman, must be recalled by him to-day with curious qualms. He had committed himself to the "humble opinion that we could with advantage to the dignity and tone of our public life have very much more of Eton, and the type for which it stands, and completely dispense with the new Comic School for Scandal"!

And now we have Canon Lyttelton himself, with his "blind kittens in a basket," clearly qualifying for the headmastership of this very "Comic School for Scandal"!—Yours, &c.,

J. S. BOOTHROYD.

Brockley, January 18th, 1910.

MAGYAR PERSECUTION OF A ROUMANIAN POET.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The reactionary methods by which the coalition Government have ruled Hungary since the spring of 1906 have been more than once exposed in THE NATION, and your readers are aware that the non-Magyar races of Hungary are subjected to systematic political persecution at the hands of the narrow aristocratic clique which monopolises the whole Government and administration of the country. Any adequate account of the treatment meted out to the Slovaks and Roumanians (to say nothing of Croats) would far exceed the limits of your space, especially amid the stress of the elections. But I venture to draw your attention to an incident of a peculiarly flagrant kind, which took place only last week, and which may be described as the Parthian shot of Dr. Wekerle and Count Apponyi against their non-Magyar fellow citizens. This is the arrest of the Roumanian poet and journalist, Mr. Octavian Goga.

Mr. Goga is the most brilliant of the younger Roumanian poets, and his stirring lyrics have earned him a high reputation not only among the 3,000,000 Roumanians of his native Hungary but also in the neighboring kingdom of Roumania. To the Magyar Chauvinists he is doubly obnoxious, firstly as the inspired singer of an oppressed population, and secondly as the ardent advocate of Roumanian loyalty to the House of Hapsburg. When the Archduke Francis Ferdinand paid a state visit to the Roumanian Court at Sinaia last summer, Mr. Goga, in his weekly newspaper, "Tara Noastra" (published at Hermannstadt) summoned the Roumanian peasantry of Transylvania to assemble at every station along the route and to acclaim their future sovereign, whose firm adherence to the idea of Universal Suffrage they regard as their sole hope of political emancipation. These loyal demonstrations actually took place, although the Magyar authorities threw every obstacle in their way; and since then Mr. Goga has been a marked man. In the autumn, half a dozen articles in "Tara Noastra" were incriminated by the Public Prosecutor, as containing "incitement" against the State, and an action was brought against their author. Meanwhile, Mr. Goga himself, who had laid his plans to spend two years abroad in Italy and France, arranged to stop the publication of his paper at the New Year, and, before leaving for Paris, went to the well-known Lakács Bath in Budapest to undergo a cure. At this stage the author of the articles died, and the Public Prosecutor shifted the responsibility for them on to the shoulders of Goga, as editor of the paper. A week ago he was arrested in the Kurhaus under suspicion of attempting to escape from a prosecution of which he had not even received any official notice. This treatment of an ill man is aggravated by the fact that preventive arrest is almost unknown (indeed barely legal) in Hungary in press actions; while the falsity of the charge of evasion is sufficiently proved by Mr. Goga having both inscribed his name as a regular Kurgast and duly announced his arrival to the police. Bail for 15,000 crowns has been refused, and Dr. Wekerle, when appealed to by the Roumanian deputies of the Hungarian Parliament, absolutely declined to intervene. Perhaps he hoped that the incident might embarrass his more liberal successor as Premier, Dr. Lukaes; or perhaps he yielded to the influence of his colleague, Count Apponyi, whose reactionary law for the Magyarisation of Primary Education was eclipsed last summer by his flagrant violation of Roumanian Church autonomy. In any case, the unfortunate poet remains in prison.

By a peculiar irony of fate, the police official who made the arrest found upon the poet's table the completed MS. of his Roumanian translation of Madách's classical drama "The Tragedy of Man," which fervent patriots are wont to describe as the Magyar "Faust." Such treatment is hardly calculated to encourage the Roumanians to devote their time to Magyar literature.

Sir, the persecution of distinguished literary men is unworthy of a civilised country, and it is high time that the Magyars should abandon such tactics towards races who are their inferiors only in the exercise of political power, and in no other respect. I have dealt with Mr. Goga's case in some detail, not because it is an isolated incident (the fresh conspiracy against Father Hlinka, the Slovak patriot, is, if possible, even more outrageous), but simply because it is so characteristic of the systematic campaign waged by the Magyar Government against all representatives of non-Magyar culture in Hungary. I appeal to you and your readers, not for any act of interference in the private affairs of Hungary, but for a public expression of sympathy with the victims of Magyar oppression, whether they be Roumanian or Slovak, Croat or Serb or German. The racial question in Hungary is not less important than the racial question in Turkey, and if left too long as an open sore upon the face of Europe, may some day produce effects of European importance. Meanwhile, no one to whom Liberalism is more than a hollow phrase can regard with indifference the situation of the non-Magyar races of Hungary and indeed of the agrarian population without distinction of nationality.—Yours, &c.,

R. W. SETON-WATSON.

Spalato, Dalmatia,
January 10th, 1910.

PROTECTION AND THE PRICE OF WHEAT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I suppose you admit that the price of a thing depends on the law of "supply and demand"?

If so, it is clear that if the supply of corn is greatly increased by encouraging our Colonies to open up their vast resources, the supply being thereby greater, the price would fall; not only so, other countries now supplying us would cut their prices down to meet the competition. Under these circumstances, surely it is reasonable to expect, by granting a preference, to lower and not increase the price of the loaf?

I ask you in fairness to publish this letter. It expresses the view of a 'cute American, well up in these matters.—Yours, &c.,

TARIFF REFORMER.

United Empire Club,
117, Piccadilly, W.
January 19th, 1910.

[It is absolutely irrational to count on a reduction in the price of wheat as the result of exchanging a Colonial supply for a world supply. The great value of the latter is that it averages good and bad harvests. The uncertainty of harvests created constant fluctuations in the price of wheat in the old Corn Law days. The new Corn Laws would bring them back.—ED., NATION.]

LIGHT DUES AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In June last, I acted as the representative of the West of England Steamship Owners' Protection and Indemnity Association, Limited, who are acting in the above matter in concert with other similar associations in England, after seeing some of the principal national Shipowners' Associations on the Continent, who have joined their British confrères with a view to forcing the International Delegates to grant an immediate reduction in the sanitary dues, and the French Concessionaires materially to reduce the lighthouse charges or to abandon the concession to a syndicate which, in addition to improving the service, is prepared to reduce the charges by 30 per cent.

In dealing with the lighthouse question, I had a very favorable reception from the Turkish officials, particularly from Djavid Bey, the Minister of Finance, who promised to give the matter every consideration, agreeing that my proposals are very satisfactory to his Government and the shipowners. Consequently the official formalities have already been made between the Ministries of Finance and Marine.

Extraordinary as it may appear, I found that the attitude, not only of the British Chamber of Commerce of Turkey, but also of his Majesty's Embassy at Constantinople, has always been one of opposition to the legitimate desire of the British shipowners, a desire which is shared by every shipowner in the world whose vessels are trading in Turkish waters.

In fact, the prominent members both of the British Embassy and of the British Chamber of Commerce of Turkey not only do not sympathise with the efforts to reduce the charges or to acquire the Light dues' concession, but they talk against this plan; and the most incomprehensible part is that their views are known to the staff of the Lighthouse management, who quote the names of these officials in support of their administration.

It is difficult to understand this attitude on the part of those whose duty it is to support British interests, and if any inquiry were held on the subject these parties could not uphold their views, because not only are they acting directly against what should be their rôle in the matter, but they are also playing, perhaps unwittingly, into the hands of those who by the nature of things should be their opponents, and are throwing cold water on an enterprise which it should be their pride to further to the best of their ability. It stands to reason that by this attitude they can only mislead the Foreign Office and its advisers.

Further, I have heard it said that Sir Edward Grey does not wish to encourage the present Turkish Government to cancel agreements made with foreigners under the old régime, but I am at a loss to understand how the taking back this concession from the present holders can be termed "cancelling an agreement," because the wording of the concession contemplates the possibility of it being taken back by the Government, and if my efforts succeed, they will do so because they are based on the terms of the concession itself.—Yours, &c.,

GEORGE A. SALDJI.

15, Great St. Helen's, London, E.C.
January 17th, 1910.

Poetry.

FROM THE GOLDEN BOOK.

EVE.—LONG ago in ages gray
I was fashioned out of clay:
Built with the sun and moon,
Kneaded to a holy tune:
And there came to me a breath
From the House of Life and Death.
Then the sun roared into fire,
And the moon with swift desire
Leaped upon her journey long,
Singing in the starry throng:
And I climbed up from the sod
Holding to the hand of God.
In a Garden fair and wide,
Looking down a mountain side,
Prone I lay and felt the press
Of Immensity's caress:
There a space I lived and knew
What the Power meant to do.
Till upon a day there came Down to me a voice of flame,
"Thou, the corner-stone of man,
Rise, and set about my plan;
Nothing doubting, for a guide
I have quickened in thy side."
From the garden wide and fair,
From the pure and holy air,
Down the mountain side I crept
Stumbling often, ill-adept;
Feeling pangs of woeful bliss
Growing from the primal kiss.
Then from out my teeming side
Came the son who is my guide:
Him I nursed through faithful days
Till I faltered at his gaze,
Boldly staring, when he saw
I was woman, life, and law.
Life and law and dear delight:
I the moon upon the night
All alluring: I the tree
Growing nuts of mystery:
I the tincture and the dew
That the apple reddens through.
I desirable and sweet:
I of fruitfulness complete:
I the promise and the threat
Which the gods may not forget:
I the Weaver spinning blind
Destinies for human-kind.
Lifting, lifting ever up
Till I reach the golden cup:
Groping down and ever down
Till I find the buried crown:
I the Searcher sent to bring
Plumes for the Almighty's Wing.
Weaving Life and Death I go:
Building what I do not know:
Planting, tho' in sore distress,
Gardens in the wilderness:
Palaces too big to scan
By the little eye of man.
Knowing surely this is true
That the thing I have to do
Has been ordered by the breath
From the House of Life and Death:
It no wind of chance or wide
Doubting-Cloud may set aside.
Still the sun roars out in fire
And the moon with pale desire
Keeps the path was pointed her
In the starry theatre:
Sun and moon and I are true
To the work we have to do.

JAMES STEPHENS.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE following is our weekly selection of books which we commend to the notice of our readers:—

"Poems Written in Early Youth." By George Meredith. (Constable. 6s. net.)

"The Strength of England: A Politico-Economic History of England from Saxon Times to the Reign of Charles I." By J. W. Welford. (Longmans. 5s. net.)

"The Promise of American Life." By Herbert Croly. (Macmillan. 8s. 6d. net.)

"Roman Life and Manners under the Early Empire." By Ludwig Friedländer. Translated by J. H. Freese. Vol. III. (Routledge. 6s.)

"Liberty and Authority." By Lord Hugh Cecil. (Arnold. 2s. 6d.)

"Aspects of the Hebrew Genius." Edited by Leon Simon. (Routledge. 2s. 6d.)

"A Wardour Street Idyll." By Sophie Cole. (Mills & Boon. 6s.)

"Les Pères de la Révolution de Bayle à Condorcet." Par Joseph Fabre. (Paris: Alcan, 10fr.)

"Etudes et Leçons sur La Révolution Française." Sixième Série. Par A. Aulard. (Paris: Alcan. 3fr. 50.)

"La Vague Rouge." Roman. Par J. H. Rosny. (Paris: Plon-Nourrit. 3fr. 50.)

* * *

LESLIE STEPHEN declared that nobody ever wrote a dull autobiography and, though some have achieved what Stephen thought impossible, writers who bore us when they tell us about themselves often bore us still more when they tell us about anything else. At any rate, books of self-revelation have so great an attraction for most readers that it is surprising we have had to wait so long for a study of the autobiography as a literary type. The first attempt in this direction comes from an American lady, Mrs. A. R. Burr, whose book, "The Autobiography," is issued in this country by Messrs. Constable. It is founded upon a critical analysis of two hundred and sixty "capital autobiographies," ranging from St. Augustine to Mr. Edmund Gosse. In this survey Mrs. Burr seems to have had two closely related though distinct objects: to determine the laws governing what she calls "the autobiographical intention," and to trace the rise and progress of self-study and introspection as revealed in literature. Her method is ruthlessly scientific. She quotes freely from such writers as Quételet, Le Bon, and Ribot, and she explains Sainte-Beuve's failure to "utilise his material as an aid to science" as due to the fact that he did not come under the influence of "the suggestiveness of the modern psychological laboratory." It is Sainte-Beuve's large fund of curiosity and his disregard of "science" that makes his biographical criticism so readable and so full of interest.

* * *

"AUGUSTINE, Cardan, and, later, Rousseau and Mill—these," says Mrs. Burr, "are the autobiographers who have influenced others, and these are the great self-students." Nobody can deny that Augustine was a great self-student, but, in our view, his "Confessions" ought to rank as a religious, rather than as an autobiographical, classic. Anatole France, who enjoys reading autobiographies, complains that the saint does not confess enough. "His is a spiritual book, which satisfies divine love more than human curiosity. He does not write for the curious; he writes for the Manicheans." Cardan's "De Vita Propria Liber" deserves a place in any list of autobiographies, but if we were to name the most typical and influential "self-revealer" before Rousseau, it would surely be Montaigne. Yet Montaigne is not even mentioned in Mrs. Burr's pages. Nor, except for one bare reference, is Sir Thomas Browne, although the author boldly tells us that "the reader may be sure that the omission of a work simply means that it contains no definite matter worth noting in the following pages." Another omission we have noted is the "True Historical Relation" of Sir Tobie Matthew, and, judging from the dates given in the appendix, there is a confusion between Marguerite de Valois, who wrote "Mémoires," and Marguerite de Valois-Angoulême who wrote none. In spite of these slight faults, and in spite of her parade of "psychology," Mrs. Burr's book is not unworthy of the fascinating theme she has chosen.

BIOGRAPHY and memoirs bulk largely in Mr. John Lane's list of spring announcements. Mr. Oscar Browning's "Memories of Sixty Years at Eton, Cambridge, and Elsewhere" is sure to contain a number of good anecdotes as well as personal impressions of the many distinguished people—among them men of letters, artists, politicians, sportsmen, dons, and, it is said, even emperors—whose friendship Mr. Browning has enjoyed. The book also deals with the education given in the Public Schools and Universities, a subject upon which Mr. Browning can speak with the authority that comes from a full and varied experience.

* * *

A LITERARY biography of special interest which the same publisher has in preparation is Dr. F. W. Moorman's "Robert Herrick: A Biographical and Critical Study." Apart from the biographical accounts prefixed to editions of his poems, no English life of Herrick has hitherto been attempted. Dr. Moorman has been able, from the Herrick papers at Beaumanor and from documents in the Record Office, to bring to light a good deal of fresh information about Herrick's career. He has also succeeded in fixing the dates at which many of the poems included in the "Hesperides" and "Noble Numbers" were written, and by this means to trace the progress of the poet's mind and art.

* * *

THE love letters of Alfred de Musset to Aimée d'Alton, of which we have already spoken in this column, have been published by the "Figaro," and given rise to a storm of controversy about Musset and his love affairs. The letters, together with a number of unpublished poems, have been edited by M. Léon Séché, and will be issued in volume form next week by the Mercur de France.

* * *

A NEW volume of poems by Mr. James Elroy Flecker is to be published during the season. Readers of THE NATION have had several opportunities of appreciating Mr. Flecker's poetical inspiration and mastery over English metrical devices.

* * *

THE news that Messrs. Routledge are bringing out a revised edition of Sonnenschein's "The Best Books" will be welcome not only to librarians and students but to the general reader as well. The world of books keeps increasing at so great a rate that a trustworthy guide to its population is more indispensable than ever, and this function has for more than twenty years been performed by "The Best Books." It was first published in 1887; a revised edition appeared in 1891, and this was supplemented by "The Reader's Guide," issued in 1895. The edition now in preparation contains additional notes and titles dealing with books published up to the end of last year. In its new form the work will consist of three parts, and Part I. (Theology, Mythology, Folklore, and Philosophy) will be issued in the course of the next few weeks.

* * *

GERHARD HAUPTMANN, the German poet and dramatist, has written a novel which is to be published shortly under the title of "Emanuel Quint." This is his first attempt at fiction in a non-dramatic form.

* * *

THE biography of Daniel Defoe, upon which Professor W. P. Trent has been engaged for some time, is now almost ready, and, together with a fuller bibliography of Defoe's works than has yet appeared, will be published shortly by the Columbia University Press. The trustees of Columbia University have also charged Professor Trent with the editorial supervision of a complete edition of Milton's works in verse and in prose, in English and in Latin. This new edition is intended to be complete, authoritative, and definitive. It will give special attention to bibliographical detail, and will contain facsimiles of manuscripts and of title-pages as well as a chronological sequence of portraits of Milton.

* * *

A COLLECTION of essays and addresses by Lord Esher is to be published by Mr. John Murray. The book will contain quotations from the unpublished journals of Queen Victoria and passages from private letters of General Gordon.

Reviews.

THE DECAY OF THE DRAMATIC SPIRIT.*

THERE are many significant and important sayings in this reprint of Mr. Arthur Symons's essays on the Play, the Players, and the Audience. And, to begin with the last words in the book, a paper called "A Paradox on Art," one sees that the ingenious author has failed to realise the vast gulf that yawns between Creation and Interpretation. For the thesis of the "Paradox" is simply this: that there is no such gulf in existence.

"Bach writes a composition for the violin; that composition exists in the abstract, the moment it is written down upon paper, but, even to those trained musicians who are able to read it at sight, it exists in a state at least but half alive; to all the rest of the world it is silent. Ysaye plays it on his violin, and the thing begins to breathe, has found a voice perhaps more exquisite than the sound which Bach heard in his brain when he wrote down the notes.

And the conclusion drawn is that "the man who writes music is no more truly an artist than the man who plays that music," and, one may infer, that Shakespeare is no more an artist than Mr. Forbes Robertson, which, with all respect to the most poetic and most gifted actor on the English stage, is something perilously like the reduction of Mr. Symons's argument to an utter absurdity.

Putting on one side the question as it affects music, it would appear either that the author has not read Lamb's remarks on "King Lear," or else that he has forgotten them. For, it will be remembered, the whole point of Lamb's essay is that Shakespeare in excelsis cannot be acted at all. "The contemptible machinery by which they mimic the storm that he (Lear) goes out in, is not more inadequate to represent the horrors of the real elements, than any actor can be to represent Lear. . . . What have looks, or tones, to do with that sublime identification of his age with that of the heavens themselves, when in his reproaches to them for conniving at the injustice of his children, he reminds them that 'they themselves are old'? What gestures shall we appropriate to this? What has the voice or the eye to do with such things?" So far, then, from the actor at his very best being co-equal with the creator, he is something perilously near an impertinence and a traducer; his gestures, his tones, his uplifted eyebrows, his contracted and grinning jaws, are but the property-man's red fire and a thunderstorm on an iron sheet. And it may be that it was the recognition of this aesthetic principle which made the Greeks hide the face of the actor behind a mask, and hide his personality as displayed in tone behind a rigid and appointed chant. Not very long ago there was a certain method of reading the English Church service which was called "impressive"; the prayers, versicles, and responses were, in fact, "acted." This method has been generally condemned as ridiculous, and indeed offensive; and it may be that the day will come when "King Lear" will be presented rather as a great Rite than as a play.

This heresy of the equality of interpreter with creator apart, Mr. Symons's book resolves itself in the main into an indictment of English plays, English players, and English audiences; and one must needs confess that there is a great deal to be said for the writer's pessimistic outlook. That is, be it understood, if we are to take even moderately high ground with respect to the drama; if we are to assume towards the plays which we can pay to see to-night anything like the attitude which we assume towards Sophocles, and Shakespeare, and Molière, and Sheridan. If not, cadit questio, there is nothing to write about, nothing to advance, and nothing to oppose. If the comedies and tragedies which are being exhibited this evening have only the name in common with the masterpieces of other days, then it would be idle and impertinent, indeed, to institute comparisons, and apply rules, and quote Aristotle. We should be like Mr. Curdle in "Nicholas Nickleby," who inquired whether Nicholas had "preserved the anities"—in a piece hastily botched and cobbled from the French, with due regard to Mr. Crummles's newly acquired properties, the Pump and Tubs. But if, with Mr. Symons, we are to talk of our plays in something of the same spirit in which we talk of our poetry, then it is to be feared that his judgments are not too severe:—

"Our cleverest playwrights, apart from Mr. Shaw, are what we might call practitioners. There is Mr. Pinero, Mr. Jones, Mr. Grundy: what names are better known, or less to be associated with literature? There is Anthony Hope, who can write, and Mr. Barrie, who has something both human and humorous. There are many more names, if I could remember them; but where is the serious playwright? Who is there that can be compared with our poets or our novelists, not only with a Swinburne or a Meredith, but in a younger generation, with a Bridges or a Conrad?"

And yet, as Mr. Symons notes, "the ingredients are unchanging since 'Prometheus'; no human agony has ever grown old or lost its pity and terror." What, then, is the reason for the decadence of the drama; why is it that, with the rarest exceptions, the popular play by "the leading dramatist," once its run is over, ceases to be and is seen no more? Why is it that Pinero and Jones and Grundy—to adopt Mr. Symons's examples—are not and will not be classics of English literature? Why is "Judah" more obsolete by far than "Punch and Judy"; why would a manager as soon revive "Ralph Roister Doister" as "The Squire"?

The question is a complicated one; it cannot be answered off-hand; since the influences which make against Tragedy are many and obscure and subtle. But it may be remarked, in parenthesis, that the writer once had the privilege of witnessing a tragedy which was comparable to the great works of the old time. It was called "Ghosts"; and it had to be seen, if one remembers rightly, in some kind of secret chamber in Kensington, by favor of cards of invitation! And in the manner in which this great drama was presented, it is possible to trace one at least of the causes which make Tragedy an impossible, or, at least, an unlikely growth of English literature. Given a censorship which is the laughing-stock of educated people all over the world, it is hardly to be expected that the great drama will flourish. It would be as reasonable to anticipate a fine crop of water-lilies in the centre of a barrack-yard.

Then there is another deterrent cause, and a much more serious one. We may abolish the censorship; but can we give our audiences new hearts, new minds, new souls? To the playwright the audience is as an atmosphere; he must accommodate himself to the air which he breathes. In old Greece there may have been many men who, by some odd anticipation of fate, were in reality authors of musical comedy, who felt all their days, perhaps, a strange stirring, an ineffable longing, to write dramas called "In Gay Ionia," "The Merry Maids of Miletus," and "Olympus Up-too-late." And we know that they could never write these plays; that the time was not yet come for Imbecility Complete and Unabashed. Musical comedy was not in the air of Greece; and it may be doubted whether Tragedy is in the air of England to-day. Mr. Symons tells a story of a Swedish poet who went the round of the London theatres. He was surprised to find that "The greater part of the pieces which were played at the principal London theatres were such pieces as would be played in Norway and Sweden at the lower-class theatres, and that nobody here seemed to mind. The English audience, he said, reminded him of a lot of children . . . of criticism, preference, selection, not a trace."

Exactly; and it is hardly reasonable to expect the nursery to blossom out into drama which sounds the depths and terrors and glooms of the human heart; which surges up to that high white heaven to which the soul may, if it will, aspire. Sophocles and Shakespeare wrote for men and not for Tiny Tots. As the atmosphere and the soil, so the vegetation: one must not hope to see the pineapple acclimated on the slopes of Ben Nevis.

Then—to put the same point in a new way—it is doubtful whether audiences or authors understand what tragedy and comedy are; whether they apprehend in their essence these two forms of dramatic art. There is the tale of the old lady who, witnessing the "Screen Scene" in "The School for Scandal," was heard to murmur to her friend in a voice choked with emotion: "Oh, pore dear. I 'ope she won't yield to him"—"him" being, of course, Joseph. And such in sober earnest is the fashion in which Sheridan's masterpiece is now played and witnessed. The decadence was in full progress in the lifetime of Charles Lamb, eighty years ago. Comparing the revivals of the 'twenties with the performance of the original cast, he notes that the whole comic spirit had evaporated; the audience saw the piece unfold in a serious and sentimental vein, and when the screen went down, there was no longer heard that roar of laughter that gladdened the production of the play in the eighteenth century. And if the harlequinade were not dead—or well-nigh dead—we should doubtless wipe our eyes furtively and whisper in a husky voice, "poor man," as the Policeman fell sprawling on the buttered slide contrived by the Clown. So, if the plot of "The School for Scandal" could have occurred as a new thing to one of our "leading dramatists" of the present time, then we may be quite sure that the intrigue of the play would have been treated in the most serious spirit. Sir Peter's life with Lady Teazle would have become a terrible tragedy; Joseph would have based his temptations on the "New Ethics"; Charles Surface would have insisted on a man's right to realise himself by owing money to his tailor and drinking a great deal of Burgundy; and in all probability Lady Teazle would have taken poison in the last act. That is to say, a topic essentially comic would have been distorted into a tragic setting; the play would have run five hundred nights, and in five years' time would have passed into sheer nothingness. There were endless possibilities of comedy in the story of Paula Tanqueray.

* "Plays, Acting, and Music: A Book of Theory." By Arthur Symons. Constable. 6s. net.

Yet one may reflect with gratitude that even now there are two theatres in London to which the most critical may resort with whole-hearted enjoyment. At the St. James's one may see "The Importance of Being Earnest," a farce which is yet much more than a farce, which is, perhaps, a new genre in the drama, a gossamer web of queer and fantastic humors, a delicate masterpiece of the incongruous. And then, if one is for more valiant fare, the true spirit of burlesque presides at the Apollo. You have here no vein of "Musical Comedy," which is for the most part a mere gibbering in gay colors; but the broadly, bravely, irresistibly ridiculous, the very medicine for gloom and care. And it is probably on the line of farce, of broad farce and fantastic farce, that the modern English dramatist would find salvation and success.

NAPOLEON AND THE BOURBONS.*

To turn from the romance of Napoleon's career to the prose of the Restoration is like leaving the mountain side for the marsh. The one is instinct with grandeur, albeit of a somewhat terrifying type; the other belongs to low levels which seemed to have vanished for ever. The personality of the Emperor is enthralling, so much so that even to-day it dulls the reasoning powers in weak-minded adorers: that of Louis XVIII. has a soporific effect. The sharp ring of the letters of the born leader braces the thoughts: the self-centred moralisings and perpetual recurring to the subject of gout, on the part of the hereditary monarch, mark a drop to the commonplace.

The narrative of M. Stenger, which now appears in English, is confessedly that of an admirer of Napoleon. Quite early in the narrative we find the well-known signs. England is "that insatiable and treacherous nation," which cannot forgive France for being ruled by a genius, but must needs pick a quarrel with her and him, and also set all the other nations at him. Finally, la perfide Albion compasses her ends, after deluging the Continent with blood, and manages to impose on France the impotent Bourbon, whose exile she had so long sheltered. Such is the theme, written with a fine disregard of diplomatic history, and a pathetic belief in the trustworthiness of French Memoirs, even those emanating from St. Helena. Here and there, it is true, M. Stenger admits that the Emperor was fallible: that at the Congress of Châtillon in February, 1814, he was only seeking to trick the Allies in order to gain time. But these admissions are as rare as they are reluctant and slight. In the main, the moral is ardently Bonapartist and bitterly Anglophobe. The author does not seem to understand that, even in the eyes of the French people, Napoleon's rule had become an impossibility by the spring of 1814. For him the critics of the imperial régime, such as Lainé, the outspoken barrister of Bordeaux, were mere traitors, bent on paralysing the national defence. He praises Napoleon's magnanimity for not arresting, or shooting, that courageous Deputy; but he does not see that the Emperor would have done so had not Lainé then been voicing the national sentiment. Certainly by the time the Allies were in Paris, the majority of Frenchmen had come to see that the rule of Napoleon meant perpetual war; and they were ready for any change which would give them peace. This was the reason why Louis XVIII. returned; not because the Allies, or de Vitrolles, or Talleyrand intrigued successfully, but because that solution of the difficulty offered the best guarantee that France would gain peace and escape partition by the Allies. These were the essential needs of the situation; and because Louis XVIII., unsatisfactory as he was in all other respects, satisfied these needs, he became King of France. It is astonishing that M. Stenger, who is not wholly without those French characteristics, clearness of insight and lucidity of statement, should range at large over the history of the period, and yet not comprehend this all-important fact.

M. Stenger's narrative is largely concerned with the details of the life of Louis XVIII. and of his numerous relatives, during the time of exile. Certainly it was necessary to show him and his brother, the Comte d'Artois, in their historical setting during the years 1790-1814; and the story is in parts interesting, but only in so far as it brings out the characteristics of these princes and enforces the strange contrast between the pretensions of the mimic Courts at Mittau, Holyrood, or Hartwell, and the brilliant future opened out by the political blunders of Napoleon. The earlier part of the narrative is overburdened with details concerning the advisers or satellites of the princes and their cousins, the Condés. Here and there, e.g., in the miserable Quiberon affair of 1795, we discern important traits of character, such as the absolute pusillanimity of the Comte d'Artois, and the selfish seclusion of the King, while the brave Bretons were staking their all for the throne and altar. We may note in passing that the reference to the Quiberon expedition is very loose and confused. Some of the descriptions of Louis XVIII.'s journeys in England (e.g., that to Warwick) are of some interest. That prince was certainly a cold and somewhat self-centred personage, but M. Stenger exaggerates this defect. After all, did not the prince, when he had an income of barely 600,000 francs, give away more than half to his nephew, or to the needy émigrés? That is not the act of an inveterate egotist. His coldness also probably sprang from belief in his divine right, which the world so long scoffed at or ignored.

M. Stenger paints a moving picture of the miseries of France during the invasion of the Allies in 1814, and rightly condemns the conduct of many of Napoleon's relatives and dependents in shamelessly abandoning him. The aim of the writer obviously is to discredit the Bourbons by associating them with that misery and that meanness. But readers who are endowed with a better sense of causation than M. Stenger, will see through this device, and will refer the woes and degradation of Frenchmen to their real author, Napoleon. M. Stenger has a curious penchant for Marmont, whose conduct in leading his corps over to the enemy was surely far less justifiable than that of Talleyrand, who labored might and main to found a constitutional monarchy. The duty of a soldier is to fight for his sovereign; that of a statesman, unjustly disgraced by that sovereign, is to provide for the safety of his country; and there is much to show that Talleyrand's policy, but for the obstinacy of Louis XVIII., would have met the needs of France, and brought about a lasting settlement. Such was the opinion of the late Lord Acton, whose cool and unbiassed judgment stands in marked contrast to the heated and warped opinions here given to the world. M. Stenger's account of the First Restoration would have been more convincing if he had printed documents so important as Louis XVIII.'s Declaration of St. Ouen, and the Charter or Constitution of 1814, which are far more necessary than the long extracts from French memoirs with which the author burdens his notes. As regards the terms of peace of 1814, he tries, on page 207, to convey the impression that England exacted the utmost possible from France; and in order to do this, he omits all mention of the numerous French colonies which England did restore. A worse case of suppressio veri it is hard to conceive.

* "The Return of Louis XVIII." From the French of Gilbert Stenger by Mrs. Rodolph Stawell. Heinemann. 18s.

"The Bourbon Restoration." By Major John R. Hall. Alston Rivers. 21s.

After this, it is not surprising to find the second Restoration treated as a piece of selfish statecraft on the part of Wellington. We are first informed that Pitt had declared that the war must be perpetual, a ridiculous assertion contradicted by his speeches, and still more by his sincere efforts for peace in 1796-1797. After this exordium, M. Stenger states (on p. 373) that Wellington, on whose advice Louis XVIII. entered France very soon after Waterloo, was of an egotistical and ungenerous nature. The inference is that it was for purely selfish and insular motives that Wellington helped to force back Louis XVIII. on France. M. Stenger must know that Wellington had taken a prominent part at the Congress of Vienna in seeking to reinstate France in her rightful position in Europe and had stoutly opposed the efforts of the Prussian statesmen to partition her. Candor ought to have compelled the author to admit that Wellington desired the speedy return of Louis XVIII. in order to prevent the projects of partition which were now far more dangerous than in 1814. Wellington's advice as to the dismissal of Blacas and the appointment of Fouché testifies to the sincerity of his desire to promote a settlement satisfactory to all moderate men in France.

It is a relief to turn from M. Stenger's acrid and often untrustworthy narrative to that of Major Hall, which is such as to inspire confidence. He quotes his authorities for every important statement, and his handling of facts is that of a judge, not of a partisan. It seems to be impossible for a Frenchman to treat the events of that time with impartiality; but Major Hall possesses the detachment of view and evenness of temper which are essential. Some readers will perhaps find his measured description less attractive than that of M. Stenger. In the matter of arrangement it is sometimes defective. Thus, after plunging into an account of the events that led up to Napoleon's abdication in 1814, he harks back abruptly to the earlier events attending the "emigrations" of 1789 and succeeding years. His character sketches are also slighter than those of M. Stenger, but this results from the width of the field which he traverses. Above all, students will find in his notes the means of correcting his statements, and opportunities for further reading. His narrative is somewhat closely packed; but it is clear and businesslike, though rarely forcible or picturesque. One misses in his pages such happy characterisations as that of the Comte d'Artois by Sorel—"He had all the qualities required for gaily losing a battle or for gracefully ruining a dynasty." Major Hall, however, quotes bons mots galore, e.g., the reply of Louis XVIII. to Marmont's warning of the plot of November, 1814, and his request that the sovereign would not go to the theatre. "Not so," (replied the King) "it will be your business to protect me, my dear Marshal, while I go to the play to amuse myself." The plot designed by Fouché, Exelmans, and others, which so nearly coincided with Napoleon's return from Elba, is carefully described, along with other little known events of this interesting time. Major Hall exercises a severe self-restraint in not describing Waterloo. One or two of his references to the battle are a trifle incorrect. It was not the Prussian cavalry that pursued the French columns beaten back from Mt. St. Jean, but the brigades of Vivian and Vandeleur, to whose charge indeed Napoleon ascribed the final route. And Wellington cannot have uttered the words, "Oh that night or the Prussians would come" so late as 6 p.m.; for by then his allies had for more than an hour been assailing the French right. Probably the Duke never spoke the words.

Major Hall gives an impartial account of the Second Restoration, doing justice to the courage of Talleyrand in opposing the extreme royalist claims at Cambrai, especially his words "Truth compels me to say that Monsieur (the Comte d'Artois) has done a great deal of harm." The man who said that was a loyal son of France. Louis XVIII's prudence in virtually endorsing Talleyrand's words was equally noteworthy. We have no space in which to follow Major Hall in his scholarly review of the years that follow. Very interesting is his account of the secret societies in France. Clearly, too, he brings out the follies of the Comte d'Artois when he became King in 1824. Specially noteworthy at the present time are the chapters, "Sowing the Wind" and "Reaping the Whirlwind." There can be little doubt that, had Charles X. loyally observed the Charter of 1814, and closed his ears to the advice of the Jesuits, he would have remained on the throne. Never was a Revolution so entirely attributable to the madness of a ruler, and of a few reactionaries, as that of July, 1830. We could wish to have a fuller account, reinforced by extracts from the British archives, of the diplomatic schemes whereby the Polignac Ministry hoped to distract the attention of the public from its obscurantist policy at home; for they are no less interesting than important. But Major Hall, though bringing to light no new materials, has made a careful use of those already available, and has produced what is perhaps the most compact and unbiassed narrative of the years 1814-1830.

DR. RASHDALL'S RELIGIOUS PHILOSOPHY.*

THIS is an exceptionally full and an exceptionally suggestive book. The author is a thinker, not a populariser of the results of other people's thinking, and his lectures are too compressed to be easy reading; in their small compass there is, perhaps, not a superfluous word. They are addressed to students; but they do not pre-suppose expert knowledge; and the man of general culture, who is prepared to take these inquiries seriously, will find himself in Dr. Rashdall's pages; by the half-educated and the smatterer such inquiries are best let alone.

"It is a good thing to have read Hegel," said Jowett to a pupil who had thrown himself into the study of that philosopher; "but now you must go and forget all about him." His meaning was probably that of Wordsworth's "close up those barren leaves." There is a point of view, and it is one to which men of Jowett's practical temperament are attracted, for which no metaphysical formula is more than a way—one of many possible ways—of putting things. And the thing is more than the formula; the one persists, the other passes away. The Hegelian dialectic had a cramping effect on not a few minds; its author himself, it is said, was unwilling to admit scientific knowledge which ran, or seemed to run, counter to it; and the positive, or positivist, reaction was a protest against the accentuation of formula at the expense of fact. There are signs that this reaction has spent itself; and that speculation is coming back. It is a return to its own. In vain would knowledge escape from its shadow. Whether he will or no, man is a metaphysician: the simplest statement of fact implies a philosophy, however unconsciously held.

The book opens with an exposition of the Idealist doctrine which, for vigor and clearness, recalls Professor Ferrier's "Institutes of Metaphysic." This position is the Pons Asinorum of speculation. A man must think himself into it, and for this a certain effort of reflection is required; sense, language, association, look the other way. But, once he has done so, it becomes self-evident: "So far from matter being the only existence, it has no existence of its own apart from some mind which knows it—in which and for which it exists." This is not Theism; but it is halfway to it, and the half is one which is more than the whole. It was the sense that this was so that led born sceptics like Pattison to distrust what they called the Neo-Kantian school. With regard, however, to the Theistic inference, the writer has a second string to his bow:—

"I should be sorry to have to admit that a man cannot be a Theist, or that he cannot be a Theist on reasonable grounds, without first being an Idealist. From my own point of view, most of the other reasons for believing in the existence of God resolve themselves into idealistic arguments imperfectly thought out. But they may be very good arguments as far as they go, even when they are not thought out to what seem to me their logical consequences."

Such an argument is that which infers that God is Will from the analogy of our own consciousness. It has been employed by Realists like Reid and Martineau, as well as by Idealists like Berkeley and Lotze. Yet though it does not necessarily presuppose Idealism it does "fit in infinitely better with the idealistic mode of thought than with the realistic." The former is the key in which Theism is set: and, it may be added, the main current of thinking has moved from the first in this direction. The instinctive cry of the philosopher is, Back to the Idea.

* "Philosophy and Religion." By Hastings Rashdall, D.C.L. Duckworth. 2s. 6d.

Dr. Rashdall's doctrine of Personality is substantially that of Lotze, to whose "Logic" and "Microcosmus" he refers the reader. For him the notion is positive: it stands for "the highest kind of existence known to us, not for the limitations and restraints which characterise human conscious life as we know it in ourselves." The philosopher is apt to look askance at the term Person as applied to the Deity because, as with such notions as Substance, Nature, Law, &c., popular religion is apt to bring in under its cover more than is contained in it or than can be admitted in the connection. Therefore—

"if anyone prefers to speak of God as 'super-personal,' there is no great objection to so doing, provided that phrase is not made (as it often is) an excuse for really thinking of God after the analogy of some kind of existence lower than that of persons—as a force, an unconscious substance, or merely a name for the totality of things. But, for myself, I prefer to say that our own self-consciousness gives us only an ideal of the highest type of existence which it nevertheless very imperfectly satisfies, and, therefore, I would rather think of God as a Person in a far truer, higher, more complete sense than that in which any human being can ever be a person."

Dealing with the problem of evil, the writer falls back on the presumable limitations of things. The notions of Infinitude and Omnipotence require interpretation. "The popular idea of Omnipotence is one which really does not bear looking into. . . . The only sense which we can intelligibly give to the idea of a divine Omnipotence is this—that God possesses all the power there is, that He can do all things that are in their own nature possible." This view, which is that of Aquinas, was brought out with effect by the late Professor Mivart. It does not, perhaps, wholly escape the danger of arguing from the physical to the moral sphere. The latter is not, indeed, one in which anything can develop out of anything, and law has ceased to reign. But "with God all things are possible"; the possibilities of the lower are transcended in the higher province. And the "greatest wave," Dr. Rashdall admits, of the theistic controversy, is the chance that a limited God may be defeated in the long run. The fundamental proof of the ultimate optimism essential to life is that its denial involves the final defeat of the Uncreated by the created will.

The ethical argument for immortality is emphasised. In spite of the writer's reasonings to the contrary, it seems to us that its bearing on pre-existence is not easily got over. The note on p. 124, though weighty, is not convincing. Neither the correspondence of a certain type of body with a certain kind of soul, nor the resemblance between the individual and his parents, is persistent: the exceptions to each rule are so numerous that neither can be taken as more than approximately valid. Dr. McTaggart's speculations on this question are well known; and though he bases a non-theistic Idealism upon them, there is no necessary connection between the two. The criticism of Ritschlianism is acute. "The Ritschlian dislikes Dogma, not because it may be at times a misdevelopment, but because it is a development; not because some of it may be antiquated Philosophy, but simply because it is Philosophy." He is wrong: only—

"if we are to justify the development of the past, we must go on to assert the same right and duty of development in Ethics and in Theology for the Church of the future. In the pregnant phrase of Loisy, the development which the Church is most in need of at the present moment is precisely a development in the idea of development itself."

The last lecture brings out strikingly the divergence between the popular and the scientific theology of the Trinity. What the Greeks called Hypostasis "does not, and never did, mean what we commonly understand by Personality—whether in the language of ordinary life or of modern Philosophy. The great objection to the Creed (the Athanasian), apart from the damnatory clauses, is the certainty that it will be misunderstood by most of those who think they understand it at all." And this objection, it may be held, is the more serious of the two.

MENANDER.*

It is not altogether creditable to English scholarship that we have had to wait so long for an edition of the recently discovered fragments of Menander in our own tongue; and that which is here offered to us, though it may be the means of introducing the poet to a public wider than that of specialists, cannot (as "Unus Multorum" would be the first to admit) claim to provide the apparatus which the scholar needs in order to grapple with the difficulties presented by the reconstruction of the text. "Unus Multorum" is evidently an enthusiastic student of the classics, and on the basis of Lefebvre's original version and Van Leeuwen's improved text he has put together a provisional edition of the Cairo fragments, accompanied by an unpretending but quite readable translation. Unfortunately, he has not refrained from introducing drastic emendations of the MS. text, and, both in these and in the restorations of missing words which he proposes, he shows himself inadequately equipped as a textual critic. It would possibly be unfair to judge him by the standard of the line (professedly an iambic trimeter!)

ὁδόν· ἐγὼ δὲ πάντα δουλεύσομαι χρόνον which he writes (without a word of explanation) for ὁδόν· ἀλλ' ἐγὼ τὸν πάντα δουλεύσω χρόνον.

But a fair specimen of his performance is to be found a few lines further back, where the papyrus has τογαστικὸν τὸ γύναιον ὡς ἐρπεθ' ὅτι κατὰ τὸν ἔρωτ' οὐκ ἔστ' ἐλευθερίας τυχεῖν.

The first line has exercised the critics, whose emendations are various and not always happy: but it is fairly clear that ἀστικόν is contained in the first group of letters and that ἐρπεθ' conceals a verb. "Unus Multorum" would read Τεγεατικόν, which in itself is ingenious—the ladies of Tegea enjoyed a reputation for easy virtue—and would close the line with the words ἐρπετὰ λαβεῖν, reading τυχόν at the end of the second, with the comment, "The corruption of τυχόν to τυχεῖν caused λαβεῖν to disappear and confound everything." The effect of the assumed initial corruption is, to say the least, incommensurate with the cause, and the translation, "It is with liberty as with love, you cannot, it seems, lay hold of it as you would of creatures that walk on the earth," does not commend itself.

"Unus Multorum," as has been said, makes Van Leeuwen's edition—his first edition—the basis of his own reconstruction. He does not therefore take account of much that has been written in learned periodicals on the text of the Cairo fragments. Professor Carl Robert's useful edition incorporates many, though not all, of the results of criticism, and may be commended to the attention of "Unus Multorum" when he finds it necessary to revise his text. But we are as yet far from finality in dealing with the intricate problems of reconstruction, and much may be hoped from further discovery, as well as from the patient study of extant fragments of Menander. Professor Capps, in a brilliant article in the "American Journal of Philology," which perhaps appeared too late for the use of "Unus Multorum," has recognised in a fragment included by Kock among the "Adespota" (Comicum Atticorum Fragmenta III., p. 421) a scrap of the Epitrepontes of Menander, written on the back of a strip of parchment which contains a few lines already assigned by Van Leeuwen to this play. The result is to throw a welcome light upon the scenery and plot, which makes it unnecessary here to discuss the views put forward by "Unus Multorum."

The above example will suffice to show that this, the first English edition of the fragments, requires to be used with caution; it will, we hope, soon give place to a more adequate commentary. In the meantime, the labor of "Unus Multorum" will not have been wasted if it has furthered the study of the great master of the ancient comedy of manners. In Germany scenes from these plays have already been put on the stage with no small success; why can not we do the same in England?

In the Preface we read that "the outward appearance of Menander has long been familiar to us from the admirable statue in the Vatican." Alas! this is a legend which scientific iconography has long since destroyed. But "Unus Mul-torum" has not far to go for the true portrait. There is an example in the University Galleries at Oxford.

* "The Lately Discovered Fragments of Menander." Edited with English version, revised text, and critical and explanatory notes, by "Unus Multorum." Oxford: Parker.

THE CAPTAIN OF KENT.*

THIS heading has nothing to do with a cricket eleven. It was the title given by his followers to one of the many fine rebels in our rough island's story. A fine rebel, we say, though he has been waiting four and a half centuries for his vindication, and throughout that time his name has been the common byword of abuse for every reformer who brought forward any proposal for the advantage of the poor. Why Jack Cade should have been chosen as the type of revolutionary demagogue we cannot say. Perhaps it was the Shakespearean tradition; certainly, the man did not go nearly so far in revolution or communism as Wat Tyler and his fellows seventy years before him, though in many points the movements were similar. But hitherto anyone who, like the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, has been compared to Jack Cade, may have felt a certain irritation at the comparison; after reading Mr. Clayton's book he will know it is an honor.

There has always been some mystery about the rebel. His very name is uncertain, and to his contemporaries he was generally known as Mortimer. He may have belonged to that semi-royal house, and certainly he was a man of property and position in Kent, though he appears to have been born in Ireland. As to his character, we read that:—

"Throughout the county (Kent) and in the neighboring counties of Surrey and Sussex the captain was known and trusted as an honest and brave man, a man of daring and resource, shrewd, alert, and withal a man of good appearance and upright character."

From his management of his undisciplined army (which amounted to the large force of 46,000 men) he was evidently a born officer, and from his conduct of affairs and the terms of his petition for redress of grievances he seems to have possessed the makings of a statesman. For about three days he was master of London; the feeble king had withdrawn almost without a blow to Kenilworth; two or three of his most unpopular Ministers were executed; and the citizens rejoiced in the restoration of their liberties. But in an evil hour the leader of revolt exacted money from a wealthy merchant of the town, and though the citizens rejoiced in liberty, they were as unwilling to pay for it as they sometimes have been since. A Sunday intervened, and when on the next day the Captain of Kent was entering the City again from Southwark, he found the road defended. In the battle of London Bridge his followers were continually repulsed. The Archbishops took upon them the holy work of conciliation, and secured a peace with holy promises that were never kept. Cade's army melted away; he made a vain attempt on Queenborough, and then sought cover in the Sussex weald, where he was killed. His quarters, with his head among them, were dragged through London, and despatched to decorate various cities. It is consoling to find that the sheriffs demanded extra payment for this part of their business owing to Cade's popularity: "because that hardly any persons durst nor would take upon them the carriage (to wit, of the aforesaid quarters) for doubt of their lives."

So perished another leader of revolt, undoubtedly a man of high worth and one of those patriot martyrs to whom our present liberties are due. "The Bill of Complaints and Requests of the Commons of Kent," which represents the motives of his rising, is an instructive document upon the social and political conditions of the time. The story of the whole movement, which Mr. Clayton has told with admirable judgment and knowledge, affords a brief glimpse into the state of our country when her fortunes were almost at their lowest. In the middle of the fifteenth century there is, at first sight, little that is attractive. It appears to be a time of mere dynastic quarrels, party distraction, and national degradation. Yet, if we look deeper, it is found to possess the fascination of all periods of rapid and violent transition. A century from Cade's death brings us to the fourth year of Edward VI., and how vast a change has been accomplished! Though the actual condition of working people was certainly no better, the sixteenth century comes like the appearance of day, and yet there is often a more subtle beauty in the first glimmers of light a few hours before the dawn.

PSYCHOLOGY AND ADVENTURE.*

ONE is glad that there was the excellent Victoria at hand to smash and pulverise the social theories of David, the "hero" of "The Gateway." This is the gospel of David:

"I think that law should be inexorable, and that the law should rest on science. . . . I really do not think that charity does the slightest good in the case of the bad. I think it does distinct harm; it comes between the law-breaker and the punishment of the broken law, which is nature's method."

And we could not have a better expression of the doctrines of the scientific prig, an even more deadly species than the religious prig, or the scholastic prig. Mr. Begbie is wise enough and artistic enough not to parody the doctrines of the enemy, but simply to express them in their own true and naked absurdity. It is as if one should protest against the calling in of the doctor in a violent case of malaria, because a "burning quotidian tertian" is "scientific," and because mosquitoes are nature's method! "The Gateway" is an eminently interesting book. One does not read it for its plot, though the story is sufficiently well done; but the fact is that there is a debate on every page; now on church vestments, now on the education of children, now on the duties of the rich, now on the case of Elijah versus Jezebel. The character of the old Welsh schoolmaster, Rhys Jenkins, prophet and transcendentalist and devotee of whiskey, is both charming and convincing. Here, for example, is Jenkins on the "great controversy of Carmel."

"The prophets of Baal stood for art and beauty, it is quite true, but they also stood for evil of the most frightful kind. . . . Whatever you may think of Elijah and Jezebel, he stood for righteousness, and she for iniquity. Elijah was the masculine element which is essential to goodness; Jezebel was the feminine element which exists in all evil."

"A Crucial Experiment" is a book which one would like to recommend to the young person who is thinking of commencing novelist. This is the first sentence:—

"The little town of Coltsford, in the county of Hampshire, had never been particularly famed for its cultivation of the fine arts. It is true that among its more refined families were several young ladies who painted flowers upon mirrors and handscreens, and that during the winter months it occasionally committed itself to an evening concert or two in aid of church funds."

In a sense nothing could be much "tamer" than this, and yet how absolutely it fulfils the counsel of Edgar Allan Poe—that in the opening phrases of a story there should always be something to "ring up" the attention of the reader. And it may be said at once that the hope of the first page is not falsified: here is a singularly attractive and well-written tale of a musician who marries the oppressed, puritan-ridden daughter of Coltsford, in order that she may develop her wonderful musical talents. The marriage, it is agreed, is to be a mere form, the only possible method of releasing Gabriel Arden from the tyranny of her music-hating father. It is at this point that the reader longs to interfere, to play the part of the enthusiastic gallery-men at transpontine melodrama, to warn the hero of the extreme folly of the course that he is pursuing. Greville, the musician, is foolish enough to keep to the extremest letter of the foolish compact that he has made, to treat the remarks of the ignorant and unawakened Gabriel Arden seriously; and so the book ends, inevitably, on a sorrowful, if not a tragic, note. But the serious and capable workmanship deserves all praise.

* "The Gateway." By Harold Begbie. Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.

"A Crucial Experiment." By A. C. Farquharson. Edward Arnold. 6s.

"My Lady of the South." By Randall Parrish. Illustrated. Putnam. 6s.

"Suse o' Bushy." By W. A. Allan. Arrowsmith. 6s.

"Litany Lane." By Margaret Baillie Saunders. Hutchinson. 6s.

"The Wine in the Cup." By Eleanor Wyndham. Werner Laurie. 6s.

"For Charles the Rover." By May Wynne. Second Edition. Greening. 6s.

* "The True Story of Jack Cade." By Joseph Clayton. Frank Palmer. 2s. 6d.

The civil war of the North and South has formed the theme of some remarkable literature. It is the chief topic of Mr. Ambrose Bierce's wonderful collection of short stories, called "In the Midst of Life"; and now it furnishes the motive for Mr. Parrish's capital tale, "My Lady of the South." Here again is a book well done, though as different as possible from "A Crucial Experiment." It begins with the very flame and fury and turmoil of the battle, with the guns charging to the front of the position; and before many pages are read one is deep in the intrigue of the story; in subterfuge, in disguise, in escape, in peril, and in mystery. There is a marriage in darkness—"cause de Yankees done took all de oil, and we ain't got no more to burn"—and it is not till the very last sentence of the book, that the heroine, Jean, confirms the sacrament which had united her to a man whom she had never seen before. The whole story turns upon a Southern "feud"—upon the relentless war waged by one family upon another—and it may be noted that the author could appeal to the newspaper of a week or so ago to prove that he has not overstated the virulence of these vendettas.

"Suse o' Bushy" is a west-country book. It deals with Exmoor, with the county of "Lorna Doone"; it is a powerful story of rustic love and rustic tragedy and final happiness. The village witch counts for a good deal in the development of the plot, and Mr. Allan's witch is a more serious character than Mr. Blackmore's "Mother Meldrum"—who was only a sagacious old woman in love with solitude. But Martha Trollop is more akin to the terrific hag who haunted the earlier novels of Mr. Blyth; and—it may be added—to the veritable sorceress of the English countryside. Mr. Balfour, it may be remembered, in one of his philosophic works, treats the question of witchcraft—its existence or non-existence—as an example of those problems which have been settled rather by fashion than logic; and this one thing is certain: that, whether the power of inflicting evil by the exercise of the will has existed or no, there are and have been many persons who believe that they possess this power, who are witches in intention if not in fact. And within the last twenty years a learned west-countryman wrote a book on the Evil Eye, and was able to illustrate some of the most ancient and hideous recipes of black magic with accounts of apparatus discovered, in the 'nineties of the last century, in the chimney corners of Somersetshire cottages.

One of the great misfortunes of language in recent years is in the loose employment of the terms "Realism" and "Realistic." For some odd reason—which, to the present writer, has always been obscure and undiscoverable—the inditer of things more or less unpleasant has come to be styled a "Realist." Of these, Zola has long been acclaimed chief; in spite of Addington Symonds's brilliant and veracious essay demonstrating the absolutely romantic basis of "La Bête Humaine." It seems hopeless to attempt to re-define these terms; even Symonds did not perceive that the Romantics are the only true Realists; but the author of "Litany Lane" need not, under any circumstances, or under any definition, fear the imputation of Realism. It is not realism to believe that a Cordwainer was a fashioner of cords; it is not realism to state that the making of a decree nisi absolute is anything more than a legal formula, unattended by scandal or discussion of any kind; it is not realism to represent the innocent party in such proceedings as a woman shunned and inevitably exposed to scandal and innuendo and contempt. And then, after the advanced "Anglo-Catholic" priest has firmly refused to remarry the divorced man, this divorced man weds a little guttersnipe at a registry office; and the priest, wholly forgetful of Anglo-Catholicism, compels the unfortunate girl to fulfil the vows which, from his position, he would have pronounced sinful and invalid!

This is wildness as regards facts; in "The Wine in the Cup," one gets the wildness of emotion and expression. Here is the language of the villain, disappointed in his designs on the heroine:—

"I'll wire to Zelig," he muttered, savagely, "she's a little devil—but she'll help me to forget. I'll wire to Zelig at once to join me in Paris." His face took a dark light, he saw before him the life he was going to lead, a life through dusky city streets redolent of women and wine, and the cheap applause of men. He felt the stifling heat of it in advance, and knew its acid taste.

It is a relief to turn from these lurid pages to the simple adventures of Irish Whigs and Jacobites in "For Charles the Rover." "Waverley" fixed the tradition that the Young Chevalier was a hero of romance, and Miss Wynne follows—longo intervallo—in the footsteps of Sir Walter, giving us O'Callaghans and O'Sullivans in place of Vich Ian Vohr.

TWO ILLUSTRATED POEMS.*

THOSE who have followed the career of Mr. Edmund Dulac since his first exhibition of water-color drawings at the Leicester Galleries will hail his illustrations to the Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyam as proof of a talent that has matured with surprising steadiness. Some, perhaps, will say that this set of drawings marks his final emancipation from the influence of Mr. Arthur Rackham. For our own part, we have believed from the first that the connection between Mr. Rackham and Mr. Dulac existed principally in the minds of critics at a loss for a plausible comparison, for there were many vital differences in technique and color between the two artists even at this early stage. However, it is enough that in the twenty illustrations that he supplies to the quatrains of Omar, Mr. Dulac's individuality establishes itself very completely, and his sense of decoration expresses itself even more emphatically than in his previous work. We miss a little of that sheer joyousness of tint that distinguished the drawings to Shakespeare's "Tempest," which he did rather more than a year ago; but if the exuberance of individual colors has given way to the harmony of all of them, it is only what one expects and hopes for in an artist's natural development. The clarity of his color remains unimpaired, and the surface quality of the drawings is again—they give the illusion of colored marble—a tribute to his technical proficiency. Whether he is altogether the best illustrator for the poetic philosophy of the Rubáiyát is another question, which we need not discuss.

Both the color plates in this book, and those which have been done for Kipling's "Song of the English" by Mr. W. Heath Robinson, are enclosed within colored borders of varying ornateness. In some instances the border helps the picture, as a frame would. But in others there is altogether too much border, and it cramps the effect even where, owing to a too greatly elaborated pattern, it does not spoil it entirely. It is partly on this account that Mr. Heath Robinson's pen and ink line drawings strike us as being a greater achievement than his color work, imaginative in conception and fine in color as much of the latter is. Nothing disturbs the simplicity of the black and white. The design, without any external embellishment, takes its chance on the white page. And what a lot the artist obtains by working this unsullied background into his design! It gives him light and air, spacious horizons, the immensity of sea and sky, the blaze of a sunset, the blankness of a sandy shore. Often it happens that three-quarters and more of the allotted space is without as much as a scratch, and if in some cases Mr. Robinson attracts us by the beauty of his decorative line and the eloquence of his pattern, his drawings are, in others, an object lesson in how to leave out, rather than what to put in. The color work is a little less uniform in excellence. Just as Mr. Kipling sometimes halts in his efforts to poetise imperially, so Mr. Robinson's illustrations do not always reach the height of lyrical fervor obtained by the one that goes to the lines:—

"He has smote for us a pathway
To the ends of all the earth," or by that which pictures "The Swinging, Smoking Seas," or that which embodies the solemn vision of "Follow After." The allegories of the world's great cities are more or less conventional. But those who know Mr. Robinson chiefly as a humorous artist for the illustrated Press, should see this book of drawings, if only that it will help them to appreciate the deeper qualities that underlie the most humorous things his versatile hand produces. One is very

* "The Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyam." With 20 illustrations in color by Edmund Dulac. Hodder & Stoughton. 15s. net.

"A Song of the English." By Rudyard Kipling. With 30 illustrations in color and many other designs by W. Heath Robinson. Hodder & Stoughton. 15s. net.

apt not to discover the art for the humor, and to believe that the faculty for perceiving the lighter side of life is incompatible with an appreciation of serious and even transcendental ideas, and their interpretation through an artistic imagination.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

"THE LITERARY PROFESSION IN THE ELIZABETHAN AGE" (Manchester University Press, 5s. net) is based in part upon a thesis presented by the author, Dr. Phœbe Sheavyn, to the University of London in support of her candidature for the degree of Doctor of Literature. As a study of the economics of the writer's trade during the reigns of Elizabeth and James I., the book has a distinct value, and it is obviously the fruit of careful research. The lot of the Elizabethan author, unless he could secure a generous patron, seems to have been hard. He was, says Dr. Sheavyn, in the economic position of an ordinary wage-earner, but he "offered for sale a commodity not too greatly in demand, and even, as was also to some extent the case with manual labor—artificially cheapened by legislation." It is not surprising, therefore, to find that, according to a list given at the end of the book, most authors of the period were drawn from the classes who could afford to do without adequate payment for their work. The usual price for a play was from £6 to £10, and even the industrious Ben Jonson did not get more than £50 a year out of his plays. In order to get modern values these sums should be multiplied by eight, but still Dr. Sheavyn does not exaggerate in describing the professional authors as "invariably poor, and this in a society tending more and more to measure men by financial standards." When an author secured a patron his case was better. The Earl of Southampton is said to have made Shakespeare a present of £1,000. This, however, was exceptional, and the more usual method of patronage was to recommend the author for a Court pension or other sinecure. A fulsome dedication was the usual bait offered to the patron, and Robert Greene, who had sixteen patrons for seventeen books, must have almost exhausted his "fawning eloquence" in the process. Dr. Sheavyn has a chapter on "Personal Relations Amongst Authors," from which we learn that literary squabbles had a great interest for the general public. The record of these quarrels makes dismal reading, for even when the ponderous jibes can be understood, they show, as a rule, more coarseness than wit. Dr. Sheavyn presents a dark picture of the Elizabethan professional author, "harassed, suspected, poverty-stricken," but she has done good service to literary history both by her choice of theme and the thoroughness with which she has treated it.

* * *

To Messrs. Black's color books has been added a volume on the "Isle of Man" (7s. 6d. net), written by Mr. W. Ralph Hall Caine, and illustrated by Mr. A. Heaton Cooper. In one respect Mr. Hall Caine's work is disappointing. While it tells us a deal about the geography and scenery of the Isle, traces such history as it possesses, and explains with vast elaboration the local marriage laws which are held to render a Married Woman's Property Act unnecessary, it does not reveal as much about the character of the Manx people as we feel we have a right to expect from one who has had such ample opportunities of studying them. True, he relates a delightful story of a lady who, asked for her impressions of the Manx, replied: "All the common people are ladies and gentlemen, and all the ladies and gentlemen are common people"; but this brilliancy might have been uttered with justice of so many parts of the British dominions that we feel it is inadequate as a keynote to the distinctive character of the Manx. Otherwise, the book is very readable, even if journalistic rather than literary in its tone and its effects; the high-water mark being reached, perhaps, in the tales from Manx folk-lore, which are told simply and yet with a certain distinction. Altogether too much space is given up to an account of the late Mr. Gladstone's visit in 1878, and to that of the King and Queen in 1902, the incidents connected with both being too trivial to excuse their recital at this late date. Mr. Cooper's water-color drawings deserve a paragraph to themselves, but we must content ourselves with saying that they visualise the beauties of Manx-land with immense charm of color and deftness of execution.

* * *

IN "By the Waters of Egypt" (Methuen, 16s. net) Miss Norma Lorimer presents the reader, in the form of a diary, with the impressions and reflections created in the mind of an observant tourist who has visited the show places in Egypt and also studied Dr. Budge, read Mr. Weigall's "Antiquities of Lower Nubia," and knows something of the theories of Professor Maspero. Miss Lorimer disclaims any scientific knowledge of Egyptian antiquities, and addresses her book to those who know no more about Egypt than she did at the beginning of her trip. Whether a book produced under these circumstances deserves to be published is open to question. So much has been written about Egypt by competent authorities, and the country is so well within the beaten track of tourists, that a mere travel book which treats of it is not likely to win many readers. Miss Lorimer's descriptions have, however, the merit of coming from a fresh and lively mind. We are sometimes bored by the intrusion of insignificant details and trite reflections, but the general impression is that of listening to a sharp-eyed traveller who has a good memory and who likes to chat about what she has seen. The book contains sixteen pictures in color by Mr. Benton Fletcher, and thirty-two other illustrations most of which are from photographs.

* * *

THE possession of plate was, as Mr. E. L. Lowes states in his "Chats on Old Silver" (Unwin, 5s. net), a passion with our ancestors. It was the mark of high respectability. Nowadays the family plate is neither so much seen nor so much thought of; its utility properties have been ousted by those of modern china; there prevails a habit of keeping it, or such part of it as has been handed down, at the banker's; and its display is mostly represented by something very modest like a silver tea service. But it was far otherwise when display was the spice of life, and a meal-time an opportunity for pomp and circumstance which no self-respecting citizen could neglect. The modern collector of old silver will find much to encourage and instruct him in Mr. Lowes's entertaining and omniscient volume. The writer begins by pointing out that old silver has this advantage over other curios, that the exercise of commonsense alone is sufficient to secure its proving a sound investment. The marks of every maker in England from the fifteenth century onwards can be seen at the various provincial Assay offices, so that there is comparatively small chance of the collector being deceived. Then silver is not perishable, as are prints, pictures, furniture, and other objects of vertu that the collector seeks for. The history of its manufacture is traced from the earliest times, special mention being made of the fine Greek and Etruscan work of 500-400 B.C., of the Irish work of the fifth to tenth centuries A.D., to which we owe the Ardagh Chalice in the Royal Irish Academy, and of the English plate produced from the tenth to the thirteenth century, especially that of the twelfth century. There is a short chapter devoted to Paul Lamoine, one of the French Protestants driven to this country by the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, who was to plate-making in eighteenth century England what Chippendale was to furniture. In conclusion, we are given an account of the Royal Plate at the Tower. As was the case with other arts, plate-making was confined to the monasteries until the thirteenth century, when the guilds sprang up throughout civilised Europe. The various styles correspond closely with those of architecture, and the different periods are designated by the same terms. Mr. Lowes's book is profusely illustrated, and its wide scope, embracing the new world as well as the old, renders it a peculiarly valuable handbook to the student of a vast and far from unromantic subject.

* * *

"LONDON IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY" (Black, 30s. net) is the concluding volume in the Survey of London through the centuries which Sir Walter Besant planned, but did not live to complete. It is divided into seven sections headed "History and Government," "Education and Entertainment," "Open Spaces," "Societies and Clubs," "Charitable Work," "General Improvements," and "Miscellaneous." Some of the chapters make excellent reading.

CHAIRMAN: To those qualities of fine flavour and aroma that one requires for real enjoyment in smoking it adds the unusual attribute of coolness.

Whether smoked much or little it is always cool, always pleasing and burns evenly to the last shred.

BOARDMAN'S is the same tobacco milder, and

RECORDER the same, but fuller flavoured.

6d. per oz. from all tobacconists.

R. J. LEA, MANCHESTER.

To the Directors of "The Daily News," Limited,
BOUVERIE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Gentlemen,—We have examined the books of "The Daily News" for the three months ended 31st December, 1909, and hereby certify that the circulation, exclusive of Complimentary Copies, Free Copies and Voucher Copies sent to Advertisers, was as follows:—

OCTOBER		NOVEMBER		DECEMBER.
1	255,506	1	265,665	1	$327,673
2	256,812	2	237,741	2	311,126
4	259,268	3	264,550	3	315,865
5	250,572	4	264,357	4	319,533
6	250,714	5	267,536	6	325,221
7	260,340	6	264,803	7	316,329
8	260,291	8	265,511	8	317,118
9	250,755	9	265,082	9	315,596
11	*224,070	10	265,055	10	315,810
12	260,690	11	265,583	11	342,630
13	260,850	12	265,272	13	320,298
14	261,550	13	265,895	14	319,435
15	261,771	15	265,948	15	319,600
16	262,822	16	265,459	16	319,315
18	265,321	17	255,669	17	327,008
19	265,628	18	265,215	18	320,657
20	265,513	19	269,058	20	320,150
21	266,027	20	265,934	21	319,042
22	265,555	22	268,409	22	322,161
23	266,165	23	270,980	23	316,830
25	264,429	24	277,346	24	316,019
26	266,767	25	277,293	25 Xmas Day	254,695
27	263,982	26	280,798	27 Boxing Day	307,328
28	263,548	27	281,649	28	317,872
29	265,873	29	281,179	29	316,804
30	264,158	30	281,097	30	316,254
				31	316,477

Yours truly,

GIBSON & ASHFORD,

Chartered Accountants,

20, BUDGE ROW, LONDON, E.C., and 39, WATERLOO STREET, BIRMINGHAM.

31st December, 1909.

* Mr. Lloyd George's Newcastle Speech.

† Lord Lansdowne's Notice to reject Budget. ‡ Mr. Balfour at Manchester.

§ Lords' Rejection of Budget. ¶ Mr. Asquith at Albert Hall.

1910 NOVELS

NEW NOVEL BY HALLIWELL SUTCLIFFE.

A WINTER'S COMEDY.

By HALLIWELL SUTCLIFFE. 6s.

NEW NOVEL BY VICTORIA CROSS.

THE ETERNAL FIRES

By VICTORIA CROSS. (With a Coloured Portrait of the Author.) 6s.

MASTER JOHN.

By SHAN F. BULLOCK, Author of "Robert Thorne." 6s.

BLACK SHEEP.

By STANLEY PORTAL HYATT, Author of "The Marriage of Hilary Carden." 6s.

THE UNCOUNTED COST.

By MARY GAUNT, part Author of "The Silent Ones." 6s.

WERNER LAURIE, Clifford's Inn, London.

The first, and one of the best, in the book is one of those written by Sir Walter Besant himself. It gives an account of the changes in London manners and society, as well as in London streets and buildings, that took place during the century. Mr. George Turnbull contributes a good account of the coronations and other public ceremonies, but his chapter on the City is rather over-loaded with dates and statistics. Only eleven pages of the book are given to education, and the halls available for public meetings are dismissed in a catalogue occupying but a single page. Much of the contents of the work properly belongs to a guide-book. Its chief interest is to be found in the illustrations, which number 124, together with a reproduction of Crutchley's map of London in 1835. The task of selecting these illustrations has been well done, and by their help, even more than by the letterpress, we are able to form a notion of the changes London has undergone during the nineteenth century.

* * *

IN "Irish Ways" (Allen, 15s. net), Miss Jane Barlow gives us a fresh collection of short stories and studies of Irish peasant life. They are written in the graceful style and marked by the quiet humor that distinguish Miss Barlow's former volumes. But, with all her sympathy, we often feel that her pictures of the Irish peasant are the fruit of observation from an outside standpoint rather than of that power to enter into the deeper recesses of his mind, which makes the work of writers like Mr. Colum so vivid and effective. The rollicking, harum-scarum Irishman of Anglo-Irish fiction is almost a thing of the past, but it should not be forgotten that, in spite of its exaggeration, it had a basis of truth, and we think that Miss Barlow paints the condition of even the poorest peasant in somewhat too sombre tints. As an account of Irish life the book is not so good as Mr. Lynd's volume, which we reviewed some weeks ago. Miss Barlow is at her best when describing Irish scenery, though she is also remarkably successful in rendering the characteristic phrases employed by the Irish peasants. The book contains some beautiful color illustrations by Mr. Warwick Goble.

* * *

"THE TWO EMPIRES: THE CHURCH AND THE WORLD" (Macmillan, 6s.) is the title given to a number of lectures on ecclesiastical history, chosen from among those delivered by the late Bishop Westcott during the earlier years of his tenure of the Regius Professorship of Divinity at Cambridge. The opening lecture, which deals with Eusebius, is an excellent survey of the faults and qualities of the "Father of Church History," and some of Dr. Westcott's criticisms on Eusebius are in advance of much later writing. Thus Dr. Westcott states that "it is almost unnecessary to add" that Eusebius is uncritical. Dr. McGiffert, in a translation of the "Church History" in the series edited by Dean Wace and Dr. Schaaf, goes so far as to say that "we can hardly fail to be impressed by the wisdom with which Eusebius discriminated between reliable and unreliable sources." The references given by Dr. Westcott show the baselessness of Dr. McGiffert's contention. This is but one example of the scholar's impartiality which marks every page Dr. Westcott wrote. The other topics treated in the volume are the Persecutions, the Age of Constantine, the Early Heretics, and the Council of Nicaea. Dr. Westcott's care in weighing evidence and caution in promulgating theories are seen to advantage in his discussion of several controverted points, especially in the history of the fourth century.

* * *

THE matters dealt with in the greater number of the twenty-four chapters of Mr. Thornton Hall's "Love Intrigues of Royal Courts" (Laurie, 12s. 6d. net) have formed the subject for separate volumes within recent years. Catherine the Great, Mrs. Fitzherbert, Lola Montez, the Chevalier D'Eon, Ludwig II. of Bavaria, Christina of Sweden, and the Man in the Iron Mask, have employed a crowd of pens. For those who like to discover the source of distinction for people of this type, but do not care to wade through a separate volume upon each of them, Mr. Hall's book should prove useful. He writes well and he has mastered his subjects, though his historical judgments are sometimes more trenchant than convincing. Take, for instance, his treatment of the mystery surrounding the Man in the Iron Mask, in regard to which he adopts the fancy of Dumas as to a twin brother of Louis XIV. Otherwise the book requires little notice. It is better than the average of its type, though we would suggest to Mr. Hall that there is an abundance of historical studies, even of a popular kind, more worthy of his attention.

The Week in the City.

	Price Friday morning, Jan. 14.	Price Friday morning, Jan. 21.
Consols	82 $\frac{1}{2}$	82 $\frac{1}{2}$
Midland Def.	58 $\frac{1}{2}$	59
Union Pacific	202 $\frac{3}{4}$	197
Mexican 1st Pref.	133	134
U.S. Steel	89 $\frac{1}{4}$	86

ALL through the week the City has given itself up to a debauch of politics, but the debauch very soon produced a violent headache. In anticipation of a sweeping Unionist victory, the Tories of the Stock Exchange laid in parcels of Consols and bought options in Home Railway stocks, Brewery stocks, industrial shares, and other securities which, in their curious wayward imaginations, were regarded as likely to benefit by Tariff Reform. Seeing that one of the first measures alleged to be certain if the Unionists were returned to power was a Naval Loan, it seems scarcely probable that the price of Government stocks could have been raised by this expected increase in their amount, however convenient to the present generation the policy of leaving posterity to pay its bills might seem. As for Home Railway companies, since a large proportion of the goods that they carry and handle consists of the imports and exports which it is the avowed object of Tariff Reform to diminish, it is even more difficult in their case than in that of Consols, to see how the return of a Tariff Reform Government could have improved the prospect of their being more valuable to holders. But in the matter of stock market movements reason is by no means always—perhaps comparatively seldom—the most influential driving power. If a sufficient number of short-sighted people think that a stock is worth buying, its price will go up. If the Tories had come in there would certainly have been a rush of quite absurdly reasoned buying, with a consequent boom, probably followed by a severe reaction.

SECOND THOUGHTS.

Happily the common sense and sound political instinct of the people has prevailed, and the question of what might happen if a Tariff Reform Government were returned is now purely academic. For even if by some miracle a Tory majority were won, after the polls in the great industrial towns, it would not attempt to bring in Tariff Reform, which is acknowledged to be a "dead horse till next time." But the failure of the Unionist boasters to fulfil their promises was marked by severe depression in the early part of the week, and it was amusing to see the frantic efforts of the Tory Press to demonstrate in their leading articles that they were winning handsomely, while their City pages had to acknowledge that the slump was due to the slowness of reactionary progress.

A HAPPY ENDING.

On Thursday came a reduction in Bank rate and the Unionist victories in the counties, and the Stock Exchange was happy again. The Bank of England's position has been greatly strengthened lately by receipts of gold from abroad and the return of coin and notes from the provinces, after the usual outward flow at the end of the year; and since the great international monetary outlook is, on the whole, serene, the Bank rate has been again reduced, and it would not be surprising to see it 3 per cent. before long. Cheap money always tends to make prices of securities rise, and the long list of Unionist gains, announced one after another during the length of Monday, made the Tories of the City so happy that they quite forget that less than a week ago they were talking of sweeping the country, and sending back a Protectionist majority to Westminster. So markets ended the week in good style, with the marked exception of American shares, which have been demoralised by the pressure of liquidation in New York.

JANUS.

TANGYE'S

TYPE "AA" OIL ENGINE

For Farm or Estate Work,
Country-House Lighting, &c.

TANGYES LTD., BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED
WHITE
& BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.
In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

TOURS.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."

£12 12s. OPORTO, GIBRALTAR, TANGIER, ALGIERS,
PALERMO, February 15th.

£26 5s. PALESTINE, EGYPT, CONSTANTINOPLE, GREECE,
March 3rd.

Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

£7 7s. —SKI-ING, SKATING, TOBOGGANNING
TOURS, including Second-Class Return Ticket
and Accommodation Hotel Aubepine, Ballaigues. Also Hotels at Mantana, Villars, St. Beatenberg, Wengen, Lenzerheide, etc.—
Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, London, S.W.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED).

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it
WILL BE REPLACED.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE.

6/- 2,800 "VICTORIAN" EDITION OF
BARRY'S TEACHERS' PRAYER BOOK.

2/- Being the Book of Common Prayer, with Introductions, Analysis, Notes and a Commentary upon the Psalter. By the Right Rev. ALFRED BARRY, D.D., D.C.L., and a Glossary by the Rev. A. L. MAYHEW, M.A.
16mo. Bourgeois, Large Type Edition. Cloth boards, red edges, 6s.
for 2s. Abroad 2s. 2d.; Pastegrain, limp, gilt edges, 7s. 6d. for 3s. 9d.;
Abroad 3s. 11d.; post free. 53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

8vo, 2s., post free

HEAVEN AND ITS WONDERS, AND HELL.

From Things Heard and Seen.

By EMMANUEL SWEDENBORG.

ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING said: "To my mind the only light that has been cast on the other life is found in Swedenborg's philosophy."

London: SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, BLOOMSBURY STREET.

LONDON COUNTY & WESTMINSTER
BANK, LIMITED.

ESTABLISHED IN 1836.

CAPITAL - £14,000,000, in 700,000 Shares of £20 each.
Called-up Capital, £3,500,000. Reserve Fund, £4,250,000

Head Office: 41, LOTHBURY, E.C.

LOMBARD STREET OFFICE: 21, Lombard Street, E.C.

WEST END OFFICE: 1, St. James's Square, S.W.

Foreign Branch—80, Cornhill, E.C.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened on the usual terms.
Facilities are given Customers at any Branch for the transfer of money to or from any other Branch.

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.—Sums of £10 and upwards are received on deposit at interest, subject to notice of withdrawal, or by special agreement, in accordance with the usual custom.

EXECUTOR AND TRUSTEE BUSINESS UNDER-TAKEN.

PURCHASE AND SALE of Stocks and Shares effected.

DIVIDENDS, ANNUITIES, &c., received.

THE AGENCY OF FOREIGN AND COUNTRY BANKS is undertaken, and every description of Banking Business transacted.

FOREIGN DEPARTMENT.

CURRENCY DRAFTS, CIRCULAR NOTES and
LETTERS OF CREDIT are issued, and TELEGRAPHIC
TRANSFERS made to all parts of the world.

APPROVED FOREIGN DRAFTS are purchased, and Collections undertaken.

DOCUMENTARY CREDITS are established, and every facility given for the handling of Documents to or from Abroad.

The Officers of the Bank are bound to secrecy.

THE INDEX TO VOLUMES
I.—V. OF THE NATION

may be had free on application to the Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER. Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Spring Term commences January 14th.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.

BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.
(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

TETTENHALL COLLEGE,
STAFFORDSHIRE.

500 feet above Sea Level.

Headmaster—R. L. AGER, M.A. (Rugby and Corpus Christi College, Oxford).

FREE CHURCH PUBLIC SCHOOL.

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey, Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK.
K. M. ELLIS.

STRAMONGATE BOYS' SCHOOL, KENDAL.

A Boarding School for Boys.

Founded by the Society of Friends in Kendal.

A strong staff—leisure-time pursuits—school journeys—good games—gymnastics—a magnificent country district.

The school has doubled itself in the last five years.

Prospectus, School Magazine, etc., from WILFRED SESSIONS, B.Sc. Headmaster.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD, HASLEMERE, SURREY.
COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Sandy Soil. 600 feet above sea level.

Healthy out-door life, combined with thorough education on modern lines. Usual curriculum, including citizenship course, extension lectures, &c. Preparation when required for University and other careers.

Handicrafts, gardening, riding, nature study, archæology, &c.

Principal: Miss AMY KEMP.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL.

HEAD MASTER:—ARTHUR ROWNTREE, B.A. (Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History and Practice of Education Cantab.)

Preparation for Universities.

Citizenship Course. Leisure Hour Work.

The Spring Term begins on January 18th.

For prospectus, etc., apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

BANKING.

THE LONDON JOINT STOCK BANK, LIMITED.

Notice is hereby given that the Rate of Interest allowed at the Head Office and London Branches of this Bank, on Deposits subject to seven days' notice of withdrawal, is this day reduced to 2 per cent. per annum.

CHARLES GOW, General Manager,
5, Princes Street, Mansion House. 20th January, 1910.

PARR'S BANK, LIMITED.

Notice is hereby given that the Rate of Interest allowed by this Bank at the Head Office and Metropolitan Branches, on Deposit at seven days' call, is Two per cent. per annum, until further notice.

R. W. WHALLEY, General Manager.
Bartholomew Lane, E.C. 20th January, 1910.

HIGHEST QUALITY
TURKISH TOWELS
AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY

BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;

And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

RILEY'S BILLIARD TABLES

Social amenities make necessary the entertainment of your friends. To entertain them successfully is not always easy. And nothing disheartens a host more than a slow evening. The evenings will always be a delight if you have a Billiard Table in the house. An adjournment to the Billiard Room is always welcomed.

RILEY'S COMBINED
DINING AND
BILLIARD TABLES

will be found most convenient where space is limited. Are made in all sizes. Fitted with Riley's patent automatic action, enabling the table to be converted from Dining to Billiard Table and vice versa in less than a minute. A handsome piece of furniture and a perfect billiard table.

Prices from £13 10s. CASH OR EASY PAYMENTS.

Riley's Standard Tables

(as used in the Championship matches).

These tables are designed on most artistic lines, and built of the finest materials in the best possible manner. They are fitted with low frost-proof cushions, patent pockets, and are fully warranted for ten years. Prices from 55 guineas upwards.

FREE On receipt of postcard, full detailed Illustrated Catalogue of Billiard and Dining Tables, and small or full-sized tables and sundries.

E. J. RILEY, LTD. Willow Bank Works,
ACCRINGTON.

London Showrooms: 147, ALDERSGATE STREET, E.C.

RILEY'S
Billiard Tables.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Bathrooms on every Floor.
Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading,
Billiard and Smoking Rooms.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) Single from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc.,
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN. Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) Hotel. Close Pier; 1st Class; moderate.SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week.BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.*BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.BRIGHTON.*THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.*THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara.DEAL.*BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.EASTBOURNE.*CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House. Sussex Gdns. 5/- day.HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.EDINBURGH.*ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel.GREAT YARMOUTH.*MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day.GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.*THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.ILFRACOMBE.*COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 rooms. Facing Sea.KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCs.*CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments.LANCASTER.*BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh.LEEDS.*HOTEL METROPOLE. 2 minutes' walk from either station.LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANDUDNO.The WHITE HORSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea.LLANELLY.*CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LYNTON (Devon).ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres.MALVERN.*HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson.MATLOCK.*SMEDLEY'S HYDRO. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand.ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes).NELSON.*RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station.OXFORD (near).*SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boar's Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c., Lecture.PENTRE.*PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.SOUTHPORT.*KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St. Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment.ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas. Tel. 647

ROCKLEY HYDRO. Electric and other baths; Excellent cuisine.
Lift. Near Golf Links From 7s. per day. Tel. 422.

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclist's Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop.WHITBY.*WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

Your Week End Is Not Complete

WITHOUT

The Saturday Westminster

(The Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette.")

It is the only Weekly Magazine Review of the kind.

"F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week.
An Unique page of "Problems and Prizes,"
Book Reviews and Special Literary
Articles by the best known Writers.

ONE PENNY. Post 6/6 per annum (home), 8/8 (abroad).

Offices: Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for
copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION
Office, 14 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION
PUBLISHING Co. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-
sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—
Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions
are received.

The RICCARDI PRESS BOOKS

Some Press Opinions on Mr. H. P. Horne's "Riccardi" Type.

"Fortunate in preserving the best qualities [of the Florentine original] while avoiding mannerisms."—Burlington Magazine. "A face so clear and brilliant that it gives a page which literally he who runs may read, and which besides is as beautiful in its own way as a picture."—Tablet. "As legible as it is beautiful. There are few types which are at once so satisfactory from both an æsthetic and a practical point of view."—Yorkshire Post. "A beautiful setting that would have delighted the heart of William Morris."—Illustrated London News.

THE STORY OF GRISELDA, from the "Decameron" of Boccaccio. Translated by J. M. RIGG. 500 copies (9½ × 6½), wrapper, 5s. net; limp vellum, with silk ties, 12s. 6d. net.

The Plates in the following are reproduced by THE MEDICI PROCESS:—

THE SONG OF SONGS WHICH IS SOLOMON'S, in the Authorised Version, with 10 Plates after the Water-colour Drawings by W. RUSSELL FLINT. 500 copies (10½ × 7½), boards, canvas back and paper label, £2 2s. net; limp vellum, silk ties, £2 12s. 6d. net.

THE THOUGHTS OF THE EMPEROR MARCUS AURELIUS ANTONINUS. Translated by GEORGE LONG, with 12 Plates after the Water-colour Drawings by W. RUSSELL FLINT. 500 copies (10½ × 7½), boards, £2 12s. 6d. net; limp vellum, £3 3s. net.

For the limited editions of the above PRINTED ON VELLUM, enquiries must be made at the Booksellers, who may have subscribed for copies; or may be sent to the Publishers, who will be pleased to direct them to a likely quarter.

* * A Prospectus, printed in the Riccardi Fount, may be had post-free on application.

THE MEDICI PRINTS FOR 1910—FIFTH YEAR.

The ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION of £3 (post free) has hitherto entitled Subscribers to receive copies of the Annual Series after the great Italian Masters only. Commencing with the New Year (1910), however, ASSOCIATE SUBSCRIPTIONS will be received—also of £3—entitling the Associate Subscriber to select a certain number of Plates from among the new Prints for the year without limitation as to subject.

* * Full particulars of both classes of Subscription will be found in the New Edition of the Society's Prospectus NOW READY—post-free 3d. stamps, or containing some 100 Reproductions of the Prints, post-free 1s. stamps or P.O. Forms of Subscription post-free on application. No Subscription can be taken unless on these Forms, which bind the Subscriber to continue his Subscription (of whichever class) for a minimum period of Three Years.

NEW MEDICI PRINTS FOR 1910.

(List and Prices subject to amendment)

The following are SPECIAL Publications from THE NATIONAL LOAN COLLECTION, by permission:

GAINSBOROUGH - Gainsborough Dupont *17s. 6d.

* * A limited number of Monochromes of this picture NOW READY, in the same size. Price 10/6; postage 6d.

LAWRENCE - Miss Georgina Lennox *17s. 6d.

GIORGIONE (?) - Portrait of a Man - *25s.

TITIAN (Sir H. Lane's Collection) Portrait of a Man - *25s.

* Maximum prices, likely to be reduced. Special Prospectus of above subjects post-free.

Subscriptions to the above Four Plates, payable on publication of the first, may be entered on the following terms:—By The Society's Annual Subscribers at £3 3s. post-free; by the Public at £3 9s. post-free.

The following are some of the subjects (in addition to the above) proposed for issue in 1910:—

	s.	d.		s.	d.
GIAN BELLINI A Holy Allegory	25	0	R. VAN DER WEYDEN St. Luke Drawing the Virgin	17	6
MICHELINO Dante and his Book	25	0	BROUWER The Camblers	12	6
BOTTICELLI The Virgin Mother	17	6	PATINIR The Baptism in Jordan	15	0
GIORGIONE Concert Champêtre	21	0	REMBRANDT The Old Soldier	—	—
CORREGGIO The Education of Cupid	17	6	HOLBEIN Georg Clesze	17	6
J. DE' BARBARI Portrait of a Man	15	0	REYNOLDS Viscount Althorp (et 4)	17	6
RAPHAEL Madonna della Tenda	20	0	LELY (?) Oliver Cromwell	10	6

And other Subjects: also THE POPULAR MEDICI PRINTS (price 6s. each).

* * Some 60 Medici Prints have been published already.

Summary Lists of Italian, English, French, and Flemish Series of Plates; also of The National Portrait Series, The Popular Medici Prints, Pictures from the National Loan Collection, &c.,—all or any post-free.

PHILIP LEE WARNER, Publisher to The Medici Society, Ltd., 38, Albemarle Street, London, W.

The Nation

VOL. VI., No. 18.]
Registered as a Newspaper.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 29, 1910.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., 4d. Abroad, 1d.]

CONTENTS.

	PAGE		PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK ...	693	The Need for Liberal Propaganda. By A West Country Liberal ...	709
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—		Electoral Reform. By William Poel ...	710
The Dominant Issue at Last ...	696	Some Electioneering Tricks. By P. M. Rea ...	710
The Limits of the Money Power ...	697	Wellington and Waterloo. By Major John Hall ...	710
British Policy in Turkey ...	698	POETRY:—
The Re-Organiser of the Fleet ...	700	At the Door. By R. L. G. ...	710
LIFE AND LETTERS:—		WORLD OF BOOKS... ..	711
"Suggestion" in Electioneering ...	701	REVIEWS:—
The Battle of the Schools in France ...	702	Religion and the Modern World ...	712
"The Decent Church" ...	703	Japanese Alliances ...	713
SHORT STUDY:—		Madame de Sévigné's Cousin... ..	714
The Declaration of the Poll ...	706	Horses and Hunting ...	715
THE DRAMA:—		Handel as Man ...	715
The Crude Woman. By William Archer ...	706	BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—		The Northward Trek ...	716
The County Elections. By a Liberal Candidate, A. C. Liberal, and Alfred Rowntree... ..	707	Rome ...	718
The Referendum and the Constitutional Crisis. By F. Bentham Stevens ...	709	From Sketch Book and Diary ...	720
		The Days of the Directoire ...	720
		THE WEEK IN THE CITY. By Janus ...	720

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

THE elections are almost concluded, and the Government should emerge from them with a majority of about 120, and a surplusage of over half a million votes, making due allowance for the unpolled constituencies and the proportion of votes in them which should be allotted to the two sides, the Peers' Party and the Anti-Peers' Party. The country will thus have given its verdict (a) against the Lords, on which question the majority is absolutely solid; (b) in favor of the Budget, the only objection of the Irish members being to the whisky taxes; (c) for Free Trade, as to which the British verdict, in seats, in voting strength, and in the character and quality of the judgment, is conclusive. The issue was not fought in Ireland, and none can say that the Nationalists are Protectionists. Even if they were, they would be anti-English and anti-Birmingham Protectionists.

* * *

EVENTS, therefore, must march in harmony with these decisive happenings. The Budget, we imagine, will be put through, in a few hours, verbatim et literatim, and any slight changes that may be necessary will be reserved for the second Budget. It is possible that legislation consequential on the passing of that great instrument of social reform, such as the insurance schemes, will be necessary. But the main task of the Ministry will be to restore the smashed Constitution and make progressive Government again possible. Liberal members are talking of a Plural Voting Bill, but the Lords are like the neck of a bottle, and until the block is removed nothing passes through. The financial and legislative issues cannot well be separated, so that the Veto Bill will deal with both. The country, therefore, will look to the Crown to restore representative government—i.e., the system by which our temperate Kings act through the screen of Ministerial responsibility to the elective House, which, in its turn, expresses the will of the nation. Unless that is restored by the King, the Constitution dies.

* * *

THE English counties have not maintained the decisive anti-Liberal swing of the early contests, and the later results show no strongly marked deviation from the voting in 1906. Scotland appears likely to reproduce that situation almost exactly, losses in one or two agricultural counties, under strong feudal influence, being balanced by gains in the more industrial centres, even when Labor and Liberalism contend for the progressive vote. The same is almost true of Wales, where only two friends of Protection and the Peers have been elected.

* * *

THE Yorkshire and Lancashire returns also reproduce the results in the boroughs; the only losses in the latter county being due to splits. Agriculture is divided. In the East, Norfolk is almost solidly Liberal; Suffolk predominantly Tory. In the West, Devonshire and Cornwall remain Liberal; Wilts and Somerset are shaken. The true seat of the reaction, however, continues to be the Birmingham area, and the great southern recreative and residential districts, Free Trade suffering most in the places where it has yielded the most abundant and luxurious wealth. Here and there feudalism, making its great stand for political power, and using all available methods, has shown great power of recovery; but it has failed in the North, where, for example, an able member of the able Durham family is thrown out by over 2,000 votes. The Prime Minister, whose position in the party was never stronger, was returned with a greatly increased majority, and has not lost a single member of his Cabinet. In Ireland the chronic Healy-O'Brien schism, based on clerical support, has had a slight revival.

* * *

A FIRM breakwater to the Tariff Reform wave has been set up in the north-eastern suburban constituencies of London, where Mr. Simon, in particular, has won a brilliant argumentative victory. Even the general results in the counties may be too gloomily regarded. Away from the London influence the anti-Liberal majorities have often been small or trifling, standing out in marked contrast against the sweeping verdicts of the Northern centres. We note also that up to Thursday noon, at least, nearly half of the Unionist gains in the English counties—26 out of 56—occurred in constituencies that were never Liberal before 1906, and were retained for Toryism even in the year when the agricultural laborer first joined the electorate. Finally, the "Daily News" publishes a long list of constituencies where the majority was entirely or mainly made up of plural voters, whose multiplying power has been greatly increased by the motor car.

* * *

THE Protectionist party is busily occupied in jettisoning cargo. Mr. Balfour and the "Times" have already proclaimed that this Socialistic and revolutionary Budget must pass, and the "Times" is even willing to consider a Bill which would "secure to the Commons full power over finance."

Mr. Balfour, indeed, in killing Tariff Reform, affects to predict for it a glorious resurrection at some unspecified date. The "Daily Mail," on the other hand, whilst sticking to Protection, is quite willing to drop the Union. Its issue of Thursday contained a letter signed "Irishman," printed in prominent type on its leader page, which proposes a Home Rule Bill giving Ireland a "National Assembly" on the Colonial model. To this body was to be joined a Ministry dependent on a Dublin Parliament. "Is this Separation?" asks "Irishman." He proceeds to suggest to his countrymen that the Tory Party is alone capable of "persuading the Lords to consent to Home Rule." Such a policy, he says, might lose Belfast and Liverpool, but regain Ireland, and incidentally secure Tariff Reform, which would by implication be forced upon industrial Britain by a joint vote of Irish Nationalists and Southern English Tories.

* * *

WE do not know what Mr. Balfour has to say to this proposal, though we must not lightly assume that the statesman who betrayed Free Trade will stand by the Union. But there is no reason at all why Mr. Chamberlain should not embrace it. "I am in favor," he wrote in 1886, in a letter signed by his own hand which lies before us, "of the widest measure of Home Rule that can be granted consistent with the continued integrity of the Empire." As for English Liberals, all we can say is that, while not one member of the party would consent to betray Free Trade, a Tory Home Rule Bill would be welcomed as warmly to-day as it would have been by Gladstone himself twenty-five years ago.

* * *

ANOTHER section of the Tories appears to be still under the impression that it has won the General Election, or come so near winning it that the fact of being in a minority of over one hundred is hardly worth mentioning. Thus it insists that the Liberal majority is so small that it cannot ask for a measure of constitutional change. But the total majority against the peers is not small; it will be one of the largest recorded in our constitutional history. The King, says the "Times," cannot disregard the wishes of "nearly one-half of his subjects in the British isles." In other words, he is to disregard the wishes of considerably more than one-half of his subjects in the British isles. Mr. Balfour claims that the peers must in any case retain the power of rejecting the Budget, i.e., of dividing the control of the purse with the Commons. Thus, again, the leader of the Opposition, badly beaten in two successive elections, claims the right to govern the country. Mr. Lloyd George pertinently said that this supersedes the Monarchy. Acts are to be counter-signed, not with the Royal name, but with "A. J. Balfour." If much of this talk goes on, and action is taken upon it, the political situation, which is serious enough to-day, will be revolutionary a few months hence.

* * *

ON Sunday and Monday, however, the Opposition definitely hoisted the white flag on the Constitutional question. The "Observer" asked whether it was to be "conflict or conference," and the "Times" and its correspondents talked of Ministries of moderate men. Unable to resist the attraction of its favourite color, the "Westminster Gazette" flew an answering signal. Its chief suggestions were that the country would not have single chamber government—an issue which it has never debated—and that it would "view with suspicion" all schemes which could be "plausibly represented" as having that effect—a sentence which we can only regard as the average "plausible misrepresentation" of the Campbell-Bannerman resolution. For these reasons the policy of attacking the veto was to be dropped for that of the reform of the House of Lords—i.e., the Liberal plan for the Tory plan. This end was to be obtained by means of the "co-operation of men of goodwill in all parties." We are unable for the moment to discover the special party to which this counsel is directed. It cannot be the Liberal Party or the Liberal Government. The first is in the act of receiving a majority of between 100 and 120 for the purpose of dealing with the veto, while the second, through the Prime Minister, has declared that object to be the sole condition of its resumption of office.

* * *

WE hear from time to time the suggestion that the Budget lost rather than won Liberal seats. On this matter the elections happily furnish the most conclusive evidence, even more conclusive than the testimony of the by-elections which occurred between the introduction of the Budget and the General Election. Nine seats were won by the Opposition between 1906 and the appearance of the Budget; we omit the seats won from the Liberals by Labor candidates. Six of them have been won back. In the other two the Tory majorities were reduced by 2,935 votes. In the ninth seat, the Budget had a real majority of 968, but the seat was lost through a split. We append a table of the results, which are really very striking, showing, as they do, a large numerical recovery of votes, in addition to the gains of seats, obtained in spite of the fact that in two constituencies votes were split between Liberals and Labor men:—

	Un.	Lib.	U.maj.	1910.
Peckham (L)	6,970	4,476	2,494	Maj. reduced to ... 83
Ross (L)	4,947	3,928	1,019	Maj. reduced to ... 395
(Hereford).
Cockermouth (L) ...	4,593	3,903	690	Un. ... 4,579
		Lab. ...		Lib. ... 3,638
		1,436 (Split)		Lab. ... 1,909
				Un. maj. over Lib. 941
				Budget maj. ... 968
Ashburton (L)	5,191	4,632	559	WON ... Lib. ... 5,668
(Mid-Devon).				Un. ... 5,421
				Budget maj. ... 247
Brigg (L)	5,389	5,273	116	WON ... Lib. ... 6,548
				Con. ... 6,311
				Budget maj. ... 237
N.W. Manchest'r (L)	5,417	4,988	429	WON ... Lib. ... 5,930
		Soc. ...	(Split)	Con. ... 5,117
		276		Budget Maj. ... 783
Newcastle (L)	13,863	11,720	2,143	Highest Lib. vote 18,779
(2 seats).		Soc. ...	(Split)	" Con. vote 14,067
		2,971		Budget maj. ... 4,712
Haggerston (L)	2,867	1,724	1,724	WON ... Lib. ... 3,041
		Soc. ...	(Split)	Con. ... 2,585
		986		Soc. ... 701
				B'g't maj. over Con. 456
Pudsey (L)	8,444	5,331	3,113	WON ... Lib. ... 7,358
		Lab. ...	(Split)	Un. ... 5,934
		1,291		Budget maj. ... 1,424

OUR straggling election continues to call forth comments throughout Europe and the Empire. But little has been said which reveals fresh insight. The old Communiard exile, Albert Thomas, who happened to be in England, has written for "l'Humanité" what strikes us as a merely partisan estimate of the power and success of the Liberal Party. "Vorwärts" is more objective in its comments. It dreads the Irish ascendancy, and thinks that the Tories may in the end gain more in this new electioneering cry than Liberals will gain in votes. The "North German Gazette" is particularly struck by the absence of class-consciousness among the English workers. In Canada comment seems to follow party lines. The Liberal is Liberal, and the Tory is Tory, with a strong vein of hostility to the Lords. For the Australian Press and in the United States the one dominant issue is the battle with the Lords, and on this point feeling is almost unanimously with the Commons, and voices a sturdy, unquestioning democratic instinct.

* * *

THE enlarged Imperial Legislative Council met on Tuesday in Calcutta under the shadow of yet another political crime—the murder of a native detective, Shemsul-Alam, who had been conspicuous in hunting down terrorists. Lord Minto's opening speech, which gave an ungrudging welcome to the new era of reform, was notable for two points. It claimed for himself and his colleagues in India the honor of initiating the reforms. It announced that the first work of the new Council would be to consider yet another Press Law, more drastic than any of its many predecessors. The evil of an incendiary Press can hardly be exaggerated. But the history of recent years is a commentary on the difficulty of attempting to deal with it by repression. The net is always spread too wide, and the more honorable victims lend a halo of martyrdom to those who really are guilty. It is said that the Council applauded the announcement of this coming Bill, but it must be remembered that on this Council, owing to some unfortunate details in the scheme of election, the Moslems and the Conservative element generally are over-represented.

* * *

THE floods which have vexed France during the past week are a disaster on a national scale, comparable in everything save the loss of life to all but the worst of earthquakes. Most of the greater rivers have overflowed their banks, and some small provincial towns are said to have been almost totally submerged. But the Seine has been the worst offender. As the water rose to within two or three feet of their parapets, the bridges of Paris have acted as a dam, which sent the swirling stream pouring into cellars, sewers, and streets. Many streets have become navigable canals, and in some squares only the tops of the lamp-posts and the trees can be seen above the waters. Most of the underground railways are flooded, the electric tramways have ceased to run, and three of the bridges were closed to heavy traffic.

* * *

SOME 30,000 persons are homeless round Paris alone, and the general stoppage of work near the river has caused serious misery to the working classes. The great public buildings are clustered for the most part on the banks of the Seine. The Chamber has been talking of moving to Versailles; the Foreign Office is flooded, and in the cellars of the Palais de Justice divers are trying to recover the archives. The scene on the great broad river as it rushes past Notre Dame is said to have a novel and surprising beauty. Soldiers, sailors, and police are hard at work on the duty of rescue and prevention, and the Pantheon, the sleeping place of the illustrious dead, has been turned into a dormitory for the obscure living. There were fourteen great floods during the past century, but the high watermark of 1876 has been covered, and for a parallel it is necessary to go back to the historic disaster of 1764.

* * *

OUR Paris correspondent writes:—"The Seine rose less than was expected last night, and if dry weather continues, not only in Paris, but higher up the river, no doubt there will be a fall. But this morning (Thursday) the water nearly reached the roadway of the Pont de Solférino, the lowest of the bridges, and was only twenty-five inches below the top of the parapet in the Quai des Tuileries. The destruction of property is appalling, and will inflict great misery on a large proportion of the inhabitants. Thousands of workmen are thrown out of employment, the nursery gardens in and near Paris are ruined, and the distress will be acute for some time to come. In one respect, some of the London papers have exaggerated the gravity of the situation; it is not the case that there is yet any scarcity of provisions, nor has there been any general rise in prices, though that is to be feared. There has been a slight rise in the price of fresh vegetables, eggs, and butter; that is all. The price of bread has not risen, and there is no scarcity. One or two bakers in populous districts tried to put up the price of bread, but the shop of one of them was promptly wrecked, and the example is not likely to be followed. There is an ample supply of flour in Paris." Should there not be a national subscription for the relief of the victims? The area of suffering is enormous.

* * *

IN "high politics" two events have this week affected the relations of the Great Powers. Russia and Japan have both rejected, firmly if with courtesy, the hasty proposals of the United States for the neutralisation of their railways in Manchuria. Mr. Knox aimed at reconciling the two rivals; he has certainly brought them together. It is unlikely that more will be heard of the scheme. The other event has made some stir in Vienna. Baron Aerenthal, in an interview with Mr. Wesselsky of the "Novoe Vremya," made the odd statement that Germany has no influence on Austro-Hungarian foreign policy, but Russia has. The general accuracy of the interview has been admitted. It is improbable that it represents any cooling in the Austro-German alliance; it is merely a clumsy approach to Russia after an angry and protracted feud. St. Petersburg is pleased, Berlin slightly annoyed, and Vienna scolds Baron Aerenthal for demeaning himself to "polish Russia's boots." His prestige, badly damaged by his general policy, and by his folly in the Friedjung case, has suffered yet another diminution.

* * *

LADY CONSTANCE LYTTON seems to us to have caught out the prison system, if she has caught out nothing else. She entered the prison, not as Lady Constance Lytton, but as a common working-woman. When she was Lady Constance, she was carefully and scientifically examined for heart-trouble, and when that was diagnosed, was released. As a common working-woman, she was forcibly fed without any such examination, and, according to her account, was not too gently treated. This does not show that the authorities were wrong in their treatment of Lady Constance Lytton. It does show that they were seriously wrong in their treatment of the working-woman.

Politics and Affairs.

THE DOMINANT ISSUE AT LAST.

"The rule that the powers of the Crown must be exercised through Ministers who are members of one or other House of Parliament, and who 'command the confidence of the House of Commons,' really means that the elective portion of the legislature, in effect, though by an indirect process, appoints the executive Government; and further, that the Crown or the Ministry must ultimately carry out, or at any rate not contravene, the wishes of the House of Commons. But as the process of representation is nothing else than a mode by which the will of the representative party, or House of Commons, is made to coincide with the will of the nation, it follows that a rule which gives the appointment and control of the Government mainly to the House of Commons, is at bottom a rule which gives the election and ultimate control of the executive to the nation. The same thing holds good of the understanding or habit, in accordance with which the House of Lords are expected in every serious political controversy to give way, at some point or another, to the will of the House of Commons, as expressing the deliberate resolve of the nation, or of that further custom which, though of comparatively recent growth, forms AN ESSENTIAL PART of modern constitutional ethics, by which, in case the Peers should finally refuse to acquiesce in the decision of the lower House, THE CROWN IS EXPECTED TO NULLIFY THE RESISTANCE OF THE LORDS BY THE CREATION OF NEW PEERAGES."—Dicey, "The Law of the Constitution," pp. 360-1.

By the admission of the more frank among our opponents the elections may be taken to have settled certain questions. In the first place, the country has pronounced decidedly in favor of the Budget, and this great foundation stone of future social reform will be duly laid as one of the first acts of the new Parliament. This pronouncement is, in itself, a sufficient condemnation of the action of the Lords, who, if they could have been justified at all in violating the Constitution, could have been justified only by an overwhelming verdict of the constituencies in their favor. In the second place, Tariff Reform is condemned, not merely by the majority of the constituencies, but more decisively by the character and composition of the Free Trade majority. So weighty is the verdict of the North that even had a Tariff Reform majority been scraped together by the returns in the rural districts, the cathedral cities, the "residential" quarters, and the plural voters, it would have been recognised as impossible to impose tariffs against the will of the great organised industries of the nation, who have now twice indicated their determination to adhere to Free Trade. Thirdly, as the "Times" recognises, the verdict of the electors carries with it a formal condemnation of the intrusion of the Lords into the sphere of finance. Mr. Balfour has, indeed, indicated that there will be a fight at this point, and a fight, no doubt, there will be. But it will be a fight which will combine every element in the majority in an unswerving and unanimous resolution to vindicate the ancient prerogative of the popular House.

On all these heads we have really passed beyond controversy. The vital point between parties is, of course, the question of the legislative veto. But here, again, there are some points which have been made perfectly plain. In the first place, the election has been fought on the entire question of the veto, legislative as well as financial. The issue was put with all his usual incisiveness by Mr. Asquith, first at the Albert Hall, and, secondly, in his election address. So far as it is possible for a party leader to concentrate the whole question of an election on a single point, Mr. Asquith concentrated the question of this election on the veto of the Lords. If there ever was a referendum in this country, this election has been one. We have consistently maintained therefore that the majority for his Government, be it small or great, would be a majority for the destruction of the absolute veto of the Lords. To this result it is the duty of Ministers to give effect. In the second place, Mr. Asquith not merely placed the issue before the country, but gave a distinct pledge on behalf of himself and his colleagues that they would not "assume" or "hold" office without adequate guarantees that their labors would not in the future, as in the past, be rendered nugatory by the action of the Upper House. There can, accordingly, be no doubt that he will advise the Sovereign that such guarantees are a necessary condition of the continuance of that system on which the stability of our constitutional government has long depended. The essentials of this system are that each party is equally free to serve the Crown and the country, and the condition of this freedom is that each, when returned to power by the electors, should have something like a fair field for its work, and something approaching to equal opportunity for the fulfilment of its pledges. No such equality, nor anything approaching to it, exists as long as the absolute veto on legislation remains.

In the third place, it must be remarked that it is not the composition of the House of Lords, but the powers of the House of Lords, and its relation to the House of Commons, that are primarily in question. The problem cannot, therefore, be solved by the reform of the Upper House. Such reform may be desirable, but no reform that has been suggested, or is likely to be suggested, would touch the vital point of the dis-harmony between the two Houses, and thus remove the block upon Liberal legislation. Unthinking suggestions of a compromise on these lines, therefore, serve only to darken counsel, and we regret that they should be put forward at this stage on the Liberal side. The proposals of Ministers might, indeed, include reform as part of a general solution, but they would be totally ineffective, and would not for a moment command the allegiance of the party, unless they provided that the deliberately expressed will of the Commons, and through them of the nation, should in future prevail.

On the other side, it will be contended that the majority which the Government is likely to secure is not sufficient to justify an important constitutional change. We reject this contention for reasons stated, but it will be urged. The Veto Limitation Bill can be carried through the Commons, but it must also be accepted by the Lords themselves, and this acceptance can only be obtained in one of two ways. Either an arrangement must be found to which the consent of the Lords can be obtained, or we fall back on the ultimate power of the Crown, tenaciously and rightly maintained, to decide a conflict between the Houses by the creation of peers. Here we reach the real centre of the political situation. The expedient of creating peers in order to restore the broken balance of the Constitution is no foreign or revolutionary part of our governing system. Professor Dicey, in the important passage which we cite at the head of this article, declares it to be a necessary part of the constitutional machinery. Without it the two Houses cannot, in case of recalcitrancy on the part of the Lords, be brought into harmony. The House of Lords undergoes no change as the result of a general election. It sits en permanence, looking down like a god on the emotional disturbances at its feet. Nay, more; it claims to decide the conditions under which there is any call upon it to acknowledge the existence of an anti-Tory majority in the representative House. In particular, no Irish votes are ever to count, unless, happily, they can be drawn into the Protectionist net. But this is absolute Separatism. The House of Commons is a unity, and it is on behalf of that unity and its rights, when declared through a majority, that the ultimate power which the Crown possesses of bringing the Lords into harmony with its will must be evoked. The Crown, says Professor Dicey, is "expected" to nullify the resistance of the Lords by the creation of peers. Has a Government commanding, on the constitutional issue, a majority of about 120 votes—that is to say, a majority well above the normal—no claim on the King for this customary exercise of his powers? Is it to be held that this election has settled nothing, except the passage of the Budget, and that the Prime Minister's continued and deliberate affirmation of the constitutional issue is idle breath? We are certain that the majority will take no such view. It cherishes a deep and passionate feeling on the question of the Lords, and it looks to the King, and has a right to look to the King, for it is clear that there is a point beyond which representative government is powerless without his help. If the Lords resolutely shut their ears to every proposal of accommodation, however moderate, it will, we believe, be felt by the power most directly interested in the stability of our institutions that the conflict between the Houses must be ended, and ended in favor of the representatives of the people. Throughout the controversy our opponents will do well to look behind appearances and consider the real forces that support the House of Lords. Their friends in the Press freely acknowledge that the rural constituencies which have impaired the Liberal majority have been won—so far as genuinely political motives availed, and apart from forms of pressure of which, in this relation, we need say nothing—by the Tariff Reformers. Nowhere have the Lords as such received any serious electoral backing. "Defeat would be certain," says a writer of authority in the "Morning Post," if the issue were joined on the maintenance of the House of Lords as it at present exists. Their offence in regard to the Budget may have been condoned on Tory platforms, but we do not believe that in any part of the country it has been mistaken for a meritorious act. Apart from the Tariff Reformer and the publican, we doubt if the party of the peers could have mustered a hundred members in the new House of Commons. On the other hand, our majority acquires its maximum strength on the question of the veto. Whatever may be said as to the ultimate Irish attitude to a kind of Protection—certainly not the Protection of the Birmingham school—no one supposes that the Lords have gained a single Nationalist recruit from Erin. On that question we cannot but win; they cannot but lose. And it is an issue on which the mind and will of the progressive party, in all its sections, are unalterable.

THE LIMITS OF THE MONEY POWER.

THE elections are all but over, and the Liberal Party is already in a position to congratulate itself on the character of the majority it has obtained, and the sources from which its power is drawn. The party comes back united, splendidly led and manned, full of power to hold the present situation, and the promise of power to control its later issues. It will probably command a majority of seats in Great Britain of over fifty votes. It counts a majority of voters for the Budget and against the House of Lords to be numbered by the hundred thousand. Its area of solid conquest extends right through Scotland, Wales, and the North of England, in all of which places it stands at its top strength, measured even by the astonishing results of 1906. It is predominant in several of the Eastern and Western Counties of England, industrial and rural. Excepting the Midland or Chamberlainite area, and the Orange vote of Liverpool, it retains nearly every important industrial constituency; a rule which applies not only to the urban but to the county areas. All the great staple trades but agriculture, which has historic associations with Toryism, adhere to it. No hesitation is seen in the vote of these hives of men, which give the country her place in the world. The industrial North has gone Liberal or Labor, not by hundreds, but by thousands and tens of thousands. The Government's working majority, including the Nationalist vote, is likely to approach 120. If this figure is attained, it will hold power by a plurality which has only been exceeded four times since 1832. Should the majority be between 110 and 120, the strength of the Administration will be about equal to that by which Gladstone governed in 1868 and in 1880, and nearly three times that by which he and Lord Rosebery held power in 1892, while it also equals the strength of the Unionist coalition of 1886, and is far superior to the run of majorities by which Liberal and Tory administrations alike held power during the middle part of last century. In a word, if we are out of the earthquake zones of 1832 and 1906, we are back to normal politics, or to normal politics under the group system which now rules them. The new elements are that in England a marked geographical and class cleavage has set in, and that the issue largely depends on which of the two Englands proves to be the stronger.

The question almost answers itself. The money-power, multiplying itself by means of the plural vote and the motor-car, has done its worst. If Progress and Free Trade have been smitten anywhere, it is precisely in those parts of the country which could most be dazzled by the wealth piled up under the system of free imports. The country was invited to proclaim itself ruined by men and women seated in motor cars costing a thousand pounds apiece, by candidates who spent small fortunes in coaxing and nursing the simple folk who voted for them, by one industry, agriculture, that has not been so prosperous for years, and one trade, the liquor interest, whose profits were made out of the increased earnings of all classes, and the enormous profits and the luxurious habits of the wealthiest. A more observant and critical working-class than our own might, indeed, have seen in this meretricious display of the money-power a pretty stiff object-lesson in favor of revolutionary Socialism. But it is one of the little ironies of politics that anyone should take it as a reason for going back to the pinched days of Protection.

It is still more significant that where the money-power was concentrated mainly on its pleasurable side, as in the Home Counties, the Tories did best, while they did worst where the actual business of industrial production went on. Where labor was isolated or parasitic, it could be influenced or frightened; where it was organised and independent, and had developed the character and powers of political thought that organisation and independence bring; where a strong racial feeling, backed by a passion for education and a free Church system, kept it self-respecting, and free from our besetting English fault of snobbishness, as in Scotland or Wales; wherever the country chapel stood as a little fortress of social and spiritual freedom, the money-power could do little or nothing. Much of what was swept into the innumerable Protectionist flat-traps was something which either had deep personal suffering behind it—like depressed Sunderland—that neither Free Trade nor Protection can cure, or more often represented a small pocket of industrial misfortune looking blindly for a tariff to save it either from its own lack of skill and enterprise or from a passing gust of bad business. But above everything, the Tory rally in the counties, such as it was, meant that the timid class of small traders, small professional men, and day laborers cannot hold out against a regular planned descent of our barbarians, backed by masses of gamekeepers, beaters, domestic servants, chauffeurs. Here is no reasoned assent to Tariff Reform or anything else. Ordinary politics do not count, when, as happened in hundreds of cases after the election of 1906, the hall gives notice to the village tradesman, or even to the local doctor who has voted Radical, that he may "send in his account," or when the neighborly instinct of the country-side is turned into a deliberate and often successful inquisition into the poor man's voting. Very little actual terrorism is wanted. One case of dismissal, or even one threat, may settle the vote of a village.

At the centre of this system is the attempt to get behind the secrecy of the ballot. If that is maintained, coercion in the end falls to the ground; if disbelief in it spreads, and nothing can be done for the actual victims of pressure, the counties will never yield the results which a progressive policy ought to obtain from them. The sending out of circulars inviting electors to promise votes for the Tory candidate, and to fill up the forms accordingly, is a direct attempt to break down the ballot, and the device was widely used during the election. Here, we think, the Liberal Party may well be called upon to act. We hope that the county candidates will meet, and exchange experiences, and convey them to the official heads. There are two possible methods. If the evidence is definite enough, and documentary proofs have been accumulated and retained, an Amendment to the Address should be moved and a call made upon the Government to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the conduct of elections, with special reference to breaches of the Corrupt Practices Act and of the Ballot Act. Or a voluntary proceeding can be set up which may prove as effective in England as in Wales. In 1868 the Tory landlords avenged themselves on the Welsh farmers who helped to usher in the Liberal Ministry of that year by issuing a shower of eviction notices. Welsh Liberalism retorted by raising a great protection fund, under which scores of victims were set up with farms or with a livelihood under the noses of the landlords who had thrust them out. This and the disclosures before the Land Commission broke the power of coercive landlordism in Wales, and it has never been revived. Some such process may well be set up here. The poor man in the country must be made to feel that he has something stronger to look to than the boycott of the local squire. The Budget will do something to break that power; and with it should be linked a force of protection and appeal which will make it look not only odious but ridiculous.

BRITISH POLICY IN TURKEY.

A new Grand Vizier has once more been installed at the Sublime Porte—the seventh since those troubled days, eighteen months ago, when Ferid Pasha fell before the first rising of the Young Turks. Hakki Pasha has an anxious task to face. Merely to maintain equilibrium is a sufficiently onerous problem, and as yet Turkish statesmen have hardly had leisure to think of more than that. Outside, the European Powers stand massed in rival camps, and Ottoman diplomacy must reckon with the jealousy between Russia and Austria, and the competition between the Germans and ourselves. The Cretan question does not near a solution. Greece is in chaos, Servia unstable, and Bulgaria, ready and firm, needs adroit handling. At home, there are once more the beginnings of racial unrest in Macedonia. The massacres of Adana have not even yet been adequately punished, and while civilised opinion deplores this failure, there is a school among the Young Turks which thinks that even the hesitating punishments which have as yet been meted out to guilty Moslems were rashly severe. The Armenians are disillusioned, and in the back regions of Asia Minor the ancient fanaticism lurks angry and sullen. The finances have yet to be set in order. The Christians have yet to be incorporated in the army. The demands of the centralising faction have somehow to be reconciled with the ancient privileges of the Christian churches and schools—a faction which would repress even a nationalist literary club or a workmen's trade union. In the capital it has not yet been found possible to dispense with martial law. These are the urgent problems, and while they are still unsettled, it is vain to hope for the re-organisation of justice, or for the promotion of an economic revival. The chances are that Hakki Pasha will come and go without transforming the conditions which he finds around him. The making of a new Turkey will be the work of a generation at least. A revolution effected by a small if enlightened minority creates the possibility of an organic change; it does not and cannot effect the change itself. It will be well if Turkey can make in thirty years the progress which Bulgaria made in ten. "Yavash, yavash"—ca'canny—is the first phrase which the traveller picks up when he crosses the moral frontier of Europe. Against the temperament which it expresses the almost European energy of the Young Turks is destined to fret and wear itself through long years of friction and trial.

It is well at such a moment to ask ourselves what part we have played in helping the Turkish people through the first phases of their difficulties. That we unanimously desired to help them is certain, and that Sir Edward Gray personified this tendency is equally beyond question. An outspoken contribution to this discussion has just appeared from the veteran pen of Sir William Ramsay ("The Revolution in Constantinople and Turkey," Hodder & Stoughton). Twenty years of travelling and digging in Asia Minor, a colloquial knowledge of Turkish and Greek, many friendships, and a shrewd habit of judgment, have made him a witness of high authority in the affairs of the Near East. No British Ambassador since Sir William White, and no journalist save Sir Edwin Pears, could claim so intimate a knowledge of the Turkish people. An ambassador, indeed, must always depend on such second-hand knowledge as he can pick up in the capital from a limited circle of informants through the medium of English or French. Sir William Ramsay, in this diary of his residence in the capital during the April revolution, records the same very critical opinion of British diplomacy which we had ourselves expressed at the time in these columns. The history of a deplorable blunder goes back, we believe, even further than Sir William Ramsay carries it. Throughout the period of German ascendancy under Abdul Hamid our Embassy formed its own forecast of the future. His death could not be far distant, and when he died it was believed that a group of the better Pashas, most of them very old, and most of them Anglophile, would emerge to save the remnants of Turkey. Kiamil and "Kutchuk" Said Pashas, who both owed their lives to British protection, were the most notable members of the group. On them our diplomacy based its hopes. Of the Young Turkish movement it knew nothing. It might have known more. The editor of "l'Humanité" knew something six months before the revolution, and a member of the Balkan Committee published early in January an article which proved that a sympathetic student of Turkish affairs could even then glean something of what was coming. When the revolution did come, this official opinion clung to its earlier diagnosis. It did not realise that the Young Turks were the real masters of the situation, and imagined that against an army, a great secret society, and a fervent idea, the mere experience of men like Kiamil Pasha would enable them to rule. Kiamil early allied himself to the little Liberal group, which had no footing in the army, few roots in the provinces, and a following in the Chamber, which, in moments of crisis, numbered no more than eight.

This group had done nothing effective to make the revolution or earn a disinterested admiration. It was linked with cosmopolitan finance, and latterly it, or some of its members, formed an alliance with Yildiz and the reaction to overthrow the Young Turks. Even then it did not seem to forfeit a certain measure of official sympathy, and the "Times" actually welcomed the coup d'état which for a few weeks imperilled the Constitution. Sir William Ramsay is justly severe, especially to the "Times," while he recognises the good work done by the Balkan Committee to counteract the mistakes of official England. It had built on Kiamil Pasha and his faction. His fall for the moment destroyed our influence—and, indeed, our too ostentatious and partisan patronage did something to promote his fall. Meanwhile, the Germans had read the situation with a simple, realistic good sense. They saw, what everyone outside a narrow circle in Constantinople could also see, that the army of the Young Turks must be for many years to come the one force to reckon with in Turkey. The result is, as Sir William Ramsay thinks, that German prestige, which stood at zero during the revolution, is now second to none in Turkey, while our influence, which was higher than it had been since the Crimean War, is now gravely compromised.

The chapter of mistakes unfortunately does not close with the period covered by this book. For a generation British diplomacy had been reproached, and justly reproached, with its indifference to the interests of British traders in Turkey. Sir William Ramsay gives an amusing illustration. The late Sultan would never tolerate electricity, because he supposed that dynamos have some connection with dynamite. But the importation of electrical plant was none the less legal. An English trader, who wished to buy this machinery in England, went to the British Consul to ask him to secure for him the right to import it. He refused. The German Consul was more enterprising, and the order, soon followed by eight others, went to a German firm. In this instance we failed to give the sort of protection which our traders have the right to demand. A somewhat violent reaction from this indifference seems to have set in of late, and our diplomacy has now gone to the other extreme. The giving of an order to Krupp or Schneider used to be a question of high politics at the German and French Embassies. From that sort of competition we were proud to stand aloof. To-day we intervene to back our subjects in the hunt for concessions and monopolies. There is little doubt that Hilmi Pasha fell from power primarily because he had been induced to grant to the Lynch Company a monopoly of navigation on the Tigris and Euphrates—a privilege at which the people of Bagdad naturally looked askance. The Young Turks wish to develop their country, and they welcome foreign capital. But above all they prize their independence, and nothing is so certain to make any Power suspect as the use of pressure to secure an unpopular monopoly in trading. This tendency, if it should be carried much further, will certainly ruin what is left of our influence. The most disastrous form which it could take would be a nagging rivalry with Germany for facilities of profit. We are glad to see that Sir William Ramsay advocates an understanding with Germany in the commercial development of Turkey. If it were to be carried out with some regard for the susceptibilities of Turkish public opinion, and, above all, for the interests of the peasantry, who are now fleeced so cruelly to make the guaranteed revenues of the railways, it would contribute, not merely to the good-will of the two Powers, but also to the material advancement of Turkey.

THE RE-ORGANISER OF THE FLEET.

It is impossible to pass unnoticed the retirement last Tuesday of the remarkable man who, for five-and-a-half years, has held the highest command in our first line of defence. Without disparaging his predecessors, we may say that his own genius and the circumstances of the time combined to render his tenure of office as First Sea Lord by far the most memorable of recent years. During that office he succeeded in carrying into effect a sweeping and comprehensive scheme of changes which had taken definite shape in his mind at least two years before his final promotion. His plans met with inevitable opposition, for of all conservative mankind the Navy runs neck and neck with the Army as to which is the more conservative. His methods were criticised, perhaps, more violently still, and, indeed, a certain brusqueness—the impatient intolerance of a reformer in action—laid them more open to criticism. For the change to be accomplished was incalculable, and the time short. With more truth, it may be said that he worked for “a good Press,” that his rule suffered from these tactics, and that on one occasion he yielded to an idle scare. But now that his task is over, there are few that would withhold their praise from the imagination of so daring an innovator, and the thorough-going capacity which has organised a vast naval revolution. The sincerest flattery has come in the imitation of his designs by all the naval Powers of the world. Writing on the day of his retirement, Count von Reventlow, the chief expert of the German Navy League, thus summed up the opinion of the Continent:—

“With Lord Fisher’s retirement one of the most important organisers the British Navy ever possessed quits the service. He leaves the fleet to his successor prepared in the fullest measure for the war demands of the present, and—as far as energy and foresight can do—also fully equal to the demands of the future.”

His memory in our naval records will be connected with two points chiefly: the introduction of the “Dreadnought” type, and the reconstitution of our strategy. These two points were in origin quite independent. We mean that the fleet would have been re-organised on its present basis if the “Dreadnought” had never been thought of. But at the same time the invention of the “Dreadnought” undoubtedly increased the necessity of the other far more important change. It has been often said that the idea of the “Dreadnought” was a disaster. So it was. Every advance in armament from the days of flint chips and bows and arrows has been a disaster, especially for the nation that had special skill in flints or archery. Our long-bows were ever victorious till gunpowder came; the sailors of our wooden walls cursed at steam for the ruin of seamanship; and when ironclads came in, we had to reconstruct our navy. The “Dreadnought” was bound to come, though the method in which it came, and the way in which its coming was advertised, were most unfortunate. Before our own ship was conceived, the Japanese had begun laying down the “Satsuma,” which will rank as a “Dreadnought” in spite of her twofold armament. Before ourselves, the United States were working at the same idea. Admiral Fisher’s service was that he seized the idea and carried it out with such rapidity that we still hold a long lead in construction, whereas we might otherwise have been racing behind, and, perhaps, in vain. We are not among those who take no account of pre-“Dreadnoughts.” We give full consideration to at least forty of those battleships, of which the two “Lord Nelson” class would fight in line with “Dreadnoughts,” and the sixteen “King Edwards” and “Formidables” would match any other fleet at present on the seas. Still, the improved types of “Dreadnought” are likely to remain the most powerful ships for many years to come, and by April we shall have ten completed (not counting the “Lord Nelsons”) against Germany’s two (her other two being behind time); by April, 1912, we shall almost certainly have twenty against Germany’s thirteen at most.

Even if we grant that everyone gets the sum of “Dreadnoughts” different, Admiral Fisher has secured to us the superiority of speed and construction. The cost is appalling, but without his economies it would be almost intolerable. In the criticism of his concentration of the fleet in home waters this point of economy is often overlooked. Yet it has been calculated at a saving of £28,000,000 in five years, and the saving is permanent. It is not only that about 150 ships that were useless for fighting have been scrapped, and their upkeep saved; nor only that by this means 11,000 officers and men have been added to the efficient navy without extra expense. The mere proximity of our greatest fleet to the central base at home is in itself an immense saving in the cost of coal, provisions, and general supply. Strategically, the wisdom of the concentration is hardly questioned now. In these days of wireless telegraphy and rapid movement, where else should the mass of our fleet be but at the heart of the Empire, always ready to move to the point of danger? If Germany had no navy at all, the Home fleet would still be where it is—the first and second divisions with eight battleships apiece always in full commission; the third and fourth divisions with their full numbers of every class of ship constantly manned by nucleus crews that, in the third division, now amount to three-fifths of the full complement, and can be brought up to strength at once by the balance-crews from the depots. Formerly, on mobilisation about one-third of the necessary complements were drawn from the reserves. Last summer some 350 ships were mobilised at extraordinary speed without drawing on the reserves at all. And the men of the nucleus crews go into active service, not only with a knowledge of their ship, but with a knowledge of their officers and each other—the very basis of discipline and concerted action.

Besides the Home Fleet, with its full complement of armored cruisers, protected cruisers, and destroyers, there is the Atlantic Fleet always ready to come to its assistance with six battleships and a cruiser squadron; the Mediterranean Fleet with six battleships, a cruiser squadron, and destroyers; and the Eastern or China Fleet with a cruiser squadron, to say nothing of smaller bodies of cruisers in Australia, the Cape, India, and elsewhere. But we have ceased to scatter isolated ships all over the world, so that they could be snapped up by the enemy at the first outbreak of war, as the unhappy Russian cruisers were. If we want to "show the flag," we show it in more effective and economical fashion. Nor do we any longer leave the men hanging about on foreign stations till they run slack or sulky. For all commissions Admiral Fisher has reduced the limit from three years to two.

It would be impossible here even to mention his numerous reforms in the internal economy of the Navy. First come his great reform in the status of the engineer officers, and his change in the educational system, by which all officers are now trained together on the same lines till greater specialisation begins, and officers of all grades obtain sufficient knowledge of engineering to be able to work the ship. As to the improvements in the men's comfort, from increases of pay right down to the introduction of periodicals, lantern lectures, and manufactured tobacco, a very useful list of all such reforms during the Fisher régime was published in the "Army and Navy Gazette" for last Saturday. But most significant of all is the fact that never before have so many men been promoted to commissioned ranks from the lower deck.

Lord Fisher is a democrat and reformer by birth and nature. He has owed nothing to family, wealth, or influence. He has never been a man of words; it is true he has made significant speeches, but we believe there have only been two of them. By persistent energy he raised himself to the opportunity of command, and, using that opportunity to the full, he has raised the power of the navy to far the highest point reached in our history. And yet he has yielded to the outcries of panic less than most of his modern predecessors, and he has certainly not joined the Service men who, in Lord Salisbury's words, clamor for the fortification of the moon. On the whole, he has regulated his demands for expenditure, not by what he might hope to get, but by what the Navy needed. With a careful eye for economy, he has carried through one of the greatest and most daring schemes of reconstruction and re-organisation in the history of our Services, and the country is happy to retain his powers of imagination and efficiency on the Committee of Imperial Defence.

Life and Letters.

"SUGGESTION" IN ELECTIONEERING.

THE cynic, which most men seem to keep among their various selves, half as critic half as jailer, has a glorious time during a General Election. What a Human Nature he finds exhibited on platform and placard, in the railway and the street! What a contrast between the theory of popular self-government in which the free and independent elector, concerned for the welfare of his country, after reasonable consideration of the claims of rival policies and parties, registers his judgment, and the actual process by which he is "got to vote." When one studies the art of electioneering, one is driven to ask whether the ordinary elector is to be credited with the possession of any knowledge of history or current fact, or with any power of drawing correct inferences—in other words, whether, for electioneering purposes, truth enjoys any advantage over a lie. It is indeed usually assumed that a lie is more likely to be "found out" than the truth. But when it is a matter of single, short-time lies, even this assumption is deemed questionable in face of actual experience. Take, for instance, a champion lie of the election, the statement that the Tories gave Old Age Pensions; it is singular that in constituencies where this statement was used more electors went to the poll believing it than not. Or take, again, the monstrous inference, upon which Mr. Balfour staked the credit of a long political career, that food-taxes would cheapen food; did the inherent unreason of the statement gravely detract from its electioneering efficiency? "Magna est veritas," no doubt, "et prevalebit" in the long run. But the art of electioneering is that of getting the electors on a short run. The art is not, indeed, able to dispense with reasoning: among northern Britons, at any rate, there is a strong vein of intellectual curiosity running through their composition. Some of them want to understand the why and wherefore of the policy they are invited to approve; they want to test both fact and inference. Where there is a good stiffening of such minds in a constituency, it furnishes a strong barrier against the emotional rushes upon which the art of electioneering so largely depends.

For the popular art frankly discards all attempt to appeal to reason. By vigorous arts it works upon the primitive emotions of love, hate, greed, pugnacity, contempt, caution, gregariousness, servility, and pride. As Mr. Graham Wallas rightly observes, "The empirical art of politics consists largely in the creation of opinion by the deliberate exploitation of sub-conscious non-rational inference." In other words, to suggest facts and inferences constitutes the chief task of the electioneer, so far as he is concerned with forming opinion. Now, the nature of the suggestions will, of course, vary with the emotions which are to be unconsciously exploited. Some people are moved more powerfully by hopes than by fears, by hatred than by love, by combativeness than by caution. In America or in Australia the democracy would respond feebly or not at all to the appeals to authority and respectability which operate so effectively in English rural districts. In new countries, where men are sanguine and development proceeds apace, the staple of skilled electioneering consists of bright, confident promises of early material gains. In Great Britain, especially in this contest, the unprecedented bitterness of the struggle is largely due to the depressing or exasperating nature of the suggestions. Almost all the powerful appeals are to fear, hate, and contempt. Promises of positive gains, appeals to a brighter and a better future, to pride and glory, are rare and unconvincing. On both sides it has been a campaign of emotional intimidation. On the one side the peer, the landlord, the brewer have been held up to reprobation; on the other side the German, the Socialist, and Mr. Lloyd George. The Liberals did not succeed in making much play with their policy of national development for the positive betterment of the life of the people, nor can it be maintained that the claim that "a tariff meant work for all" formed a particularly alluring prospect. The really profitable suggestions on the Conservative side were those of fear: fear of the foreigner, of a German invasion, of increased taxation, of unemployment most of all. Against these the Liberals staked other fears, of landlords, dear food, trusts, the destruction of representative government. They were fighting reaction; their positive promises counted next to nothing. The large number of Conservative gains obliges us to admit that they made their "fears" more effective. Perhaps they may be described as better electioneering "fears"; they were certainly more widely and more effectively advertised.

This is precisely where the money-power comes in. Suggestions gain by reiteration: this is the first law of advertising. The same suggestion, however, does not work in every mind. Unemployment, German invasion, Socialism, Home Rule, have different emotional values and meanings for different parts of the country and for the several trades and classes. The Press, the platform, the hoarding, the public-house, the pulpit, can all be utilised for hammering these fears into the weak intelligence of the weaker-headed elector. Why have these fears worked so differently in North and South, in big industrial cities and in country villages? It is no doubt partly a matter of education. Everybody is liable to be afraid when he is in the dark. The standard of working-class education and intelligence is quite undeniably lower in the South than in the North, in villages than in towns. The bogeys that frighten the rustic out of his wits are a subject of derision to the town artisan.

It is not, however, merely a question of superior intelligence. Electioneering does not consist merely in the fabrication of opinion, but in coercion or the forcible direction of voting power. Never within living memory have the acts of individual intimidation and corruption, legal and illegal, been used so freely and with so much effect. This seems inevitable wherever there is money in politics. With a shallow pride Englishmen have contrasted the purity of our politics with the bribery, booting, and knavery of American elections. Hitherto such corruption and personal intimidation as have prevailed in our elections have mostly proceeded from the unorganised individual pressure of local landowners or employers, a blend of menace and servile submission among shopkeepers and laborers, usually concealed and never openly defended.

This election marks a signal change, bringing us definitely nearer the machine politics of the American party system with its organisation of trades and localities, its armies of paid agents and bosses, its corruption fund, and its elaborate business methods of pumping false suggestions into the electorate. The liquor trade has, indeed, for a generation been in this business. But Bung's methods are clumsy; the "booze" gets into his head and blurs his plans; the American politician uses the saloon, but does not go there to learn strategy. The new feature in our electioneering is the entrance of organised trades seeking for "spoils." The proposal to revert to a protective tariff has already begun to befoul and poison our politics by streams of electioneering money furnished by business men who hope to get it back with ample interest in protective duties on their goods. Allied with these are resentful landowners anxious to defend the privileges they have hitherto enjoyed against the just demands of the Budget.

But the constructive underlying policy is that of the conspiracy of trades which have delivered themselves up to the protectionist design. The explanation of the Birmingham sphere of influence is not found only in the personal magnetism of a defunct statesman, but in the fact that Birmingham is the Philadelphia of England, standing in the midst of a Pennsylvania, which has developed a powerful political system directed to secure tariff-plunder to the local trades. In Pennsylvania the Republican Party levies its tolls upon the manufacturers of the State; it freezes out any business or professional man who does not loyally contribute; local as well as State and national politics lie entirely in its hands; all State and municipal officials are appointed on a political test, must perform party service and pay their contribution to the party fund. Magisterial justice is debauched, profitable "franchises" and contracts are exchanged for party services, the manipulation of the electoral machinery is entirely in the party hands. Though "boodle" and "graft" take various shapes, the central object of all the elaborate machinery of corruption is the tariff, the legal right to loot the consumer and the non-protected trades.

The Birmingham machine, though originally fashioned for other purposes, has been conveniently adapted to this end, and it may be regarded as the nucleus of a wider national system of corruption which, with the now sharpening hope of a protective tariff, will grow among those trades which calculate that they can get a sufficient pull upon the next Conservative Government. The nature and purposes of the system cannot be too carefully studied. At present the constructive policy of Protection has not spread widely outside the groups of metal trades round Birmingham, though its false gospel of "employment" has been preached with efficacy wherever poor, ignorant, and unassociated working men are found.

One great lesson of the election is to indicate the extent and modes of the political suggestions which Protection can employ. Though the plain interests of our great staple manufactures and the great commercial and financial industries related to them have proved a stout bulwark of defence for Free Trade, history does not justify us in relying upon these defences as all-sufficient. Education and a vigorous policy of social reconstruction, designed primarily to secure fuller employment of our natural and human resources, are the essential methods of combating the false suggestions upon which Protectionists rely for promoting their nefarious designs. A Liberal Party should appeal more insistently to the positive motives of hope, development, further progress, and prosperity, expelling the emotional suggestions of reactionaries by a sane and practical idealism.

THE BATTLE OF THE SCHOOLS IN FRANCE.

THREE months ago one of the new Provincial Councils in China was discussing by what systematic means the superstitions of the peasantry could be eradicated. The dragons still lurk under the hill where the treasures of ore and coal are concealed. The pots and pans of a million homes are made to rattle at the demon which devours the moon in time of eclipse. On fire with their faith in positive knowledge, never doubting the absolute supremacy of reason and the final authority of science, the younger literati and the Westernised mandarins, fresh from their Japanese schools and their American colleges, proceed to use their embryo Constitution to sweep away this refuse of faith, and to establish in its place a new dogmatism more absolute than the books of Confucius. Last week in Paris itself, city of light, cradle of this positive spirit, the greatest masters of French prose, the illuminati of our most recent thought, mounted the tribune of their national council to break a lance for the old ways, to put a spoke in reason's wheel, and to plead the rights of instinct and arbitrary choice and revealed authority. It is a startling contrast. In the things of the mind as in the things of nature, is it destined that one half of the earth shall move into shadow, while the other half swings into dawn? Lucretius sang the emancipation of the human mind from fear and superstition, and hardly was his poem a classic before the mysteries of the East, the rites of Osiris, the initiations of Mithras, were enthralling the race whose freedom he had sung. They do not deal in dragons in the French Chamber. But MM. Denys Cochin and M. Barrès were ready to cite pragmatism and to appeal to Bergson in their attack upon a national system of education based on reason and experimental science. The thin, perfervid rhetoric of the professed Clericals had passed unheeded in the controversy. It was the exquisite sceptic, the doubter of all reasoned thinking, who was called in to render intellectually formidable the argument which aimed at re-establishing a Roman education in France. So among ourselves it is the author of "Philosophic Doubt" who is the most determined advocate of denominational schools. The sceptic wishes he were as sure of anything as the scientist is of everything, and straightway he works to enforce that other certainty of the priest.

It is sometimes the fashion among ourselves to depreciate the moral and intellectual value of Parliamentary life in France, but assuredly it would be impossible to parallel from our own debates those formidable discussions in which MM. Cochin, Barrès, and Jaurès took part. Lord Londonderry does not cite Bergson—we do not suppose he ever heard of Bergson—nor would Mr. Henderson refute the pragmatist position in an oration of three hours. Beneath these fascinating excursions into metaphysics a very practical problem awaited decision. The Clericals, backed by the sceptics, were engaged in an assault upon the whole spirit of the State schools. Their neutrality, so ran the argument, is a sham. While they profess neither to attack nor to teach revealed religion, they do, in fact, instil a positive spirit and a human morality which is at variance with all the traditions of the Church. To extol the supremacy of reason is itself an offence; to found conduct on any basis other than commandment is a defiance of authority. A Protestant mind may seize the standpoint with difficulty, but in a Catholic country the complaint is sufficiently serious. A clever boy, who has caught, from an enthusiastic teacher, anything of his own attitude, may leave the school without any formulated agnostic tenet in his mind, but he has none the less learned to reason on lines which must make him proof against the simpler influence of the village curé. The Middle Ages are far behind him, and little though he knows of science, he has divined something of the scientific temper. He is raw material for the various forms of progressive propaganda which will seek to attract him as he grows to manhood—for Socialism, or militant Radicalism, which, in France, is violently anti-clerical, for Free Masonry, and for the popular workmen's colleges which have of late years reached such a hopeful development under the wing of Socialism.

The influences, moreover, against which the Clericals protest in these State schools go far beyond the inculcation of a positive way of thinking. The teaching of history is linked with lessons on civic duty, and a teacher who wishes to exert a real influence on the mind of future citizens finds here a text as intimate and instructive as all the books of Kings and Chronicles. One orator, for example, in these debates complained of a text-book which denounced the wars of Louis XIV. and the first Napoleon as an offence by France against its duty to Europe. What, he argued, was this but the seed of anti-militarism and anti-patriotism? And in a sense he was right. A boy who has learned to abhor the ravaging of the Palatinate, may come to have his own point of view about the bombardment of Casablanca. The manuals in use in the Clerical schools have, it appears, their own theocratic reading of history, in which every national success is the reward of fidelity to the Church, and every national disaster the punishment of rebellion. But one doubts whether it is a pure concern for the souls and consciences of the children which inspires this hostility to the lay school. The real objection to it is, one suspects, that it is apt to be a nursery for trade unionism or Socialism. That is doubtless why, in some departments, employers have lately taken to dismissing workmen who send their children to the "Republican" school. It is from the Clerical school that the peasant is recruited who will vote for a "Nationalist" deputy, and there the workman is trained who will enlist in one of the "yellow" or "black-leg" organisations.

Underneath this controversy lies that profoundly militant conception of nationality which explains so much in the history of France. There rarely prevails a placid sense of unity among all who happen to be born of one race within her boundaries. The unity is always something which has to be won against foreign foes and internal enemies, against the traitor on the right flank and the undisciplined pioneer on the left. The experiences of the early years of the Revolution have moulded all the imaginations of a century. Most citizens, it is true, are Republicans, but they must be for ever closing their ranks and sounding the rally. Nor does Republicanism mean a mere passive acquiescence in a certain established form of government. It implies a whole attitude of mind. It is scarcely to be reconciled with any acceptance of the Church. It has its intellectual basis, not merely in the Rights of Man, but also in the denial of authority. The nearest approach to it in our own experience is the Orange tradition in Ireland, save only that the Orangeman is Protestant instead of being Agnostic. It is easy to denounce such a conception of nationality as intolerant and narrow, but it does, after all, put into practice Mazzini's definition of a fatherland based on the community of history and ideals. A State which aspires to have such an intellectual basis will use its schools as its organs. They are its established church. Of what service is it that a nation has a common history, unless it has reached in some degree a common reading of that history? If modern France is consciously founded on the Revolution, she acts reasonably in teaching to all her children the accepted view of that revolution, and in training their minds to grasp its broad ideas. Disaster, moral and intellectual, may come of it. The ideas themselves may be defective. The attempt to reach a positive and humane morality may fail.

But this, at least, one must recognise. There is here an attempt to give content and meaning to the idea of nationality. Men trained on this system will have a solidarity, a capacity for working and thinking in concert, which no mere neutrality or anarchism in education could render possible. The alternative, the demand of the clericals, is really the sterilising of all education. They claim to teach in their own "free" schools a view of life which is simple indeed, but very definite and far-reaching. They would exclude from the State schools any teaching of a view of life at all. Reading and writing, it is true, the child would acquire, but history for him would be only a mass of dates, and the Heavens would neither tell the glory of God nor illustrate an iron law. The child would grow up immune from the pieties and traditions of the past, innocent alike of cosmogony and legend, yet a stranger to all the thinking of the present. Nothing should be taught, said one orator, to which any parent not a lunatic could take exception. That rule might include useful knowledge and the practical branches, but it would exclude all that makes knowledge live, and deprive the teacher, who joins in France an enlightened civic spirit to a high sense of his professional duty, of his deepest ambitions.

The mass of thinking Frenchmen are evidently satisfied with this secular teaching. It answers their needs and satisfies their ideals. It was defended in the Chamber with the utmost enthusiasm, not merely by a brilliant thinker like M. Jaurès, but by one of the worker-miners among the Socialist deputies, who told in homely phrase how his teacher in the elementary school taught him to think. It may be that in our present phase of development we stand in need of this collective intellectual discipline. But the price paid in the loss of individual liberty is a heavy one, and the risk of creating a drab uniformity of mind is no less real. The better the school is, and the more completely it realises its conception, the less room does it leave for the growth of varieties of temper and belief. There may be no actual dragooning of the conscience, no deliberate sin against tolerance. But there is a steady pressure towards sameness, a drilling and regimenting of minds. But to dwell on that loss is a sentimentality. The practical alternatives are a dead education or no education at all. The Church would impose a still harsher uniformity, and a really "neutral" schooling would not cultivate the mind.

"THE DECENT CHURCH."

To exult over a powerful but fallen foe may be excused as human; but if the foe was weak to start with, and the conquering force an overwhelming multitude, the vulgarity of exultation admits of no forgiveness. When the poor leavings of an enslaved and homeless people crept in shuddering haste from the sea to the desert, and turned to behold the walls of water falling in thunder upon the chariots and cavalry of their oppressor's host, then Miriam with her timbrel could sing to the Lord because He had triumphed gloriously. Sisera the Canaanite had three hundred chariots of iron, and when they were discomfited, and Sisera slept with a nail fastening his head to the ground, then the prophetess could raise the shout, "Awake, awake, Deborah, awake, awake, utter a song!" It was a fine boast of an Assyrian King that he would avenge himself on all the earth and send out captains to destroy all flesh that did not obey his commandments; and when Judith had put his captain's head in her bag of meal, she could sing with just triumph how her sandals had ravished his eyes, her beauty took his mind prisoner, and the fauchion passed through his neck. To victories of such deliverance it would be inhuman to refuse exultation, but to celebrate triumphs upon the weak, the destitute, and the oppressed no timbrels sound over the dark sea, and none but the vulgar call on each other to awake and utter a song.

Such illustrations from sacred history may be the more readily admitted because we have the Church of England in mind. The Church of England, though still militant in common with the whole Church here on earth, is rather apt to play the Church triumphant, and in one or two instances lately she has been triumphing far from gloriously. The Vicar of St. John's, Plumstead, has probably heard enough of his intended "Special Thanksgiving Service to Almighty God for the timely deliverance of Woolwich and Plumstead from the hands of the Socialists and Sabbathbreakers," at which service the Te Deum was to be used instead of the processional and recessional hymns. We are not acquainted with the parochial circumstances that made the Vicar specially anxious to do something for the Fourth Commandment, and led him to suppose that Socialists are more addicted than other people to the sin of Sabbath-breaking. But, though we are aware that the Christian Powers of Europe have long celebrated the glories of their national arms by a solemn Te Deum chanted in the cathedrals of their metropolis, it seems hardly worthy of our national Church thus to rejoice in St. John's, Plumstead, over the defeat at the polls of Mr. William Crooks, late Labor member for Woolwich.

Happily, the Bishop of Woolwich agrees with us, and the special thanksgiving was prohibited. Dr. Leeke forbade it for the reason that it was "an offence to the religious instincts and feeling of fellow Churchmen and Nonconformists who honestly take a very different view of the situation from that held by the Vicar." We recognise the ironic simplicity of the sentence, and are grateful. But the Bishop passes over the deeper offence of the proposal without notice. Rightly or wrongly, Mr. Crooks was standing for what he honorably believed to be the cause of the poor, and in the school of poverty he had himself learnt the meaning of that cause. The view of the situation held by the Vicar was violently opposite. It is a view that has a right to be represented and never fails of representation, but without offence we may call it the view of the rich, the powerful, and the comfortable class, as contrasted with the Labor cause of Mr. Crooks. We do not here complain about the success or defeat of one side or the other. We only say that to celebrate Mr. Crooks's defeat by a Te Deum was to triumph over the cause of the weak, to sound the loud timbrel over the destitute and oppressed, and Miriam could not have done that without vulgarity.

We do not expect much from the Church of England, but her constant alliance with prosperity sometimes seems a little inconsequent when we remember that her priests claim succession from men who were sent out to preach the Gospel to the poor. Canon Lyttelton, the Head Master of Eton, belongs to that succession, but we need not go back to his remarks about back-doors and blind kittens, for he may plead in excuse that he is compelled to make that kind of speech in order to maintain the reputation of his school for manners, and to keep up its numbers by flattering the class from which it draws. This is the sort of thing that Canon Lyttelton's public wants, and we ask no man to quarrel with his bread and butter. Still less would we disparage the Rector of Barton Seagrave, whose remarkable almanack for the present year has been revealed, "Sub Rosa," to the world in the "Morning Leader." He therein calls upon his parishioners to choose this month between Lloyd George & Co. on the one hand, and on the other "God and our grand Constitution . . . God and the British Tar. God and the Grenadiers. God and the Fatherland and the fellowship of the loyal Colonies," concluding his adjuration with the words, "As for me and my house, we will serve God and the Conservatives"—a very binding pledge upon himself and the other occupants of his rectory. No one could seriously object to that. "God and the Grenadiers!" Let us remember it with thankfulness. It beats the Kaiser on his own field, and the Rector is cheaper at the price. We only think, as before, that it comes a little strangely from the successor of those men who were sent out to preach peace, and were commanded to provide neither gold, nor silver, nor brass in their purses, nor scrip for the journey, nor bread, nor shoes, nor staves, nor two coats apiece.

As we said, we do not expect much from the Church of England. The English nature, rich in so much that is admirable, has never been rich in sanctitude, and every "Establishment" sinks almost necessarily into the bog of stagnation. The best that has been expected of our Church in the past has been a certain decency on which she prided herself. To quote Oliver Goldsmith's line, "The decent Church that topp'd the neighboring hill" has been her emblem. To quote Dean Church of St. Paul's, "a sober worldliness" has been her character. Hume praised her as "a Church tending to keep down fanaticism." Wordsworth commended her as supplying one man of culture in every village, and it is, perhaps, noticeable that this clerical gentleman of culture should be represented in our literature by two such drivelling lines as "A Mr. Wilkinson, a clergyman," and Tennyson's "That good man, the clergyman," who told the May Queen words of peace. But still, there he was, and Wordsworth, who spoke with knowledge, having written a dreary pageant of sonnets upon the Church of England's history, thought him worth preserving. The village clergyman represented the religious aspect of the country. "When I mention religion," said Parson Thwackum in "Tom Jones," "I mean the Christian religion; and not only the Christian religion, but the Protestant religion; and not only the Protestant religion, but the Church of England." In Handel's church at Little Stanmore there is a tomb to a Countess of Pembroke, whereon we are informed that, besides being the chaste partner of her husband's bed and board, she was religious without enthusiasm. No doubt, the phrase was a side-stroke at those troublesome Wesleyans, but it was at that time a very suitable epitaph for the Church of England herself.

From religion without enthusiasm there is but a stride to the country parsonage with paddock and wall-fruit, tennis-court, and charming daughters, suitable conveyance for visits in the county, and a cultivated acquaintance with a terrestrial lord. Such were the outposts of Conservatism in which, as John Sterling said, the Church kept "a black dragoon for every parish, on good pay and rations, horse-meat and man's-meat, to patrol and battle for these things." From religion without enthusiasm arose the ignoble alliance between the Church militant and the world at rest—between the sword of the spirit and those that are at ease in England. For this reason the Church throughout the country must still be described as the Church of a class, and not of a nation, and that class is the one furthest removed from the workpeople and the poor. It was to the poor that the Apostles were sent, but how the villagers would jump if they saw their parson leading the life of the Twelve and following the Order of the Empty Purse! So it is that the Church as a body has enrolled itself on the side of contentment and inertia. That is why it is not even worth while to run an opponent against the Tory candidate for Oxford University, for the country parson, outdoing Mark Pattison's precept, not only dines with the Tories, but votes with them, too. And that is why one or two of the clergy, with less decency of restraint than the rest, boldly vow to serve God and the Conservatives, describe the Liberal statesmen as worse than blind kittens, and call upon their congregations to raise the Te Deum for the defeat of Mr. William Crooks.

We are aware that within the dry bones of the Established Church there is a spirit moving; in that rather stodgy dough a leaven is here and there mysteriously at work. Among her clergy there are many to whom the Via Media remains an abhorrent path unless it can be converted into a Via Sacra, or even a Via Dolorosa. The passion for sanctitude, so rare in the history of our country and our national Church, has here and there been kindled, and, like all high passion, it is an incalculable thing, multiplying itself like flame. As with the passionate saints of Italy and France, it has brought in its company the sense of fellowship in mortal things, and the dignity of a devotion that fears no earthly loss, whether of position or repute. In such men as Father Dolling and a few living names that we could mention, we see that even the respectability of an Established Church cannot altogether stifle the spirit that seeks continually to transfigure the world. Yet, like other English saints—like Bunyan and Fox and the Wesleys and Newman—Dolling was not allowed a sphere for his spirit within the national communion, and this is the account he gave of the reason only eight years ago:—

"Though to-day nearly all the things which the Bishops condemned twenty years ago they recognise and approve, still, they have but one opportunist canon of conduct: Be commonplace, be respectable after the sober manner of the ritual of the Church of England. On the day of Pentecost it was said of some that they were drunk with new wine. Would to God we could see our prelates thus inebriated, or, at any rate, permitting some of their followers to be so!"

Perhaps it is because the Established Church has so little use for such men that the country has so little use for her, except as a picturesque relic or a symbol of gentility, steady in its support of comfortable abuses. So paralyzing has been the touch of religion without enthusiasm; so reluctant is mankind to rise to the call of mediocrity, no matter how golden.

Short Studies.

THE DECLARATION OF THE POLL.

THE life of the little market town is quiet enough on ordinary days. Some might call it dull, but life is never dull, and life goes on there, with neighbors' gossip, and buying and selling, and the humdrum worship of the gods, as it must have done two thousand years ago in a town of the Sabine Hills. But on Thursday of last week it was the scene of unwonted excitement, for that was the day of the declaration of the result of the poll. The contest between two worthy gentlemen had been fought out with great rowdyism and good humor, and the grey flat fen had been filled with color and with noise. The Liberal candidate was a gilded youth with a winning boyish face; the Tory a burly man of the people with a fine presence and grey massive head. Their colors were blue and red, and these colors were to be seen everywhere, together with the images of the candidates. Their pictures were in every window, and the butcher and the baker and the chimney-sweep drove about their business with reins twisted with red and blue ribbons. Many wore medals of the boyish face, or of the massive head, as a pilgrim wears a vernicle. There was in all the countryside a briskness and cheeriness, as of the neighborhood of some great pilgrimage shrine.

Last Thursday was to be the climax of all that cheery time. The writer resolved to leave his usual seclusion and journey into the market town to witness the declaration of the result. The crawling train, as it stopped at the little country station, was already packed. The writer anxiously scanned compartment after compartment, and saw no place literally for the sole of his foot, but made a hasty dive into the last carriage, where a seat was found for him with ready courtesy. He saw at once that he was in a very fervid atmosphere. The carriage was very red indeed. These young farmers were going to witness the triumph of the good friend and neighbor for whom they had worked so hard. They were such thoroughly good fellows, under the thick coating of irrational prejudice in which they were encased. They had a bad opinion of Radicals. "I never knew a decent Liberal yet," said one. "Ever see such a lot as were on Phillips's platform?" put in another, to all appearance a country butcher; "I saw just such a lot once before, when I went up to London. I went to a wax-work show, and I went downstairs into a little room—dirty little hole, they called it the Chamber of 'Orrors. There they all was, just such a lot o' Radicals. There was Marwood among 'em—just in his right place, he was—just where he was wanted." "Whatever happens," said another, "I've had the best time of my life. I wish there was an election every week." "As I got home one morning," a youth put in, "Mother was gettin' the breakfast ready." "If that boy gets in," a young fellow said doubtfully, "Gibbs will never try again." But no!—it could not be. The carriage would not hear of it. The train stopped, and a rag-and-bone man, or perhaps a mole-catcher, thrust himself into the crowded carriage. There was a movement of indignant protest, which the mole-catcher dexterously turned into a shout of welcome by his first words. "I'm coming to cheer the return of my neighbor, Mr. Gibbs—the best man we ever had in Withington." Then came many stories of Mr. Gibbs's goodness, his kindness, his riches, many prophecies of his certain return. The writer parted with regret from the company; he differed from them only in opinion, and he liked them very much.

The market-place of the little town was a seething mass of twenty thousand people. A touch of spring in the air added to the keen brightness of the scene, and flower-sellers moved about among the crowd with the first mimosa and snowy bunches of narcissus from Scilly. There was tense excitement, and much good humor. The time for ferocity was passed; the uses of labor were surely done. Still, here and there one caught remarks which showed how strongly the tide of feeling on both sides was running. The obiter dicta of the blues had not the picturesque, bloodthirsty attractiveness of those of the reds, but they were significant. "They're all Liquorites," a poor woman remarked, wearily; "when did you ever know the Lords give a vote against liquor?" "If these 'ere Lords and Dukes had their way," said a poor little white-faced man, "such as we wouldn't have a vote at all." The writer moved about among the crowd, and shook hands with many Tariff Reformers, who greeted him with a certain suspicious cordiality. They were anxious but confident. The piazza was alive with red and blue, but the red seemed greatly to predominate. The poll had been so heavy that the declaration of the result, which had been expected at half-past eleven, did not take place till nearly one o'clock. In a barber's shop the assistant was strongly Radical, but cynical. "I'd gladly sell my vote for fifty quid," he remarked. It was suggested that he was hardly likely to be offered so much. He at once replied: "I know a man in Sibthorpe who got five pounds for his this time, and he never takes less for it."

When the long-expected moment came, the flying of a blue flag was met by what seemed the larger part of the crowd with blank amazement, stupefaction, refusal to believe. As the news ran among the people the blues grew every moment bolder, and, it seemed, more numerous, but yet hardly dared to trust their eyes and ears. The newspaper boys soon put an end to doubt, running among the crowd with the blank space in their sheets filled in:—

Result—Phillips, 6,660; Gibbs, 6,024.

A tumultuous cheer went up, and the market-place became a sea of wildly tossing blue streamers and handkerchiefs. The long-repressed enthusiasm became every moment wilder. The youthful candidate, now M.P., stood a smiling, boyish figure, above the heads of the surging crowd of his supporters. It was pleasant to think of the lad beginning his career with such a success.

Still, anyone with a little of the milk of human kindness in his composition could not but feel for the disappointment of the defeated candidate, and the genuine personal sorrow of his friends. They took it very hard. Great bitterness was expressed against "the boy." "His mamma's taken him to see the pussies," one young lady remarked. The writer felt that he had now had his fill of politics, and his thoughts turned to luncheon. He went into the inn and sat in solitude over the soup and fish and claret, listening to the roar outside, as the poet sat in Fleet Street at the Cock. The smiling damsel murmured as she brought the dishes, "I am so thankful that Mr. Phillips has got in." With the fish appeared an old fresh-faced, apple-cheeked farmer—one of Stevenson's "old plain men with rosy faces"—and his son. "I've never been so upset by anything in my life," he began, "but I can't understand it. I know Tilney went all right—bless my soul, I took dozens of 'em to the poll yesterday. You should have heard 'em sing out 'Give me a bit o' red ribbon, missus,' as they left their cottages. No—it wasn't Tilney that went wrong. It's them chapel parsons as does it. I been among 'em, and I know 'em. They talk about the tyranny of the Roman Catholic Priests, but it's nothing to their tyranny. They holds a Brotherhood every Sunday night after service, and tells 'em how to vote." "There were only about half a dozen in Tilney as we knew would vote Radical," put in another. "I gave Brown a shilling not to vote, and I know he never went near the polling place all day." (Votes, it appears, did not command so high a price in Tilney as in Sibthorpe.) "Dr. — kept four Radicals in bed, he told me so himself—said it was as much as their lives were worth to go outside. If Lloyd George had shown his face here," he went on with increased ferocity, "he'd never have got away alive." "Lloyd George!" said the old gentleman, "it would be a blessed thing for this country if some one would do for him. I've been reading a little French history lately," he went on, "and I find that about sixty years ago they had just such a fellow in France, and he set 'em all fighting with one another, and when they were weakened by civil war, the Germans came and took their country, at least they would have done, if the French had not paid three millions. If the Germans come here, I'll not fight them, it's the Socialists I'll go for first. One thing in this election I am thankful for—and that is that — has been kicked out. It's been proved that he is a German spy. What we have to do," he concluded, "is to educate the laborers. We've given them their vote before they are fit for it—that's where the whole mischief is. They got the vote too soon." He hesitated a moment, and then said: "I take it, sir, you think that Tariff Reform would raise the price of the food of the poor." "I do, sir," the writer replied, and after stating that, on the contrary, food would be cheaper if taxed, the old gentleman rose and shook hands with him courteously and in a very friendly spirit.

The writer had not yet done with political eloquence. On the return journey an out-voter, who had travelled from the Land's End to vote for the Tariff Reformer, was delivering an impassioned harangue to a crowded carriage. "Sir Edward Grey is a traitor to his country, who ought to be hanged," he was saying. "We must choose between Tariff Reform and Socialism—there is no other alternative." "I understand Tariff Reform to be taking the taxes off necessities," a workman put in, "and putting them on luxuries." "And what is Socialism?" the writer enquired. "Socialism," said the out-voter, "is that we should all be bossed by a Parish Council, who would like nothing better than to set the parson hoeing.

The Drama.

THE CRUDE WOMAN.

THE word "adapted" on a theatrical programme arouses all the worst passions in my soul. Probably, then, I shall do scant justice to "Dame Nature," adapted by Mr. Frederick Fenn from "La Femme Nue" by M. Henry Bataille. Not that the adaptation is ill done, as such things ago. Mr. Fenn has shown ingenuity worthy of a better cause in transforming the play into a sort of Franco-British nondescript, which has ceased to be French without having become English. He has hit on the device of making the male characters, or most of them, English, and bringing the scene, after the first act, over to England, while leaving the female characters French. But by doing so he merely gets his languages into a hopeless tangle, and emphasises the unreality of the whole thing. We are asked to suppose that the Paris Salon on varnishing-day, or its equivalent, is practically peopled with English artists; that the few French painters who wander in and out speak English with a French accent; but that the artists' womenkind—wives, models, &c.—Lolette, Mimi, Suzon, and so forth—all speak free and fluent English, without a trace of accent, unless it be that of Chelsea or Notting Hill! Of course, it is perfectly nonsensical, a jumble of incompatible conventions. How much better it would have been to leave the characters, in name as in nature, French, and simply translate their dialogue, as freely as need be, into natural and speakable English! But perhaps these verbal absurdities and contradictions jar on me disproportionately, because they remind me of the bad old times when there was little else to be heard on the English stage. Nowadays, we can accept an adaptation or two without feeling hopelessly humiliated. But this semi-Anglicisation of French plays is at best a stupid business, on which one is sorry that the author of "Op-o'-me-Thumb" and "The Convict on the Hearth" should waste his time. "Dame Nature" is an anachronism, even if it be an acceptable one.

But is it? Well, that depends, I think, on whether you go to the theatre mainly for the sake of the acting, or mainly for the sake of the play. In the former case, Miss Ethel Irving's performance of Lolette will certainly repay you. It is very remarkable. It shows not only great emotional gifts, but extraordinary originality, daring, and power of rapid transition. I have seldom seen on the stage a more thrilling or more convincing effect than her paroxysm of rage and grief at the end of the second act; while in the third act she runs the whole gamut of vehement emotion with a facility—which means, in other words, a nervous mobility—not often seen among English actresses. The power of working up gradually to an emotional climax is not uncommon; but very much rarer is the gift of flying at a moment's notice from one end of the keyboard to the other, and hitting each note with absolute accuracy. For Miss Irving's acting has restraint as well as power. Its intensity never passes over into extravagance; wherefore it can always be seen with pleasure. There is a good deal of emotional acting which one would pay considerable sums not to see; but Miss Irving's style is far remote from this. From the youthful buoyancy of the first act to the heart-broken melancholy of the last, she portrays every shade of feeling with perfect command of her resources, shirking nothing, overdoing nothing. To anyone who wants to see real acting, as distinct from the more or less accomplished playing-about on the stage which sometimes passes for acting, Miss Irving's Lolette may be warmly commended. Its only flaws occur in an occasional phrase which is so unnatural in English that the actress's instinct gives her no guidance for its intonation.

If, then, it is acting you want, by all means go to the Garrick. (The rest of the company, by the way, are but so-so, always excepting Mr. J. D. Beveridge, who makes the most of a poor enough part.) But if you are—as I am—one of those people to whom the acting means less than the play, I cannot advise you so confidently.

Divesting my mind, so far as possible, of prejudice, I cannot think that "La Femme Nue" was worth doing into English at all. Some of my colleagues, who take the French drama very seriously, assure us that the play, from the title onwards, is symbolic; on which I am tempted to exclaim, in the appropriate idiom, "Oh, là là!" I do not know whether this interpretation of the catchpenny title has been put forward by the author himself; but if that be the case, he has either a very keen sense of humor—or none at all. What! this commonplace little grisette fighting for her man is the essential Woman, is Womanhood laid bare and anatomised! Here be brave words indeed! The same theme has been treated fifty times before, both realistically and symbolically. It has been nobly treated by four of the greatest of modern dramatists—by Ibsen in "The Master Builder," by Maeterlinck in "Aglavaine et Sélysette," by Hauptmann in "Einsame Menschen" and "Die versunkene Glocke," by D'Annunzio in "La Gioconda"—and it has been quite ably handled by a score of lesser men. The struggle between the faithful, unassuming, perhaps rather maladroit, wife, and the brilliant, fascinating enchantress, is actually one of the commonplaces of latter-day drama. Perhaps it is less hackneyed in France than elsewhere, simply because the marriage tie is there taken less seriously (at any rate on the stage), and the usual impulse of the neglected wife is not to fight for her husband's love, but "se venger" with somebody else. Still, one could easily put together a long list of French plays in which the theme is treated in one tone or another—such plays as "Le Sphinx" by Octave Feuillet, "Andréa" by Sardou, "La Princesse Georges" by the younger Dumas, "Le Député Leveau" by Jules Lemaître. And here, in the fulness of time, comes M. Henry Bataille, and furbishes up the old story, and gives it a "daring" title, and tells us—or, at least, his interpreters do—that it is all very profound and symbolic! All I can say is that if M. Bataille has not inspired and sanctioned this view of his work, I think he has a right to complain of his interpreters; for they attribute to him a rather absurd pretentiousness.

It is not by way of reproach that I have dwelt on the extreme familiarity of the subject. It is familiar on the stage because it is ever-recurrent in life, and will be so long as men and women—but especially women—suffer the whole happiness and endurableness of life to depend on the permanence of a certain state of sentiment in another person. For a great many reasons, some obvious, some more subtle, the protagonist in this tragedy is usually the woman, not the man. It is the old story:—

"Man's love is of man's life a thing apart;
'Tis woman's whole existence—" and so long as women are content that it should be their whole existence, they are exposed to the disaster which befalls Lolette. M. Bataille has a perfect right to treat this typical theme, and one cannot say that he has treated it without originality. Never before has it been so crudely, squarely faced; never before has the deserted wife been suffered to fight her battle with such a reckless abandonment of all dignity, such an open avowal that no humiliation is too great for her if only she can retain her right of proprietorship in the pitiful personage she calls her husband. In order that these alternations between the fighting vixen and the fawning spaniel should be possible, Lolette is made an uneducated, unchastened, purely instinctive creature, with a good heart, but no manners to speak of. The character is vividly drawn, no doubt, else it would not afford Miss Irving the opportunities of which she makes such brilliant use; but I cannot find any special subtlety in it; and as it certainly has neither beauty nor distinction (except such as the actress lends it in the author's despite), I can take no great pleasure in it as a work of art. Lolette is certainly a very distant relation of D'Annunzio's exquisite Silvia, or Maeterlinck's mutely appealing Sélysette. If M. Bataille had called his play "La Femme Crue," the title, if not symbolic, would at any rate have been exact.

Apart from the central character, the merit of the play is of the slightest. Possibly the first act, with its picture of Bohemian life, its personal portraiture, and its satire on the ambitions, cynicisms, and jealousies of artists, may be amusing in Paris. In London, with half the characters transformed into Englishmen, and the rest quite incredible as Frenchmen or Frenchwomen, it is simply colorless and dull. In the second act, the enchantress comes on the scene in the person of a certain Princesse de Chabran. A more amazing enchantress I have not yet encountered. She may mean something in the French—may represent a recognisable type of character—but in her English form she signifies nothing at all, and is a pure melodramatic convention. In the figure of Robert Bertram one seems to divine, through all the unreality, an attempt to depict the deadlock which occurs when passion pulls in one direction and a remnant of kindness, or rather a shrinking from cruelty, still exercises an effective counter-pull. There was an opportunity here for genuine and telling analysis—for an almost quantitative discrimination between the forces of passion and snobbishness on the one side, and those of kindness and cowardice on the other. A great writer might have given us a classical dissection of a typical case. M. Bataille, unfortunately, has been so intent on making a violent part for his heroine that he has given the barest indications of Robert's frame of mind. And with the same view—that of securing scenes of hysterical vehemence—he repeats in two successive acts the same situation of facile conventionality and improbability. The embrace of Robert and the Princess in the second act is madly improbable, because they know that there is every chance of Lolette (or someone else) coming on the scene; while in the third act the embrace is probable enough, but the presence of Lolette is extremely improbable, and is only secured by the most strained device. If an English playwright had committed such a double-barrelled error of technique, he would have been promptly called to account; but as the playwright's name is not Smith or Brown, but Bataille, nobody thinks of complaining. So hard does a superstition—or rather a tradition—die. Thirty years ago the French were our masters in drama; and we cannot get out of the habit of thinking that they are so still.

WILLIAM ARCHER.

Letters to the Editor.

THE COUNTY ELECTIONS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Nearly every rural constituency in Essex and Suffolk has been seized by the Unionist or Tariff Reform party in the last week. It was my lot to contest one of these seats. In blissful ignorance of what was going on below the surface in the last few days, I was hopeful to the end. There is nothing more exhilarating or interesting than a county contest, provided only that the weather is tolerable and failure is not certain.

I will not bore you with the local circumstances, some of which were highly unfavorable—a neglected constituency, a very bad register, wretched railway communication, miserable roads, a dwindling population, and some rather decadent industries. There were seven small towns—three predominantly Liberal and four predominantly Tory. In one of them the chief inspector of police was an official in the Tory club, and one of his constables was seen sticking up Tory bills early in the contest. Stern measures were taken, however, and the police protection (which was wanting at first) became quite a feature in this town and district at the end of the contest. Here the Tory efforts were completely checkmated, and we polled even better than we had expected. In three of the towns, however, there were veritable landslides, and I think half our promises voted Tory. The most extraordinary pressure was put upon timid shopkeepers and ill-paid laborers in the last few days. This pressure was spiritual, spirituous, and economic. In one place a rector canvassed a large Bible class on the Sunday before the poll. In another place a vicar issued a lampoon on the night before the poll identifying the Liberal candidate with the atheistical opinions of Mr. Blatchford. In another a doctor treated all comers in a public-house. Free beer was freely promised and freely given before, during, and after polling day. The constituency had been deluged for years with rabbits and pheasants. Of actual money bribery by shillings and half-crowns (which was rife in a bordering constituency), I have not yet heard. With us, rabbits before and beer after the actual contest began were the predominant forms of corruption.

Of intimidation, apart from spiritual efforts, there was more than can easily be imagined by those who live in freedom. I do not know whether to be more astonished at the timidity of the shopkeepers in some little towns or at the conduct of vulgar and often impecunious men and women who badgered them. But on the farms and in the small villages the intimidation was no joke. "If the Liberal candidate is returned, you will be dismissed, your wages will be reduced, you will be a marked man"—these and similar menaces told in hundreds of cases. In others men suspected of Liberalism were kept at work till it was too late to poll.

An odd feature of the election to me was the way in which the Tories employed and paid as sub-agents or in other capacities schoolmasters, relieving officers, and other public functionaries. I heard of a man whose official duty it had been to prepare the register getting a job from the Tories during the election. At meetings we had the best of it. Our chief difficulties were the rise in the price of bread, the pauper disqualification, and the Small Holdings Act, which is a dead letter. Of the first and the second the most unscrupulous use was made by the Tories. They tried the naval panic, but soon dropped it, as we pointed out that the pensions were only possible because Liberals had abstained from war and had spent less on armaments than the Tories had wished to do. I think that in spite of the loaf, the pauper disqualification, and a good deal of unemployment, we should have won if we had had enough competent aid to stop bribery and intimidation.

Tariff Reform did the Conservative cause no good; but the men hired by the Tariff Reform League to sow false reports had some success. The enthusiasm of the Liberal stalwarts was magnificent, and I should not be surprised if the verdict were reversed next time. Most of the dodges which succeeded will not succeed twice. From the standpoint of the future they overdid it. Everything was sacrificed to an immediate success. Organised bands of roughs were transported in vehicles for miles to interrupt or break up meetings, and in some parishes a reaction of disgust had set in even before the poll. The Tories would certainly dread, and the Liberals would certainly welcome, another contest. The sooner the better, if the King will not support the Government and the House of Commons against the Peers.—Yours, &c.,

A LIBERAL CANDIDATE.

January 27th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The Conservative candidate for this division of Herts has just got in. I notice last week in THE NATION that you wish to receive any particulars of corrupt practices in the rural districts. I have been canvassing this district for the Liberal candidate for some weeks, and you may be interested to hear of some of my discoveries.

On Saturday last in the village of A—near here there were distributed all the Christmas charities which, as you know, are usually given out Christmas week. Coals, blankets, pheasants, &c., were given to the cottagers. Also, a tradesman doing his rounds on Monday was asked to change three sovereigns and one half-sovereign, a thing he has not to do in a year as a rule. Laborers who earn 15s. a week have few facilities for obtaining sovereigns. This village is wholly agricultural, dominated by the farmers and landowners.

There has been a good deal of drinking, and public-houses are very numerous; and the publicans are nearly all Conservatives. The brewers have been supplying them lately with the "Daily Mail" and the "Daily Express," and I understand the men can take them home for nothing. One such house I have never known to be rowdy, but on Saturday night it was discovered full of men drinking and shouting the name of the Conservative candidate. Many of the farmers here say to their men: "If you vote for the Liberal candidate, I'm afraid we won't be able to keep you on any longer, as we shall be so short of money." The people are shockingly ignorant, and a crusade that has for its object the explaining of the principles of Free Trade is needed badly.

This constituency was won on the tariff question solely—"The foreigner taxes us, let us tax him"—and the Conservatives actually circulated a leaflet in which the people were asked not to vote for the Liberal because he was a food taxer. The Conservative ladies have been very busy helping the sick and ailing lately, discharging voteless gardeners, and getting married voters who have been out of work. Also, there are several old age pensioners who have supported the Conservative because the church people have been good to them, or because it has been put into their heads that they will lose their pensions if a Liberal Government is returned. One woman said to me: "I don't care if food costs more, because we'll have more money to buy it with."

The intelligent members of our small community are usually Liberals—I mean among the working people. The Tories have a hold on the ne'er-do-weels. These men one cannot argue with or influence. They are won by money and position, but with time and patience we may capture any moderately intelligent one among them. Unfortunately, one seems to convince them, but a glass of beer or a Tory motor at the last minute changes them.

We have lost many votes by the scarcity of vehicles on our side. The Conservatives had all the motors among the richer people, and the farmers have each one or two vehicles in which they drive their men to the poll. They capture many in this way, as the men think they must vote for the party that carries them to the village. The intelligent Liberal laborer is not affected, but he is in the minority. What we suffer from greatly is this lack of conveyances to visit farms and outlying districts early in the day. Also there are a great number of out-voters in these county districts—over 600 in this one—and they are usually on the Conservative side.

There have been sold, it is rumored, this week, numbers of rabbits, with a blue ribbon round their necks, for 1d. each. In the outlying districts, the tiny hamlets where ignorance and the public house flourish, and the farmer and landowner rules, the cause of Liberalism has few supporters.

The Liberals in the village indulge much less in hooting and annoying individuals on the other side. An old and strong Tory said to me that his house has had no attention paid to it in this election, the Liberal element being more and more drawn from the intelligent section of the population. But the Tory hoots and jeers at the defeated Liberal. We say here that the election has been won by beer and motors and private influence. But it is a pleasure to see in the Liberal committee rooms the earnest and enthusiastic working-men and to compare them with their rowdy brothers who swell the Conservative majorities.—Yours, &c.,

A. C.

January 26th, 1910.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In this constituency they sent out a circular to every elector with a form of reply, "Will you support the Tory candidate?" Suppose a Liberal farmer or a laborer gets one of these and does not fill it up as desired, he is liable at once to a visit from the agent, and in some cases from the landlord himself, to know why he had not signed it. You cannot persuade these men that the ballot is secret, and in fact it is not. They cannot tell how any individual has voted, but they can tell how each district has.

Take a polling station with, say, 200 or 300 voters—nearly all tenants of one landlord—what happens is this: In the counting room each box is brought out separately, and by name. It is emptied, and the clerks proceed to count out the votes for this box. Each paper is spread out face upwards, and the landlord stands over the clerk and counts how many Liberal votes in each 25. He knows how many men have broken their promise. In one case, say, 386 votes, 270 polled—only 20 Liberal votes. The landlord says,

"My men have kept their promises," and the odd twenty are looked up.

In face of this it is useless to say the ballot is secret. If it is necessary to count each box, the papers should be opened face down, or the boxes should be numbered, and only the Returning Officer should have the key to the numbers.

Another element in our defeat was a poster put out by the enemy, setting forth that Mr. Asquith's education policy would cost £6,000,000 for our schools, which would double the rates, and there is no point on which the farmer is so sensitive as the rates.

In all our huge centres of population, wherever argument and reason had any effect, we did better than before. We are simply beaten in the rural areas where terrorism was possible.—Yours, &c.,

LIBERAL.

January 26th, 1910.

To the Editor of THE NATION

SIR,—Now that the county elections are largely over, I think it may be well to examine the cause of the backsliding of the rural voter, and see if any remedy can be found, and as one who has been actively engaged in the present fight, both on the platform and behind the scenes in three of our rural divisions in Yorkshire, it may be of some interest if I state what I believe to be the causes which have been at work.

First and foremost, the farm laborer, who as a whole has been well employed, has rightly felt keen sympathy for his unemployed brothers in our large towns, and is anxious for some method of alleviation to be found. The cry of more work and cheaper food if a tariff is put on has actually appealed to large numbers, and even some of the more thoughtful ones still think that the foreigner will pay the tax. Place all possible arguments before these men, they are still unconvinced, and think it might be well to have a try, and see what Tariff Reform will do.

The other great factor is the fear of the Hall, which unfortunately has a widespread existence. In one instance on one of our largest estates I got the agent to say that it was their "wish that everyone should vote according to his conscience, without fear of reprisals," and I took care to see that this was made known all round in that district—I have every reason to believe the statement was bonâ fide, and has been and will be honorably adhered to—and yet many Liberals hardly dared let it be known what they believed, and on no consideration would they drive up to the poll with me, but would rather go in the landlords' carriages, so as to hoodwink the Tories, decked out in blue, who wait around the polling booth in considerable numbers. This fear is largely caused by the methods used in canvassing. The parish was mapped out, and about five electors were assigned to each canvasser, care being taken that the man most likely to be of influence to the persons to be canvassed was chosen in each case. These men reported to the Committee, of whom, of course, the Agent was President. Whilst the more responsible men carried out their work honorably, the same cannot always be said of the underlings, who did not scruple to use considerable pressure, and the poor tenant, be he small farmer or laborer, who has for generations been used to feudal methods, can hardly be blamed when he put more faith in what the canvasser said than he did in the abstract statement from the Estate Office.

I believe the remedies for this lapse lie, firstly, in showing a positive policy towards the workers, and any schemes of insurance must be applicable to rural laborers, or woe betide the Liberals at the next election.

The remedy for the second cause is a fresh Corrupt Practices Act, which must prohibit canvassing—difficult though I know this to be—have a polling booth in each parish, and allow no loitering near the doors. The police should move anyone on who is not coming to vote. Buttonholing at the door would then be done away with, and the necessity for carriages and motors would be reduced to a minimum. Of course, it goes without saying that all public houses should be closed on election days. Then something should be done to reduce the expense now incurred at election times by societies quite other than the actual political parties fighting. In my district every wall is plastered with Tory posters, many of which are frigid and calculated falsehoods. This method does not stop here, but along the road-sides the lordly landlord has had posts erected in his tenants' fields bearing other notices of the wickedness of the Radicals in taxing him, so that the whole neighborhood is rendered hideous.

Plural voting must be abolished, and all elections should be on one day. Then, and only then, shall we get a real idea of the feeling of our rural districts, which we cannot do to-day, with ownership votes and landlords' influence swamping whole divisions.—Yours, &c.,

ALFRED ROWNTREE.

Field House, Kirkby Overblow, near Leeds,
January 26th, 1910.

THE REFERENDUM AND THE CONSTITUTIONAL CRISIS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Now that the passage of the Budget is assured, it is incumbent upon Liberals carefully to consider the next step, namely, the measure for dealing with the House of Lords. It is generally assumed that this will be passed by the Commons during the next Session. What then? All parties agree that much will depend on the attitude of the Crown; and the responsibility of a decision will be no light burden. Should the Crown desire some further indication of the opinion of the nation it would be difficult to refuse so reasonable a request. But how is it to be obtained?

The Tory Press, for obvious reasons, suggest another General Election. Your contemporary, the "Westminster Gazette," advocates a conference. Either alternative appears unsatisfactory.

Another election means another campaign of confused issues. Tariff Reform and the Navy would again oust the constitutional issue in the minds of many electors. The Tory war-chest is easily replenished. We should again be handicapped by the electoral anomalies which have lost us at least fifty seats during the past fortnight. Liberal candidates are generally not rich in this world's goods: and it would be difficult to obtain enough men to fight. Lastly, so long as the immediate ideal is the return of one of two men it is impossible to eliminate personal considerations; and these might lose us many seats.

A conference under certain circumstances and with some of the Tory leaders of the last century might have served admirably. But experience has shown that conferences with Mr. Balfour are useless. You cannot arrange terms with a man who has no sense of responsibility, no mind of his own, no settled policy. A sceptic with a strong desire for personal predominance is an impossible negotiator.

Is there any alternative? The question will be a great constitutional problem, such as has not fallen to Englishmen to decide for more than 200 years. Then the nation had recourse to blood and iron. Now, unlike every other civilised country, we have no special machinery at hand for constitutional revision. Under these circumstances I venture to suggest that the feasibility of a referendum deserves the earnest consideration of all Liberals and Labor men. I am keenly alive to the objections which make a referendum useless as a means of avoiding a deadlock between the two Houses on ordinary legislative proposals. But this will be no ordinary proposal, and these considerations do not apply. On the other hand the advantages are many. A fair and simple franchise could be adopted without raising the many controversial questions which will inevitably render electoral reform a lengthy and complicated process. The expense would be infinitely less than that of an election, and all official expenses would be defrayed out of public money. Above all, though the Tories would, no doubt, attempt once again to prevent a simple issue being presented to the people, their task would be infinitely more difficult. And the answer, whatever it was, would be one which could relieve the Crown of all responsibility.—Yours, &c.,

F. BENTHAM STEVENS.

January 26th, 1910.

THE NEED FOR LIBERAL PROPAGANDA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Most progressives must feel that the elections have been a much nearer thing than they expected. The forces of reaction and feudalism have not and will not give up the fight.

They will gather force from the encouragement, and it behoves all progressives to put their houses in order.

Unless we are prepared to make sacrifices and still further increase our enthusiasm, it is only necessary for us to be taken at an unlucky moment to be beaten.

The strength of the Liberal Party lies in its programme of social reform, but this must be used more vigorously than hitherto in the country districts. We must educate the county voter as the town voter has been.

To do this it is necessary to raise a considerable fund and send paid lecturers into all the country districts. In many parts a laborer will not attend a Liberal meeting, but a tract left with him at his dinner hour will often prove a germ that will grow.

I counsel all Liberals to go in for a course of social literature so that they may thoroughly understand the subject.

I am, unfortunately, debarred by ill-health from taking any active part in politics, but I have given twenty years on and off to the study of social subjects.

My policy is to try to induce my friends to study social literature and then challenge their Tory friends to argument. The careful studying of the subject is the essential of success. I have coached many of my young friends, and have been gratified by evidence of good work done by them. There are a large number of young Conservatives to whom it is only necessary to explain the Liberal programme to draw them into the most fascinating of all pursuits—the improvement of the race.

Every Liberal should be a centre from which should spread the ideas embodied in the programme. It is only by each of us taking up a part of the task that the battle can be won.—Yours, &c.,

A WEST COUNTRY LIBERAL.

January 28th, 1910.

ELECTORAL REFORM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Cannot public opinion be stirred up to demand that house-to-house canvassing be made illegal when it is given for any particular candidate or party at the time of a General Election? The canvasser at such a time encroaches upon the liberty of the individual in the privacy of his home. The workpeople, the small shopkeepers, and the farm laborers have the right to be protected from an annoyance which the well-to-do would resent. And is it fair for one candidate to obtain the loan of more conveyances than his opponent can muster, thus giving wealth an advantage? In constituencies where voters live far from the polling-booths, breaks could be provided out of the Parish Council rates. Even omitting to wear a candidate's colors may prejudice the voter, so that the display of all party favors might with advantage be discontinued; nor is it necessary that the candidate's portrait should appear in the windows of private residents to tell us who is the people's favorite! The publican, besides, who has now become a "political force" and a strong partisan, should not be allowed unlimited control over the sale of his beer on polling days. It must be admitted that Englishmen are intolerant of restrictions, but they love fair play, and no unbiassed observer can say that party pressure has not been carried too far at the present election. Something must be done to ensure that another General Election shall not take place under similar conditions. Let the House of Commons appoint a Committee of Enquiry, and then legislate if necessary.—Yours, &c.,

WILLIAM POEL.

January 25th, 1910.

SOME ELECTIONEERING TRICKS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—If all the tricks and dodges that have been resorted to throughout Great Britain and Ireland by Tory candidates and their canvassers and advocates were gathered and printed, they would constitute a goodly sized and very curious volume. Many of the expedients employed could only be practised effectively upon the unsophisticated working classes.

I can vouch for the following, which came before my personal notice: A "lady" canvasser called on an old age pensioner who was naturally a supporter of the Liberal candidate, and assured him on her honor as a lady that if the Conservatives were returned his pension would be increased to 10s. per week. Result, the immediate appearance of a Tory bill in the window of his humble abode, and it took some time to convince him that he was being fooled.

About half an hour before the close of the poll on the election day we hunted up one of our "promises," who, we considered, had not voted, as he had not given up his voting card, and learned that earlier in the day he had been called upon by a gentleman, who said he was sent to get his vote, got him to sign his name on a blue paper, and then told him that he had voted for Free Trade.—Yours, &c.,

P. M. REA.

Herne Hill, S.E.

January 24th, 1910.

WELLINGTON AND WATERLOO.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Nothing could be more gratifying than your able critic's review of my "Bourbon Restoration." In thanking you for it, may I be allowed to suggest that the following quotation from a letter of Lord Vivian to Captain Siborne, dated June 3rd, 1839, might induce him to reconsider his statement "that it was not the Prussian cavalry that pursued the French columns beaten back from Mont Saint Jean, but the brigades of Vivian and Vandeleur."

"In the 'Memoir of Richard Hussey Vivian,' by his grandson, the Hon. Claud Vivian, p. 330, Hussey Vivian writes: 'I think his (Wellington's) words were, on my telling him that my brigade was re-formed and ready to pursue -- 'Our troops have had a hard day's work, the Prussians will pursue the enemy, do you bivouac your brigade.' . . . The morning after the battle, at, or soon after, daybreak I proceeded from the village of Hilaincourt over the field of battle to Waterloo. I called on the Duke, it must have been about, or soon after, four o'clock. He had just breakfasted.' At that hour the Prussian cavalry had reached Frasnes (three miles beyond Quatre Bras and sixteen miles from the battlefield), where Greisenau halted for a few hours' rest at an inn with the sign of 'A l'Empereur' (v. Houssaye, 'Waterloo')."

Again, with regard to your critic's statement that Wellington cannot have used the words, "Oh, that night or the Prussians would come" so late as 6 p.m., I would point out that the best authorities agree that La Haye Sainte fell about 6 p.m., and that that hour was a most critical one, notwithstanding that the Prussian attack upon the right rear of the French had begun. It was sound strategy which assigned Planchenoit to Bulow as his objective, but his appearance in that part of the field could have neither a tactical nor a moral influence upon the battle raging at Mont Saint Jean. Very different was the effect, about 7 p.m., of Yiethen's junction with the British left. I quite agree, however, that Wellington, probably, never used these words at all.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN HALL.

Guards' Club, S.W.

January 24th, 1910.

Poetry.

AT THE DOOR.

My heart it is aching
For lost delight;
I come to your door
In the deep, dark night.

My fire it is ashes,
My candle is dead,
I shiver with cold
While you lie a-bed.

Thro' the deep darkness
I come once more,
For the dear God's sake
Open the door.

R. L. G.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE following is our weekly selection of books, which we commend to the notice of our readers:—

"Darwinism and Human Life." The South African Lectures for 1909. By J. Arthur Thompson. (Melrose. 5s. net.)

"Historical Essays." By James Ford Rhodes. (Macmillan. 9s. net.)

"The Law and the Prophets." By Professor Westphal. Translated and Adapted by Clement Du Pontet. (Macmillan. 8s. 6d. net.)

"Social Relationships in the Light of Christianity." By W. E. Chadwick, D.D. (Longmans. 5s. net.)

"The Master-Singers of Japan." By Clara E. Walsh. Wisdom of the East Series. (Murray. 2s. net.)

"No. 19." By Edgar Jepson. (Mills & Boon. 6s.)

"John Keats: Sa Vie et son Œuvre." Par Lucien Wolff. (Paris: Hachette. 12fr.)

"La Duchesse du Maine, Reine de Scéaux et Conspiratrice, 1676-1753." Par G. de Piépape. (Paris: Plon-Nourrit. 7fr. 50.)

"Les Religions: Etude historique et sociologique du phénomène religieux." Par H. Beuchat et M. Hollebecque. (Paris: Rivière. 2fr. 50.)

* * *

THE biography of Samuel Foote by Mr. Percy Fitzgerald, announced by Messrs. Chatto & Windus, will recall to the general reader the author of more witticisms than any other writer in the English language. Foote's first work as an author was a pamphlet giving an account of one of his uncles, who was executed for murdering his other uncle. This gained him ten pounds from an Old Bailey bookseller, and was the first of a long succession of writings which made him one of the most famous and one of the most dreaded men of his generation. "There is hardly a public man in England," said Davies, "who has not entered Mr. Foote's theatre with an aching heart, under the apprehension of seeing himself laughed at." Johnson was one of the few whom Foote did not mimic, and, when questioned by Boswell on the subject, he explained that "fear restrained him. He knew I would have broken his bones." Macaulay does Foote something less than justice when he says that his mimicry was exquisitely ludicrous, but it was all caricature. Forster, who devotes one of the most entertaining of his essays to Foote, takes a fairer view. Foote, he says, was "an Englishman eccentric, humorous, and satirical, as any this nation has bred. His name once expressed a bitterness of sarcasm and ridicule unexampled in England; and a vivacity, intelligence, and gaiety, a ready and unfeigned humor, to which a parallel could scarcely be found among the choicest wits of France." Mr. Fitzgerald's thorough knowledge of the history of the English stage will enable him to treat adequately of a man who towards the end of his life could claim that he had added to it sixteen quite new characters.

* * *

A NEW and completely revised edition of Mr. Bryce's "The American Commonwealth" may be expected shortly. That work was first issued in 1888, and was at once accepted in the United States as the best account of the American Constitution. Several revised editions have been published, but the book in its new form has been largely rewritten in the light of Mr. Bryce's fuller knowledge of American affairs, while events and tendencies of the past twenty years will also be discussed.

* * *

AMONG the books which Mr. Fisher Unwin has in preparation is a translation of M. A. Aulard's "The French Revolution: A Political History." This is the standard work upon the aspect of the Revolution which it treats, and is the result of an amount of research that has hardly ever been equalled by a single scholar. M. Aulard has been able to refute the views put forward by several other historians—Taine, in particular—and his knowledge and impartiality have made him the leading authority on the period. The book will run to four volumes, and Mr. Bernard Miall, the translator, has added a number of historical notes dealing with matters unfamiliar to the English reader.

* * *

UNDER the title, "The Reader's Library," Messrs. Duckworth are about to issue a series of reprints of works of literary interest. The first volumes will be Leslie Stephen's "English Literature and Society in the Eighteenth Century," his "Studies of a Biographer," and Dr. Stopford Brooke's "Studies in Poetry." Last year Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. brought out Stephen's "Hours in a Library" in a cheap form. It is an encouraging sign that literary essays of the type are still in demand. Stephen's work has few graces of style, but no writer was more balanced in his judgments or more careful to overlook nothing in forming an estimate. For this reason an unusually large proportion of his criticism is "criticism of the centre."

* * *

A COUPLE of weeks ago we gave a list of works written by American literary critics, which are to appear during the present season. To these may now be added Professor W. L. Phelps's "Essays on Modern Novelists," Professor C. T. Winchester's "A Group of English Essays," and Mr. G. E. Woodberry's "The Inspiration of Poetry," all three of which will be issued by Messrs. Macmillan. Professor Phelps's book is a critical study of the chief contemporary novelists, and includes appreciations of Björnson, Thomas Hardy, Rudyard Kipling, William de Morgan, Sienkiewicz, and Mrs. Humphry Ward. Professor Winchester's volume is part biography and part criticism, and deals with Lamb, De Quincey, Carlyle, and other founders of the modern essay. "The Inspiration of Poetry" is based on Mr. Woodberry's Lowell lectures. It treats of Camoens, Cervantes, Marlowe, and other great names in the history of literature.

* * *

SIR H. H. JOHNSTON has written a book on "The Negro in the New World," embodying the results of his study of the color problem in the United States, the West Indies, and Tropical America. It is to be issued by Messrs. Methuen, who also announce "Landmarks in Russian Literature," a series of studies by Mr. Maurice Baring, of Gogol, Turgéniev, Dostoevsky, Tolstoy, Tchekov, and other great Russian writers of the nineteenth century.

* * *

MR. YOSHIO MARKINO, the Japanese artist, whose illustrations in "The Color of London," "The Color of Rome," and "The Color of Paris," have won a large amount of attention, is now finishing a series of pictures to illustrate a book on Oxford which has been written by Mr. Hugh de Selincourt. Messrs. Chatto and Windus will be the publishers.

* * *

SOME dissatisfaction has been expressed in French literary journals at the neglect on the part of the members of the Goncourt Academy to carry out the directions of Edmond de Goncourt's will. During his lifetime Edmond de Goncourt published several volumes of a journal in which he gave his impressions of literary, political, and social events in contemporary Paris. He left instructions that the volumes of the journal still in manuscript should be issued ten years after his death. He died in July, 1896, but none of these manuscripts have as yet appeared.

* * *

SOME fresh material of value relating to the Irish rebellion of 1798 is promised in "The War of Wexford," by Mr. H. F. B. Wheeler and Mr. A. M. Broadley, announced by Mr. John Lane. The book is based on hitherto unpublished documents, including the correspondence of the first Earl of Mount Norris, the Detail Book of the Camolin Cavalry, and the Diary of Mrs. Brownrigg, a lady who was for a time imprisoned on the ship commanded by Captain Dixon, saw the massacre of Wexford Bridge, and was detained in the town until its relief by Moore's troops. From these, and from other contemporary writers, the authors have drawn up a narrative which aims at holding the scales evenly between loyalists and rebels.

* * *

PROFESSOR HUGH WALKER, of Lampeter, has completed a history of "The Literature of the Victorian Era," which will be published by the Cambridge University Press. It excludes all living writers, and a special feature will be the treatment of works in prose during the period. Professor Walker is the author of "The Age of Tennyson" in Messrs. Bell's "Ages of English Literature" series.

Reviews.

RELIGION AND THE MODERN WORLD.*

WE are so constituted that a thing is never so precious to us as when it seems to be slipping from our grasp. Effective possession is the greatest hindrance in the way of a deliberate realisation of values. The menace of loss, even if it be an illusion, will rouse the mind to justify and the will to struggle to retain what is ceasing to be a habit of either. The present writer is far from thinking that the world is either losing, or indeed, ever can lose, its hold upon those realities to which religion witnesses. Religion is and will remain the most intimate need of man. None the less, changed conceptions of the nature of religious truth and of the method of its apprehension have created a very general illusion of loss. And it is perhaps to that illusion rather than to any real deepening of the religious sense that the quickened interest in religion, which is so undoubtedly characteristic of this generation in at least all the advanced European countries, is due.

Our interest in religion is still mainly intellectual, but our conception of its nature has ceased to be intellectual. We want to justify it to the intellect, but such justification proves utterly inadequate to its nature. When religion was conceived of and generally accepted as revealed statement, the function of the intellect in dealing with its data was exactly determined. It had only to systematise the revealed deposit and to control all other knowledge in its interest. The intellectual revolution inaugurated by the Renaissance undermined the very foundation of this right to control, while nominally leaving the deposit intact. The eighteenth century assailed the deposit itself and sought to replace it by a purely rational religion. The nineteenth century had to learn hardly in the sweat of its soul that even the meagre remainder which its predecessor had left to it transcended the reason and refused to be imprisoned within its existing categories.

We have been forced in spite of ourselves towards a new view of what religion is, or rather how it comes to be the obstinate human fact which it unquestionably is. Religious experience is as certain, if not as universal, as sensible experience. And further, this religious experience has an instinctive tendency towards universality, a native power of generating itself. Through those who have felt it most intensely it is able to persuade others that they too have felt it. Religious experience thus concentrates itself about certain great religious natures, and again generalises itself, through their inspiration, in fixed forms which correspond with the average intellectual habit of a particular time and place. In this way the great historic religions have arisen and developed, and a study of their history has shown that they all tend to pass through the same general phases of development, and even to use very similar, in some cases practically identical, categories for the formulation of their beliefs. Salvation, redemption, sacrifice, forgiveness, retribution—these are the common expressions of the religious consciousness among peoples so far apart in place and time that they could not possibly have had any direct action upon one another. Religion, in short, is a great and universal human fact, and Comparative Religion has therefore claimed a legitimate place among human sciences. And again, critical history is at work to gain a more accurate view of the teaching and inspiration of the great Founders. But beyond all this historical and psychological investigation, the mind seeks to account for the fact of the religious experience itself. For such a universal effect there must be some objective cause. If sensible experience is possible only because there is an objective physical order which acts upon us through the senses, so, we feel, there must be an objective spiritual order to produce these experiences which control the whole life of feeling and action. Metaphysics has once more claimed its right of entry into the religious domain as an indispensable ally and servant.

This little volume is the outcome of this general intellectual interest in religion. It consists of addresses delivered before the St. Ninian Society, a society founded by students in the various faculties of the University of Glasgow for the free discussion of religious questions. "Its method," Sir Donald Macalister tells us in an Introduction which he contributes, "is to invite essays or addresses from men of repute, belonging to diverse schools of thought, which shall illustrate from various sides some single general theme." The theme in this instance is so wide that a single University session could hardly provide opportunities for its adequate discussion. Yet both subjects and lecturers have been on the whole well-chosen, though perhaps the desire to make the discussion catholic is too obvious, and has in some cases detracted from the strength and unity of the volume. Scotland, however, is to-day, next to Germany, the land of theologians and theological scholars, and it is impossible not to be grateful for a book dealing with religion to which Scotsmen contribute. From Dr. Moffatt and Dr. George Milligan we know what to expect. Since "The Historical New Testament" appeared, the former has taken rank in the very first flight of our Biblical scholars, and he is as charming a writer as he is a profound and judicious scholar. His lecture on "Modern Criticism and the Religion of Jesus" is an illuminating account and a well-balanced criticism of the most recent results in that field of study. He accepts as the "real" Jesus, not the reviver of the prophetic tradition and the reformer of Judaism whom Wrede has thought to discover behind the primitive tradition, but the Jesus whom that tradition actually gives us. He admits the baffling nature of the problem, and it must be admitted by all, how to reconcile the view of the kingdom as inwardness with the peculiarly eschatological and apocalyptic view of it. It seems impossible to blend these two views, ascribed with almost equal prominence to the Jesus of the primitive tradition, without giving controlling authority to one or the other, and thus materially altering the picture which we form of the historical Jesus. Dr. Moffatt seems to incline with von Dobschütz and others to the predominance of the "inwardness" view. But it is doubtful whether the most disinterested scholarship is not being forced to affirm what Dr. Moffatt denies, that the eschatological element was the norm of the teaching of Jesus. Principal Carpenter is a prince among lecturers. He knows exactly how to place his massive knowledge at the disposal of the ordinary student in a form which satisfies the thirst for knowledge without ceasing to stimulate it. His art was never employed to better effect than in his lecture on "Christianity and Historical Science." It is an admirable synopsis of the points of contact between Christianity and other religious systems, which the comparative study of religion has revealed.

Mr. McCabe is another lecturer whose prowess in many a field we have long since learned to respect. He is always courteous, lucid, and inexorably rational. His contention here is that so long as religion and science endure, they are by their very nature pledged to inveterate enmity. He still holds to the conception of religion as a sum of doctrines, to be affirmed or rejected on the ground of their fruitfulness or unfruitfulness as hypotheses to explain the nature of the universal order. To the present writer it seems that no more effective refutation of their supposed unfruitfulness could be required than Mr. Walker's treatment of the same subject in his lecture on "Science and Religion." The hypothesis of God, says Mr. McCabe, explains nothing. "It does not resolve obscure phenomena into known or conceivable agencies." It may explain nothing, but at least it states something, something which is almost as universal as our sensible experience and much more profoundly of us, something which demands an objective order to correspond to it and motive it, as our sensible experience demands objectivity in the physical order. Mr. McCabe ignores this something, a whole world of fact which is the supreme constituent of our humanity. It is the highest reality we know, man himself aspiring by an effort of his whole complex nature towards an ideal which he will never reach, or will reach only to find that the ideal has receded still further beyond his grasp, that has forced men in all ages and under an infinite variety of intellectual forms to frame the hypothesis of God, of a transcendent order of spirit, in intimate relation with us. And it is because that highest reality has been shown in these late generations to be intimately associated also, by way of origin and development, with the world that we have thought of as merely physical, that we are now being compelled to relate the hypothesis of God to the whole world-process in a far closer fashion than the old doctrine of creation provided for.

* "Religion and the Modern World." Edited by Sir Donald Macalister. Hodder & Stoughton 5s.

We are grateful to the St. Ninian Society for giving these lectures to a wider audience than those which filled the University lecture-hall. The whole world of educated men to-day, outside the specialists in particular fields of learning, is just as much in need of guidance on these questions as the students of a University. Our knowledge is seldom greater than theirs; and our intelligence may be more moulded to the exigencies of a particular calling, but is often not so acute or so readily stimulated. This book will serve by the width of its scope and the authority of its writers to enlist our intelligence in the most abiding of all interests.

JAPANESE ALLIANCES.*

JAPAN is a country where opposites are strangely united. The best warriors are poets, the best men of business are artists, and the most practical and rapidly progressive race in the world contemplates the unmoving calm of annihilation as the blissful aim of mankind's existence. Such contradiction lies deep in the national spirit. How else is it that they who dwell so lovingly on a single flower or a bird are continually haunted by the most horrible monsters, and invent masks and statues almost too atrocious to be looked at? How else is it, again, that the people whose islands are described by sentimental travellers as homes of silvery laughter, where grief is hidden in politeness and all is child-like and sweet, are, nevertheless, tinged with a sombre melancholy of intellect and spirit?

The two books before us contradict each other in this way, and they are full of inward contradictions too. They agree in being genuine Japanese thought transferred to the English language, as far as it is possible for any thought to be transferred to a language other than its own. Madame Ozaki has the advantage of thinking in English as her mother tongue, though her father and husband are purely Japanese. Her husband has long held a high position in Tokyo, and her works are already numerous and well-known. In fact, next to Lafcadio Hearn's they are probably the chief source of our knowledge of ordinary Japanese life and customs. She has now published this English version of ten ancient Japanese stories—the kind of stories that, we suppose, have no author in any country, but have grown up somehow among the people and so remain. We hardly know what to compare them to in our people's legends. They are not quite fairy stories, like Cinderella or Jack and the Beanstalk. Perhaps they are nearest to the Arthurian traditions or the ballads of Robin Hood, with just a touch of Spenser's allegories of the virtues added. They tell straightforward and adventurous tales of people who are supposed to be historic. Giants, demons, and goblin spiders come quite naturally into the history, and, as a rule, some acknowledged excellence is proclaimed—bodily strength, courage, wit, or family affection and acquiescence in destined duties.

There is nothing very remarkable about the stories themselves. The hero or heroine meets with various strange adventures, often supernatural, and usually comes through them with success. There is no subtlety, no "psychological interest," unless it be found in those contrasts which appear strange to us but not to the Japanese. There is a story, for instance, of Yorimasa, a man of ability and by far the greatest archer of his time, who, perceiving he gained no advancement at Court, sat down one day and composed a poem of thirty-one syllables—a long poem, that is to say, since the Japanese poem usually has only seventeen. His five lines, culminating in an outrageous pun, reached the Emperor's ears, and Yorimasa was at once promoted. There is something Elizabethan about that, but if a modern Member of Parliament desired a place in the Ministry, he might practise rhetoric, or flatter in newspapers, or sell his conscience in support of iniquity, but the very last thing he would do would be to write a five-line poem to the Prime Minister ending with a pun.

The poetic tendency is deep in the Japanese warrior and statesman. This same Yorimasa, after he had slain a dreadful monster that was as large as a horse and had the head of an ape, the body and claws of a tiger, the tail of a serpent, the wings of a bird, and the scales of a dragon, performed many other marvellous deeds, till at length he found himself defeated by a party in a civil war. We do not always expect a general to commit suicide after defeat, still less do we expect him to write a poem on the event. But both were expected of a Samurai, and Yorimasa did not fall short of expectation. He at once prepared for hara kiri:—

"Calling his retainer, Watanabe, who had escaped unhurt and who never left his master's side, Yorimasa bade him act as second in the rite. Then, quietly taking off his armour, he composed a poem. He likened himself to a fossil tree that never knows the joy of blossoming, for he had never attained his ambition (the destruction of his enemies), and 'sad indeed is the end of my life,' the last line of the verse, were the last words he uttered. He took out his short sword, and, thrusting it into his side, died like a brave and gallant Samurai, without a groan."

Similarly, we read of a true Princess whose koto was broken by a clumsy servant, but she, being mistress of herself though china fell, at once expressed her grief in this impromptu poem:—

"Oh, from to-day
For my amusement,
What shall I do?"

It is a long way from these ancient tales to the modern work of Yone Noguchi. Almost the only connection is this deep love for a poetry that seeks to cram as much meaning as possible into a small and definite number of syllables, like the songs of crickets, the smiles and sighs of a flower. We have known Yone Noguchi before, in a collection "From the Eastern Sea," published seven or eight years ago. Since then he has returned from Western civilisation to his own, but he still continues to write in English—a slightly peculiar English, never quite native to his mind. He still uses an unrhymed metre, and perhaps he is wise, for it gives the effect of good translation; and, of course, in writing English he far exceeds the Japanese limits of space. He gives, however, a few examples of the seventeen-syllable verse as it might appear in English; for instance:—

"My Love's lengthened hair
Swings o'er me from Heaven's gate:
Lo, Evening's shadow!"

Except for one impassioned ode to the Mikado during the Russian war, the substance of his work is a delicate perception of moods called up by ordinary sights or sounds—a temple bell, a Buddhist priest, the moon upon a river, or the purple dome of night. Speaking, apparently, of his poetry, he says of "The New Art":—

"Her music lives in intensity for a moment and then dies;
To her, suggestion is her life.
She left behind the quest of beauty and dream:
Is her own self not the song of dream and beauty itself?
(I know she is tired of ideal and problem and talk.)
She is the moth-light playing on reality's dusk,
Soon to die as a savage prey of the moment;
She is the creation of surprise (let me say so),
Dancing gold on the wire of impulse."

Naturally, it is the English of one who has not been fed on it in babyhood, and we make allowance as to a foreigner in the street, only wishing there was any language we could write as well. But "the moth-light playing on reality's dusk" well expresses the temper of the poems. In many there is the strange yearning of return—the return of the native who has wandered far in very different scenes:—

"I say my farewell to the Western cities:
I will return to the Eastern sea,—
To my isle kissed first ever by the sun,—
I will now go to my sweetest home,
And lay there my griefs on a mountain's breast,
And give all my songs to the birds, and sleep long.
A wind may stir the forest, I may awake.
I will whistle my joy of life up to a cloud:
The life of the cloud will be my life there."

That is only half the poem, and it is a shame to divide when the syllables are almost counted. So let us take one shorter poem complete; it is also a scene of return:—

"Mist-born Kyoto, the city of scent and prayer, Like a dream half-fading, she lingers on:

* "Warriors of Old Japan, and Other Stories." By Yei Theodora Ozaki. Constable. 5s. net.

"The Pilgrimage." By Yone Noguchi. The Valley Press, Kamakura; Kelly & Walsh, Yokohama. 2 small vols. in Japanese case.

The oldest song of a forgotten pagoda bell
Is the Kamo river's twilight song.

"The girls, half whisper and half love,
As old as a straying moonbeam,
Flutter on the streets gods built,
Lightly carrying spring and passion.

"'Stop awhile with me,' I said,
They turned their powdered necks. How delicious!
'No, thank you, some other time,' they replied.
Oh, such a smile, like the breath of a rose!"

There is a sweet simplicity about the girls' reply that we feel an English poet could not have given. It is part of that "creation of surprise" of which the poet speaks as an object of his art. And so we thank him for showing us in something like our own language what is the inward feeling of a spirit in most ways so different from our own. But while we owe him gratitude, we would ask him not to abandon his own natural language in the hope of diffusing his poetry in Western lands. No art but native art ever rises to greatness, and too often has the touch of Europe ruined the beauty of the East past recovery. It will now need all the courage even of Japan to resist it.

MADAME DE SÉVIGNÉ'S COUSIN.*

BUSSY-RABUTIN hovers, as a picturesque if not very reputable figure, on the by-ways of French literary history. In the seventeenth century he enjoyed an amazing vogue. His "Correspondance," as M. Gérard-Gailly reminds us, was for forty years regarded as the most solid monument of the epistolary art in France. By an irony of fate he is remembered to-day because of his passages with his famous cousin, Madame de Sévigné, whose letters caused his own to be forgotten. He had a prevision of his fate. "I must take away from you the hope," he wrote to Madame de Sévigné, "that history will one day treat me better than fortune has"; and on another occasion he told her that posterity would pay regard to what she had written. Voltaire thought lightly of him. "There is, upon the whole," he wrote, "nothing remarkable about M. de Bussy-Rabutin, save the boundless admiration which M. de Rabutin professed for M. de Bussy." This, however, is hardly a fair estimate, and M. Gérard-Gailly is more accurate if less witty when he places Bussy between Brantôme and Saint-Simon, and rather closer to the latter than the former.

For, although M. Gérard-Gailly describes his book as an account of "un Académicien, Grand Seigneur, et Libertin au Dix-Septième Siècle," he makes it clear that the word, libertine, must be construed to mean freedom of speech and of opinion quite as much as loose living. Bussy was certainly a rake; but he plunged no deeper into debauchery than most of his contemporaries, and, if we compare him with the libertines of the Regency, his wildest exploits will seem almost harmless. His most reprehensible act was the abduction of Madame de Miramion, but even for that crime something may be said in extenuation. Madame de Miramion was a young and wealthy widow, Bussy an impecunious widower. Madame de Miramion's confessor led him to believe that the lady was not altogether unwilling to listen to his pleadings, and that it was her relatives who stood in the way. An abduction seemed the obvious solution, and a significant light is thrown upon the disorder of the period by the fact that the Prince de Condé, in whom Bussy confided, promised his protection, and placed his stronghold of Bellegarde at the disposal of this impetuous lover. Accordingly, Bussy had Madame de Miramion's carriage stopped on the road from St. Cloud, in broad daylight, and dragged her, frantic with terror, to the Chateau de Launay. When Bussy discovered the real state of Madame de Miramion's feelings he released her, but so great was the shock that for a time her life was despaired of. Naturally the episode did not help to brighten Bussy's reputation which had already grown somewhat dingy.

But it was the licence he gave his tongue and his pen that proved his undoing. He had served under Condé and Turenne with distinction, and a brilliant military career seemed likely to follow. A hail of epigrams and lampoons directed against his superiors, of which he was known to be the author, put an end to these hopes. Turenne, who suffered from Bussy's shafts, when questioned by Louis XIV., drily remarked that M. de Rabutin was "le meilleur officier des armées françaises pour les chansons." Bussy felt he was a marked man, and sold to Fouquet his post as Mestre du Camp for 90,000 crowns. Nothing could have been more imprudent, for this, in Louis XIV.'s eyes, was an unpardonable crime, and Mazarin took note of the transaction for future use.

Bussy now employed his leisure in composing the "Histoire amoureuse des Gaules," a book which, under a thin disguise of fiction, related the most notorious scandals of the Court. It gained for its author a place in the Academy and a cell in the Bastille. The King heard that some manuscript copies were in circulation, secured one, read it, and nominated Bussy to the Academy. The book continued to pass from hand to hand, and, gathering fresh material as it ran, reached Holland, was printed there, and came back to France. There was at once a storm of indignation. Anne of Austria demanded the severest punishment for the author. Condé threatened to have him horse-whipped by his lackeys. Mazarin informed the King of the transaction with Fouquet, and Bussy found himself in the Bastille. Here he remained for thirteen months, the tedium of his imprisonment being varied by the receipt of numerous love-letters, and an almost incredible proposal from the Jesuits that he should write an answer to Pascal's "Provinciales." To the former he replied as might have been expected; to the latter, after some politic hesitation, he gave a distinct negative. "Unquestionably, my reverend fathers," he told the Jesuits, "you lead us to Paradise by pleasanter roads than the gentlemen of Port-Royal. But Pascal will never be refuted."

On his release from the Bastille, Bussy was advised by Louis XIV. to "take the air" in Burgundy. This sentence of banishment from Paris overwhelmed him. He occupied himself in writing the letters now gathered in his "Correspondance," and from the depths of his province he shared with Boileau the literary dictatorship of his generation. Of every new book the first question asked was: "What does Bussy think of it?" and Bussy replied in letters, which were handed round the salons, and accepted as giving the final verdict. The criticisms they contain are usually sound, though they sometimes show the prejudices of the age. Bussy was one of the first to appreciate Molière at his true worth. He placed him higher than Terence, whom most of his contemporaries, including Boileau and Fénelon, regarded as the greatest comic genius. He predicted immortality for La Bruyère's "Caractères," and he took up the cudgels on behalf of La Fontaine against Furetière. On the whole, Bussy's criticism forms the solidest and most respectable, if not the most entertaining, part of his writings.

When we turn to his relations with Madame de Sévigné we find that, in the chapter he gives to the subject, M. Gérard-Gailly has little difficulty in showing that all the blame does not belong to one side. Bussy made love to her during her husband's life-time. For this she forgave him after a short period of coldness. He drew a cruel portrait of her in his "Histoire amoureuse des Gaules," and for this she also forgave him, though less completely, and after a rather more prolonged interval. Madame de Sévigné promised to lend Bussy money, and when asked to redeem the promise denied it, and asserted that she had none to lend. M. Gérard-Gailly proves the fact of the promise, and also proves that Madame de Sévigné could have lent the money without inconvenience. Still, these incidents were but trifling interruptions in relations that were, in the main, cordial, and to the credit of both parties. Madame de Sévigné herself wrote that they "could hear each other's thoughts before they spoke," and Bussy's continual homage was grateful to the discreet Marquise. When, through a misinterpretation of her letters, the story ran that Madame de Sévigné had been Fouquet's mistress, Bussy was one of her most ardent defenders. On one occasion his brother-in-law, de Rouville, repeated the calumny. Bussy took him seriously to task. De Rouville in astonishment reminded Bussy that he himself had helped to circulate similar rumors. "I do not like such reports," replied Bussy, "unless I make them myself." The retort is typical of the impertinent wit which made and marred his career.

* "Bussy-Rabutin: Sa Vie, ses Œuvres, et ses Amies." Par E. Gérard-Gailly. Paris: Champion. 7 fr. 50.

HORSES AND HUNTING.*

A YEAR ago we were informed by the Board of Agriculture that during the twelve months which had just passed the number of horses in the United Kingdom had decreased by 12,312, and later statistics showed a further decrease. This depression in the horse market was, of course, directly attributable to the still rapidly spreading popularity of motor traffic in the country as well as in the towns, and pessimists were quick to prognosticate the complete extinction throughout the United Kingdom of horses of every breed. That the horse's reign will soon be over in Great Britain and in many other European countries, so far as his employment for drawing purposes is concerned, the most conservative of us must admit, and, when all is said, it is well this should be so under the conditions that now prevail, especially in the cities. There are sentimental though no doubt well-meaning persons who will tell you that they deplore the disappearance from our streets of "the poor horses." The writer has friends who still "make a point of going in horse 'buses instead of in those beastly motors," and of always driving in hansoms instead of using taximeter cabs, because they "hate to see the horses going off our streets." Yet well may "the poor horses" be pitied. Many of them were sufficiently badly treated, particularly in the towns, before the advent of the motor. But, since the petrol-driven drays, and lorries, and cabs began seriously to compete with horse-drawn vehicles, the lot of the traction horse has been truly deplorable. He has been over-worked, over-strained, flogged and starved in the futile attempts made by his owner to keep pace, metaphorically, with the petrol motor. It has been a fierce struggle between flesh and blood on the one hand and machinery and petrol on the other—almost an exact repetition of what occurred in the last century when the steam locomotive began to drive the horse coaches off the roads, and Mr. Wightman wrote his famous pamphlet to "prove" that no locomotive could ever be constructed that it would be possible to propel at a speed greater than about half the speed of the fastest coaches! To say, then, that the horse should still be driven in competition with motors; to regret his disappearance from the streets of cities; most of all to desire that he should continue to be flogged and starved, and yet to express a sentimental affection for "man's best friend," is to come very near to bathos.

The day is far distant, however, when the horse will no longer be seen in our midst. Shire horses will continue to be bred; so will hunters; and so, longest of all, will thoroughbreds for racing. Whether with the increasing development of motors and their employment in new fields of action, and the still more rapid improvements that are being made in aeroplanes, horses will long continue to be needed for purposes of warfare, is doubtful. At the present time hunters are more largely in demand than they have ever before been in the memory of any of us, and the prices of good hunters are still rising steadily. The increase in the number of men and women who come out with hounds, the majority to enjoy a good gallop across country, though more and more come out to meet their friends, or because it is the "classy" thing to hunt if you take a place in the country or if you are in the country much and in the way of mixing with hunting people, is remarkable. This fact has evidently been noted by the more go-ahead of our publishing houses, for within the last few years several handsome volumes dealing with various aspects of the chase have been issued at prices varying from one to five guineas, and now Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston & Company have excelled them all by placing upon the market at the price of ten guineas and fifteen guineas a truly magnum opus entitled "British Hunting," quite the most attractive book of its kind that has ever been produced, or, it is safe to say, that ever will be. The editor, Mr. Arthur W. Coaten, begins by giving rather a brief account of the early history of British hunting, and this section he has entrusted to Mr. William and Mr. F. Baillie-Grohman, who, though they have dealt ably with the subject, omit to mention that the first master of fox-hounds—according to trustworthy historians—was Simon de Montfort. On de Montfort's great seal attached to a deed dated 1259, which is now in Paris, Simon is shown galloping beside his hounds, urging them on, and blowing his horn. He is said to have hunted largely in Leicestershire and Warwickshire, and, as he lived in the thirteenth century, the seal in question forms probably the first picture we have of a bonâ-fide run with fox-hounds. Some particulars are, however, given of licences granted in the thirteenth, fourteenth and fifteenth centuries to certain privileged persons "to hunt fox, hare, cat and badger and lesser vermin," and there is reference to the Carta de Foresta of Henry III., "said to be of doubtful authenticity," by which "Whatsoever Archbishop, Bishop, Earl or Baron coming to us at our command passing by our forest, it shall be lawful for him to take and kill one or two of our deer, by view of our forester if he be present, or else he shall cause one to blow an horn for him that he may not seem to steal our deer."

In addition to lengthy sections on fox-hounds and fox-hunting in all the different counties of Great Britain and of Ireland, chapters on stag-hounds and stag-hunting, drag-hunting, hunting with harriers, basset-hounds and beagles, and otter-hunting, a considerable part of the book is devoted to such subjects as the breeding of hunters, the breeding of fox-hounds, stag-hounds and harriers, international hunting and foreign and colonial packs, hunting miscellanea, and the biographies of well-known hunting people.

The illustrations, of which there are no less than five hundred, among them twenty-three full-page plates in photogravure, reflect credit alike on the editor for his judicious selection of subjects, and upon the producers. Only one thing is to be regretted in this connection—the defect is common to almost all illustrated books that have to do with the chase—the pictures, with but few exceptions, are all of "still life." There is a full-page plate of one of Basil Nightingale's well-known pictures, the one that shows the late Tom Firr—who for so many years was huntsman to the Quorn, and the greatest huntsman there has ever been in that or in any other country—clearing a fence, and a picture of a point-to-point race of the Meynell Hunt, but for the rest there is little "action" in the great majority of the illustrations. It may be asked: In what way could there be "action"? Well, in these days of remarkable photography there is little difficulty in obtaining excellent "moving" pictures even of scenes in the hunting-field if the operator sets to work in the right way. Instantaneous photographs taken of hounds in full cry, of the huntsman making his cast, of horses jumping, of the fox stealing away, these and many more subjects of the same kind are infinitely more attractive, also more instructive, than pictures of hounds or of horses at rest, of kennel buildings, stables, country houses and their occupants, or portraits of hunt members, save in exceptional cases. Excellent photographs of the kind have been taken even by amateur photographers, but naturally the operator needs patience; also, unless he exercise discretion, he may become a nuisance in the field, if not a spoil-sport. This, so far as one can see, is the only fault worthy of mention that is to be found with "British Hunting."

HANDEL AS MAN.*

In his "Handel," Mr. R. A. Streatfeild has written the best short biography of the great composer which has yet appeared in the English language. Biographies of musicians are too often fulsome and ill-considered eulogies. This may be excused, perhaps, on the ground that music to some minds is a kind of magic, and the man who practises it a sort of magician. Each composer is looked upon as the inventor of music, and it is forgotten that a whole line of music-makers has gone to the making of him. Moreover, few biographers remember that even a composer owes something to his environment and that he does not stand outside the other activities of the human race. The merit of Mr. Streatfeild's book is that he does remember these things. Handel is shown against the background of eighteenth century London, and yet the portraiture is kept distinct from that background. If the other volumes of this New Library of Music, of which Mr. Ernest Newman is the general editor, deal with great composers in the same spirit, the series should be of distinct value. Who can really understand Wagner without also understanding the political ferment of '48, and the great reaction of the Romantic movement in literature and art?

* "British Hunting." Edited by A. W. Coaten. Sampson Low. £15 15s.

* "Handel." By R. A. Streatfeild. With twelve illustrations. Methuen, 7s. 6d. net.

Mr. Streatfeild is also a sound and capable critic who has a special knowledge of Handel and yet is in sympathy with all modern manifestations of the art of music. It is only a critic of such catholic tastes who can refocus Handel from the modern standpoint, and enable us to see more clearly what was permanent in the composer's genius. There is not much that is very new to be said of Handel's music, and Mr. Streatfeild quite properly does not attempt to write novel criticism at the expense of sound judgment, but he has managed to deal with the operas and oratorios in a spirit of discerning and yet sympathetic criticism. Several points are very well made, especially with regard to "The Messiah," which Mr. Streatfeild thinks is essentially a poem and not a didactic work of art: "it is not a sermon but a song—a magnificent effort of the human imagination, exercised upon the greatest and most inspiring of conceivable subjects." Much of the misconception of Handel as man is due to the belief that because he wrote religious oratorios he was a religious man in the sense that Bach was religious. There was nothing sectarian about Handel; nor, indeed, anything of the mystic. We can more easily understand Wagner having written "Parsifal" at the end of a free-thinking life than that Handel—the prosperous, materialistic composer of Brook Street—should have begun his long series of oratorios after having come to an end of his popularity as a composer of flimsy operas.

Indeed, Handel remains an enigma. Even Mr. Streatfeild, who has drawn upon all contemporary records most skilfully, does not quite explain him. Of Handel's greatness as a man there can be no doubt. All who met him were impressed by his dominant personality. He was always called the "great Handel," even in the days when he was nothing but a composer who was giving the town the kind of musical entertainments it desired. From our modern standpoint Handel was not an artist. He appears to have had but little idea of writing anything unless it would be popular. If his operas had not ceased to attract, would he have turned his ready pen to oratorios? It is very doubtful. He had to make a new start, for he was practically on the rocks, and the way in which he began the period of composition on which his name now rests was characteristic of the man. All his life Handel was a musician who sought for popularity. When "Judas Maccabæus" was successful because it appealed to the Jews in London, not then a large but a wealthy class, Handel bade his librettist, Morell, draw the text of the next oratorio from the same source. "Alexander Balus," which was not a success, was followed by "Joshua," "Susanna," and "Solomon." "Judas Maccabæus" itself was written to celebrate the triumphant return of Billy the Butcher from Culloden, and the Occasional Oratorio, although not actually written with that object, came in very handy as a celebration of the Young Pretender's defeat. Handel, who was never above borrowing tunes from other sources and reconstructing his own, actually constructed a new version of "Israel in Egypt" to make it go down. "The songs introduced were not the adaptations of Italian airs to Biblical words that are now occasionally given in performances of the oratorio, but popular airs from his early works and some new Italian songs apparently written for the occasion, which were thrust into 'Israel' without the semblance of any appropriateness." The oratorio was also shortened. There was certainly no false pride about Handel. Yet he was the veriest martinet as to the performance of what he had written. No singer dared take any liberties with his texts. In his biography of Gluck, Schmid relates a conversation Handel had with Gluck. "You have taken far too much trouble over your opera," said Handel. "Here in England that is mere waste of time. What the English like is something they can beat time to, something that hits them straight on the drum of the ear." He certainly succeeded in giving the English what they want, and perhaps for this very reason his music has never been so popular in Germany as here.

But if Handel always had his eye on the treasury, no composer did more for charity than he. There was nothing small about him, and when he fell on evil days, as he did at least twice, he set to work with indomitable courage to retrieve his fortunes. It was not his fault that he was compelled at first to bow down to the Court and aristocratic patrons, for all composers were compelled to do that or starve. With native astuteness he recognised in the end that the growing power of the middle-classes would introduce a new factor in music. "The turning point of his career was when in 1747 he threw aside his subscription and appealed to the public at large. The aristocracy had failed him and he turned to the middle class. There he found the conscience which he had sought in vain in the pampered worldlings of the Court. The splendid seriousness of Handel's music, its wide humanity, its exaltation of thought, its unflinching dignity of utterance, had fallen on deaf ears so long as he appealed only to an aristocratic audience. It was in the heart and brain of the middle class that Handel found at last an echo to his clarion call." The difficulty in understanding Handel as a man lies, no doubt, in the fact that he was not one of those who express themselves in words. All that is related of his conversations amounts to very little. He wrote few letters, and as far as we can tell there was never any serious love affair in his life. It is almost impossible to create a human being of what we know of Handel, although he was familiar to the public of the period and had many friends. Mr. Streatfeild has marshalled all the old facts and some of the new with great skill, and has rounded off his portrait with judicious quotations from diaries of the period, but Handel still remains obscure. We can see him well enough; no celebrated man has been better or more often described; but it is almost impossible to get a clear notion of his mental life. Mr. Streatfeild disposes of the idea that Handel was ignorant and dull outside his music, but he is not able to bring forward any but indirect evidence, such as Handel's well-known taste for pictures, and the friendship in which many clever men and women held him. Yet no composer ever expressed himself more characteristically in his music. We know Handel through that, and perhaps that is all that need be known. "We feel," as Mr. Streatfeild says, "the tremendous personality of the man even in his most perfunctory strains."

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

EVEN those who do not share Mr. Stanley Portal Hyatt's views on South African polity will recognise his evident desire in "The Northward Trek" (Melrose, 10s. 6d. net), to keep clear of party politics. We say "desire," because Mr. Hyatt writes as an Imperialist of the most unbending type; and like most thorough-going Imperialists, especially those who disclaim party spirit as a thing unworthy of their own high ideals, he is apt to descend at moments of strong temptation to the common plane of partizanship. Yet we have read many a less fair book on South Africa than this, which describes the northward movements of settlers which began after the first Boer war and culminated in the occupation of Rhodesia by the Chartered Company, and the foundation of the town of Salisbury. Although, possibly, the pioneering that was done by the Rhodes-Rudd concessionaires and the Chartered Company at this period was a little more romantic and a little less sordid than that promoted by the mining potentates of a later date, and although it included heroic incidents, it was not heroic in its essence. The Rhodes-Rudd scheme, to put it plainly, was nothing more nor less than a disreputable trick at the expense of an ignorant savage, Lobengula to wit; and even Mr. Hyatt admits that the Chartered Company, which grew out of the concession, obtained its charter cheaply from a home Government blind to the fact of its being mainly an authorisation for land appropriation, without any visible compensation for the dispossessed. Mr. Hyatt's clear-sighted estimate of Lobengula in this connection is a pleasure to read. Equally cogent are the facts that he brings forward to prove that after the first Boer War the "Colonial" party were as dangerous to the Imperial Government as the Boers themselves; and that Rhodes, the future hero of "Imperial expansion," was the leading spirit of these anti-Imperialists, as against John Mackenzie, missionary and first Deputy Commissioner in Bechuanaland, who was Mr. Hyatt's ideal Imperialist. True, he claims

STANLEY PAUL'S LIST

THE DAUPHINES OF FRANCE

By Frank Hamel.

Demy 8vo, fully Illustrated, 16s. net. (Second edition.)

TIMES.—"The author is a lively memoir writer who has already, like many others, found in French history an abundant supply of bait wherewith to lure a greedy public."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"Mr. Hamel has the right touch, and treats history in a mood of gay vivacity. The reader will find the various studies always animated, well informed, and excellently phrased. Certainly these stories make romantic reading, and Mr. Hamel handles his material with dexterity and force. In his glowing pages he seizes every opportunity for lively and impressive description."

OUTLOOK.—"Mr. Hamel has worked with much discretion, aided by a light hand, a fascinating manner, and an entire absence of pretentiousness. We have not met within the same compass so faithful and complete a revelation of the life of the royalties and of the noblesse. We are told what they ate, what they wore, and what they said; and we are told of their delight in pageants and processions and banquets, of their childish extravagance, of their ceremonial and etiquette. The portraits in this entertaining volume are instructive and admirably reproduced. The frontispiece is charming enough to be removed and framed on its own merits as a picture."

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"Mr. Hamel is the first writer to bring together in one volume the fifteen Dauphines of France. Of each of the Dauphines Mr. Hamel has given us a brief, but finished, study. If any gentleman is still hesitating over a seasonable present for the most intelligent girl graduate of his acquaintance, let him go forthwith to the bookseller."

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

* Ready To-day.

- | | |
|--|--------------------------------|
| * A WILL IN A WELL | E. EVERETT-GREEN |
| A double-threaded mystery story of a hidden will. | |
| * EDWARD AND I AND MRS. HONEYBUN | KATE HORN |
| A romance of married life. | |
| * QUAKER ROBINS | WILFRID L. RANDELL |
| A novel on quite original lines—full of action and romance. | |
| * A LADY OF FRANCE | B. SYMONS |
| A Romance of Mediæval Paris. | |
| THAT IS TO SAY— | "RITA" |
| NOT QUITE | E. S. NESBIT |
| TROPICAL TALES | DOLF WYLLARDE |
| THE GHOST PIRATES | WILLIAM HOPE HODGSON |
| A weird, creepy, powerful, and fascinating tale of the sea. | |
| THE ROSE OF DAUPHINY | PHILIP L. STEVENSON |
| A historical romance thrilling with exciting incidents. | |
| STRANGE FIRE | CHRISTOPHER MANGHAN |
| A novel of clerical life with a strong love interest. | |
| LOVE BESIEGED | CHARLES E. PEARCE |
| An enthralling romance of the Indian Mutiny. | |
| PRETTY BARBARA | ANTHONY DYLLINGTON |
| The story of a woman's frailty and a man's magnanimity. | |
| A SPLENDID HERITAGE | Mrs. STEPHEN BATSON |
| The love story of a fastidious woman of society. | |
| GOLDEN APHRODITE | WINIFRED CRISPE |
| A story of temptation surmounted. | |
| LYING LIPS | WILLIAM LE QUEUX |
| A remarkable and enthralling mystery story. | |
| TUMULT | WILKINSON SHERREN |
| An intensely human book, instinct with real dramatic emotion. | |
| A WILD INTRIQUE | HEW SCOT |
| The story of a love adventure. | |
| THE SECOND ELOPEMENT | HERBERT FLOWERDEW |
| Tells how a charming English girl is saved from a marriage of convenience. | |
| THE FEET OF THE YEARS | JOHN DALISON HYDE |
| PLUMAGE | CORALIE STANTON & HEATH HOSKEN |
| ANGELA | A. ST. JOHN TREVOR |
| THE BUNGALOW UNDER THE LAKE | CHARLES E. PEARCE |
| THREE MODERN SEERS | Mrs. HAVELOCK ELLIS |
| A fascinating exposition of the teachings of James Hinton, Nietzsche, and Edward Carpenter, 3s. 6d. net. | |
| HEAVEN, HOME, AND FATHER | T. W. H. CROSLAND |
| A companion volume to "Lovely Woman." 5s. | |
| A CABINET MINISTER'S WIFE | GEO. R. SIMS |
| In paper 1s. net; Cloth 2s. net. | |

STANLEY PAUL & CO., Clifford's Inn, LONDON.

IMPORTANT NEW BOOKS.

Published by Mr. T. FISHER UNWIN.

GAMBETTA: Life and Letters.

By P. B. GHEUSI. Translated by V. M. MONTAGU. With 8 Illustrations in Collotype, demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. net; post-free, 12s. 11d.

This work, written in the form of a biography, is interspersed with letters from the great tribune to his relations and intimate friends. M. Gheusi, by a judicious choice of the very voluminous correspondence left by Gambetta, enables us to follow the patriot's career from his entry into the humble seminary at Cahors kept by priests until his sudden death. In these letters we can watch, month by month, almost week by week, the mental development of the greatest patriot of modern times. This work throws new light upon the character of a man who has hitherto been represented as a dictator and an ambitious demagogue.

THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

A Study in National Psychology. Vol. I. By A. MAURICE LOW. 8s 6d. net; post-free, 8s. 11d.

"There is no more fascinating study than that of national types. . . . Mr. Low brings to his task a mind at once keen and daring, and he has added a book of value to the social philosophy of the time."—Morning Post.

"With a wealth of knowledge that is altogether admirable, the author reviews the three dominant influences in early American civilisation."—R. A. BRAY, in the Daily News.

FORTY YEARS AGO AND AFTER.

By J. GEORGE TETLEY, D.D., Magdalen College, Oxford, Archdeacon-designate of Bristol, Canon of Bristol Cathedral, with a Frontispiece, large crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net; post-free, 6s. 4d.

The Author has collected in this volume some sketches of English life based on a long knowledge of city and country alike. There are anecdotes connected with his own College (Magdalen) which have not hitherto been in print, and reminiscences of old friendships, and the talk of more than one man of note no longer alive.

Besides these, there is some work of a more serious historical character, and studies on the religious aspect of Art.

THE FIRELESS COOKERY BOOK.

By MARGARET J. MITCHELL. 4s. 6d. net; post-free, 4s. 10d.

This book presents in simple form all necessary directions for making and using the inexpensive hay-box, or fireless cooker, as employed by the Scandinavian housewife. No up-to-date housekeeper or cook will be long without this guide to real labour-saving in house-work.

THE CONQUEST OF CONSUMPTION.

By ARTHUR LATHAM, M.D., and C. H. GARLAND. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net; post-free, 4s. 10d.

Amid all the discussion of the problem of the prevention and cure of consumption there has hitherto been no accurate guide for the layman who asks the pertinent questions: "What are we doing?" "What can we do?" In this book an endeavour is made to answer these questions. After discussing the present cost in life, they give an interesting résumé of what is known of the causation, prevention, detection, and cure of consumption, showing that our knowledge is such that, given the necessary money, it is possible to eradicate the disease in a single generation. The book should do much to show the prevention of consumption is a matter well within the sphere of practical politics.

"Mr. Stacpoo's has undoubtedly scored again,"—T. P.'s WEEKLY.

READ HIS GREAT NEW ROMANCE. GARRYOWEN.

By the Author of "The Blue Lagoon," "Patsy," &c. 6s. post-free.

"It is an excellent romance, well thought out, well written, developed with the utmost ingenuity and skill in detailed scenes so vividly described that the reader's excitement increases with each obstacle overcome."—Ladies' Field.

"A peculiarly fascinating and fresh romance."—Liverpool Post.

"One puts the book down with real regret."—Globe.

SKI-ING FOR BEGINNERS AND MOUNTAINEERS.

By W. RICKMER RICKMERS. With 79 Illustrations and many Diagrams. Cloth, 4s. 6d. net; post-free, 4s. 11d.

"A fascinating book on the most delightful of Continental winter sports. Not only is Mr. Rickmers a strenuous and accomplished ski-runner himself, but he has had years of experience as a teacher of the art, and his handy volume embodies everything that it is essential for the novice to know in order to become an efficient ski-runner in as short a time as possible."—T. P.'s Weekly.

On Sale at all Booksellers.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

that Rhodes afterwards became the Imperial idealist; but his early record, apart from anything else, is surely justification for the suspicion with which he was regarded by a good many people in this country at the time when the foolish were crying patriotism as justification for the Jameson Raid. Mr. Hyatt's book stops short of where many interesting phases of South African development begin, but it is an eloquent account of the northward movement, and a good introduction—from the purely Imperialistic standpoint—to the study of more recent history.

* * *

MR. EDWARD HUTTON has before this proved himself an admirable guide to those who would explore Italy, and his latest volume on "Rome" (Methuen, 6s. net) is wanting neither in interesting facts of history and topography nor in literary eloquence. He conducts us over the "lions" of the city, over Capitol and Catacombs and churches, and never falters for want of a ready reference to classic or medieval history, or for lack of a phrase that visualises the picture he wishes to show us.

When he first saw Rome, its brusque modernity shocked and disappointed him. But after a while he grew to admit its fascination, in spite of the rampant vandalism and intrusive modern architecture that offended him, and to realise what one might call the psychic inseparability of old and new. Yet, though the spirit of Rome appeals to him, he owns to no allegiance to her material parts, and freely criticises features that are commonly venerated. Of the interior of St. Peter's he says:—"It is as though here alone one had tried to please both God and the multitude . . . the place is less a church than a city in whose streets one may wander all day long searching in vain for God." The mosaics in S. Maria Maggiore pleased him, those at SS. Cosma and Damiano being, in his judgment, inferior; and he has a good word for Latin architecture as a whole, for it possesses "a sort of gift for entertaining the sunshine." He praises the genuine Greek sculpture in the Museo Nazionale, but has nothing but reprobation for Roman taste as displayed in the Capitoline and Vatican. He paints from a full palette, and occasionally the writing is over-

THE NATIONAL PROVINCIAL BANK OF ENGLAND LIMITED.

CAPITAL—Paid up	£3,000,000
Uncalled	2,300,000
Reserved Liability	10,600,000
Subscribed Capital	£15,900,000

RESERVE FUND (invested in English Government Securities), £2,350,000

COLIN FREDERICK CAMPBELL, ESQ.
MAURICE OTHO FITZGERALD, ESQ.
WILLIAM HENRY NEVILLE GOSCHEN, ESQ.
FRANCIS ALEXANDER JOHNSTON, ESQ.
CLAUDE VILLIERS EMILIUS LAURIE, ESQ.
FRANCIS CHARLES LE MARCHANT, ESQ.

Directors.

THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF LICHFIELD.
SIR JAMES LYLE MACKAY, G.C.M.G., K.C.S.I., K.C.I.E.
GEORGE FORBES MALCOLMSON, ESQ.
SELWYN ROBERT PRYOR, ESQ.
THOMAS GEORGE ROBINSON, ESQ.
ROBERT WIGRAM, ESQ.

ROBERT T. HAINES, ESQ.

Joint General Managers.
THOMAS ESTALL, ESQ.

D. J. H. CUNNICK, ESQ.

ERNEST JAMES WILDE, ESQ.

Solicitors.

WALTER EDWARD MOORE, ESQ.

BALANCE SHEET, 31st December, 1909.

LIABILITIES.			ASSETS.
	£	s. d.		£	s. d.
CAPITAL—			Cash at Bank of England and at Head Office and
40,000 Shares of £75 each, £10 10s. paid	420,000	0 0	Branches	10,073,249	1 5
215,000 Shares of £60 each, £12 paid... ..	2,580,000	0 0	Money at Call and Short Notice	4,637,666	19 8
	3,000,000	0 0		14,710,916	1 1
RESERVE FUND	2,350,000	0 0
	5,350,000	0 0	INVESTMENTS—
CURRENT, DEPOSIT, and other ACCOUNTS, including			English Government Securities	8,454,551	4 4 rebate on Bills not due, provision for bad and	59,541,573	9 6	(Of which £115,500 is lodged for doubtful debts, contingencies, &c.			public accounts)
ACCEPTANCES and ENDORSEMENTS of FOREIGN BILLS,	794,549	4 9	Indian and Colonial Govern-
on Account of Customers			ment Securities; Debenture, Guaranteed,
PROFIT AND LOSS ACCOUNT—			and Preference Stocks of British Balance of Profit and Loss Account,			Railways; British Corporation, and including £7,590 6s. 4d. brought	£629,165	18 3	Waterworks Stocks	7,252,069	4 0
from year 1908			Canal, Dock, River Conservancy,	454,355	10 5
Less Interim Divi-			and other Investments	16,161,275	18 9
dend, 8 per cent.				30,872,191	19 10
paid in Aug. last	£240,000	0 0		33,468,609	9 10
„ Dividend of 9 per			BILLS DISCOUNTED, LOANS, &c.
cent. payable 5th	270,000	0 0	LIABILITY OF CUSTOMERS for ACCEPTANCES, &c., as per
February next			Contra	794,549	4 9
„ Applied to writing	20,000	0 0	BANK PREMISES in London and Country	649,937	18 1
down Investments... ..				£65,785,288	12
	530,000	0 0
Balance carried forward to 1910	99,165	18 3
	£65,785,288	12 6

M. O. FITZGERALD,
G. F. MALCOLMSON,
ROBERT WIGRAM,

} Directors.

R. T. HAINES,
T. ESTALL,
D. J. H. CUNNICK,

} Joint General Managers.

As certified by the Auditors, Edwin Waterhouse and William Barclay Peat.

The National Provincial Bank of England, Limited, having numerous Branches in England and Wales, as well as Agents and Correspondents at home and abroad, affords great facilities to its customers, who may have money transmitted to the credit of their Accounts through any of the Branches, free of charge.

At Head Office and Metropolitan Branches, Deposits are received and interest allowed thereon at the rates advertised by the Bank in the London newspapers from time to time, and Current Accounts are conducted on the usual terms.

At the Country Branches, Current Accounts are opened, Deposits received, and all other Banking business conducted.

The Bank undertakes the Agency of Private and Joint Stock Banks, also the Purchase and Sale of all British and Foreign Stocks and Shares, and the collection of Dividends, Annuities, &c.

Circular Notes and Letters of Credit, payable at the principal towns abroad, are issued for the use of Travellers.

The Officers of the Bank are bound to secrecy as regards the transactions of its customers.

Copies of the Annual Report of the Bank, Lists of Branches, Agents, and Correspondents, may be had on application at the Head Office, and at any of the Bank's branches.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S

New 6s. Novels in the Press.

- THE STONE EZEL. By Mrs. Antrobus.
Author of "Wildersmoor," etc.
- OPPORTUNITY. By Margaret B. Cross.
Author of "A Question of Means," etc.
- OLIVIA L. CAREW. By Netta Syrett.
Author of "Anne Page," etc.
- THEY ALSO SERVE. By Christopher Stone.
Author of "Scars," etc.
- A CALL: A Tale of Two Passions.
By Ford Madox Hueffer.
Author of "The Fifth Queen," etc.
- SERVICE. By Constance Smedley.
Author of "A June Princess," etc.
- OUTSIDERS AND IN. By John Ayscough.
Author of "Marotz," etc.
- PERFIDIOUS LYDIA. By Frank Barrett.
Author of "Lady Biddy Fane," etc.
- AT THE SIGN OF THE BURNING BUSH.
By M. Little.

- PLAIN BROWN (2nd impression) By COSMO HAMILTON.
- THE UNLUCKY MARK (2nd impression) By F. E. PENNY.
- KING HAL-OF-HERONSEA By W. WILMOT DIXON.
- INFLUENCES By PAUL METHVEN.
- THE KNIGHT OF THE GOLDEN SWORD
By MICHAEL BARRINGTON.
- THE SON OF MARY BETHEL By ELSA BARKER.

VENICE IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

By PHILIPPE MONNIER. Authorised English Translation, with Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net.

LIVES OF THE MEDICI: from their Letters.

By JANET ROSS. With Photogravure Frontispiece and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

FROM THE THAMES TO THE SEINE.

By CHARLES PEARS. With 40 Illustrations in Colours and Sepia. Large fcap. 4to, cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

THE BARGAIN BOOK.

By CHARLES EDWARD JERNINGHAM. With a Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

SAMUEL FOOTÉ: a Biography.

By PERCY FITZGERALD, M.A. With a Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 12s. 6d. net.

THE FAVOURITES OF HENRY OF NAVARRE.

By LE PETIT HOMME ROUGE, Author of "The Court of the Tulleries." With 6 Portraits. Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net.

NOTES ON THE SCIENCE OF PICTURE MAKING.

By C. J. HOLMES, M.A. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

THE MASTER OF GAME.

The Oldest English Book on Hunting. By EDWARD, SECOND DUKE OF YORK. Edited by W. A. and F. BAILLIE-GROHMAN. With Introduction by THEODORE ROOSEVELT. Photogravure Frontispiece, and 24 other Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net; parchment, 10s. 6d. net.

EPISTOLÆ OBSCURORUM VIRORUM (1515-1517).

The Latin text of the Editiones Principes, with Translation, Historical Introduction, and Notes by FRANCIS GRIFFIN STOKES. (500 copies only.) Royal 8vo, buckram, 25s. net.

ASTRONOMICAL CURIOSITIES.

By J. ELLARD GORE, Author of "Studies in Astronomy," and Editor of "Flammarion's Astronomy." With 2 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane,
London, W.C.

Benger's Food prepared with milk, is a complete food.

The more delicate the state of health—the greater the need for it.

When other foods fail try Benger's; but it's wisest to use Benger's in the first instance.

For Invalids and the aged.

Benger's Food is sold in Tins by Chemists, etc., everywhere.

MONTHLY.

2s. 6d.

THE ENGLISH REVIEW

The English Review for February will contain

MODERN POETRY

THREE SKETCHES

Anton Tchekoff

SNOW AND SAND

Edward Thomas

GOOSE FAIR

D. H. Lawrence

THE LOVE CHILD

Richard Price

LONDON IN HOGARTH'S WORKS

E. Beresford Chancellor

EVERY DAY BRINGS A SHIP

Ella d'Arcy

THE WIFE OF ALTAMONT (III)

Violet Hunt

EDITORIAL

On the Objection to the Critical Attitude

And Political and Social Articles by ARNOLD BENNETT, F. E. GREEN,
the DRAMA, REVIEWS, &c.

CHAPMAN & HALL, Ltd., 11, Henrietta Street,
Strand, W.C.

opulent; but the freshness of his criticism redeems it from heaviness, and the book is greatly helped by Mr. Maxwell Armfield's sixteen delicate and daintily decorative illustrations.

* * *

THE sketch book is decidedly of greater importance than the diary in Lady Butler's "From Sketch Book and Diary" (Black, 10s. net). Several of the pictures are familiar to us, particularly the Egyptian ones, and the examples of both color work and black and white recall pleasantly that gift for rendering animated movement which brought reputation to the artist. As with most "figure painters," Lady Butler's essays in pure landscape have been regarded as of secondary merit; but some of the water color drawings reproduced here are wholly individual realisations of nature truly seen and tenderly felt, and should serve to call attention to this less known phase of her talent. The diary is emphatically a painter's diary. It records the author's observations of things seen during a tour through the West of Ireland in the 'seventies, in Egypt in 1885, in South Africa and in Italy; and it records them objectively, and mainly from the painter's point of view. It is not concerned with historical reminiscence, and its philosophy is elementary; yet, if it adds nothing to our knowledge of the countries described, and does not particularly stimulate the intellect, it is readable by reason of its fresh enthusiasm and graceful word-painting. The Italian section shows, perhaps, the most intimacy; here the scenes described were scenes revisited; part of her childhood was spent in the Italian Riviera, and the old haunts brought back some fragrant memories.

* * *

THERE is so little of the writer's own in proportion to the lengthy extracts quoted from other authors in Mr. Alfred Allinson's "The Days of the Directoire" (Lane, 16s. net) that the book assumes the character of a compilation rather than an original work. This is no great fault, since Mr. Allinson makes use of good authorities—Thibaudeau's "Mémoires," the writings of Barras, the Goncourts, Mignet, the "Cambridge Modern History," and the "Mémoires sur Carnot"—and readers who are willing to content themselves with a readable, if not very profound, account of the Directoire will find it in Mr. Allinson's pages. Much space is given to the social life of the period, but politics are not neglected. There are a couple of chapters on the abortive Babeuf conspiracy, to which Mr. Allinson seems to attach an undue importance.

The Week in the City.

				Price Friday morning, Jan. 21.		Price Friday morning, Jan. 28.
Consols	82 $\frac{3}{4}$...	82 $\frac{1}{2}$
Midland Def.	59	...	58 $\frac{1}{2}$
Union Pacific	197	...	190 $\frac{1}{2}$
Mexican 1st Pref.	134	...	132
U.S. Steel	86	...	84 $\frac{1}{2}$

POLITICS, the Settlement, and the fall in Americans have been the chief items of interest in the City, interesting it in the order of precedence given. At the end of last week the Tory enthusiasm of the Stock Exchange was roused to boiling point by the triumphant re-appearance on its floor of the victor of Brentford, and a rather ugly demonstration was made against a defeated Radical candidate who had talked, during his contest, about the Navy and its Christmas festivities in a manner which the House resented very bitterly. This week the feeling has been more sober, as it has been gradually realised that the re-awakened Toryism of suburban and agricultural voters has made little real impression on the strength of the Radical position, and that the Government has serious financial problems to face, complicated by the early maturity of the War Loan. Already the City is agog with anticipations of a loan to cover the expected deficit and to provide for expenditure on promised Dreadnoughts. Naturally enough it loves loans and the commissions and business that they bring with them, and so it would be idle to expect Stock Exchange opinion to recognise that a nation which begins to pay its way by borrowing in time of peace has taken a first long step towards financial disaster. And the example of Germany, so dear to the heart of the patriotic Tariff Reformer, comes in aptly with a loan of 24 millions sterling, announced on Tuesday, to be offered on February 5th. This Protectionist State makes the foreigner pay so successfully that for the third year in succession she has to pledge her credit for what it will fetch.

DEMORALISED AMERICANS.

Wall Street, after a short period of rally, was again plunged into depression which is all the more disquieting because on the surface there is no very evident reason for it, so that it can only be attributed to deep-rooted and widespread influences. Chief among these are the country's adverse commercial balance, due to the rapidity with which it has been helping itself to foreign-made commodities, while its exports have been on an abnormally low level. Consequently its exchange is chronically adverse and is only kept from rising to gold export point by the creation of credits in England and in Europe by the manufacture of finance bills and sales of securities, which operators on this side of the water are not very eager to absorb. Only a highly developed country, with a mass of capital invested abroad, can afford to import more than it exports. Debtor nations like the United States must needs pay their way by exports, or outrun the constable. Besides this bedrock difficulty, which at present menaces American finance, the public revolt against the tyranny of the trusts, expressed in a self-denying ordinance to abstain from meat, is a serious feature, and shows how widespread and strong is popular feeling on this subject. Tariff Reformers will please note this pleasant result of the blessings of Protection, and the rings that organise themselves behind its cover.

GENERAL MARKETS.

In other markets business has been much interfered with by political excitement and the arrangements of the account. Home Railway stocks had some good dividends and traffics to cheer them, but have shown a drooping tendency owing to realisations by weak bulls before the Settlement. Foreign bonds are firm as usual, though the spirits of the Paris Bourse are naturally damped by the floods. Rubber shares seem to be attracting the attention of speculative investors all over the country and from many parts of the Continent. An enormous business has been done in them and prices have risen very rapidly, the market being a narrow one. Prospects are being capitalised generously, but the strength of the movement so far shows little sign of slackening.

THE COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER REPORT.

The first report of the London and County and Westminster Bank is a remarkable display, with a balance-sheet showing deposits 70 millions, cash in hand 12 $\frac{1}{2}$ millions, bills discounted 12 $\frac{1}{2}$ millions, and advances, nearly 31 millions. The huge resources handled by modern banks would make our forefathers stare if they could see them, but the perfection of modern organisation and the wealth of experience and tradition at the command of bankers of to-day, enable these vast machines to work with perfect ease and security.

JANUS.

EVANS'

ANTISEPTIC THROAT PASTILLES

FOR YOUR THROAT AND VOICE.

These Pastilles have a world-wide reputation for their wonderfully soothing and beneficial effects in all Throat troubles.

Should you suffer from Loss of Voice, Hoarseness, Weakness, Irritation and Inflammation of the Vocal Organs, then give Evans' Antiseptic Throat Pastilles a trial. You will be delighted with the result. Give certain relief.

PREPARED TO A FORMULA OF THE LIVERPOOL THROAT HOSPITAL.

Of all Chemists, Stores, &c., 1/- and 4/8 per box. Send 1d. stamp for sample box to Evans Sons Lescher & Webb, Ltd., Hanover St., Liverpool.

Ask for EVANS' Pastilles and refuse imitations.

LONDON COUNTY & WESTMINSTER BANK

(ESTABLISHED IN 1836).

LIMITED.

CAPITAL £14,000,000, IN 700,000 SHARES OF £20 EACH.

CALLED-UP CAPITAL - £3,500,000 | RESERVE FUND - - £4,250,000

THE RIGHT HON. THE VISCOUNT GOSCHEN, Chairman.

WALTER LEAF, ESQ., Deputy-Chairman.

Joint Managers:

ALFRED MAYO HAWTHORN
HERMANN RICHARD WYATT } (Head Office.)

THOMAS JAMES RUSSELL (Colonies and Agencies.)
FRANK WILLIAM HOWETT (Country.)

Joint Secretaries:

AUSTIN ARROW KEMPE.

GEOFFREY PAGET.

HEAD OFFICE - - 41, LOTHBURY, E.C.

LOMBARD STREET OFFICE - 21, LOMBARD STREET, E.C.

WEST END OFFICE - - 1, ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.

FOREIGN BRANCH - - 80, CORNHILL, E.C.

BALANCE SHEET, 31st DECEMBER, 1909.

LIABILITIES.			ASSETS.
	£	s. d.		£	s. d.
CAPITAL—			CASH—
700,000 Shares of £20	£14,000,000		In hand and at Bank of England ...	12,533,244	7 4
693,577 Shares issued £5 paid thereon ...	£3,467,885		At Call and Short Notice	11,564,929	1 6
6,423 Shares allotted to but not yet taken up by the London and Westminster Bank Shareholders and outstanding fractions in respect of which £5 per share is in hand	32,115			24,098,173	8 10
			BILLS DISCOUNTED	12,524,853	3 7
700,000	3,500,000	0 0	INVESTMENTS—
RESERVE	4,250,000	0 0	Consols (of which £1,352,000 is lodged for Public Accounts), and other Securities of, or guaranteed by the British Government ...	7,930,252	19 1
CURRENT AND DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS	70,197,849	18 10	Indian Government Stock, and Indian Government Guaranteed Railway Stocks and Debentures ...	990,933	4 8
CIRCULAR NOTES, LETTERS OF CREDIT, COMMISSION LOANS, AND OTHER ACCOUNTS, including provision for contingencies	1,680,461	0 9	Colonial Government Securities, British Corporation Stocks, and British Railway Debenture Stocks	1,736,240	0 10
ACCEPTANCES FOR CUSTOMERS	3,589,770	19 4	Other Investments	331,660	15 10
LIABILITY BY ENDORSEMENT (Bills negotiated for Customers)	45,717	0 6		10,989,087	8 5
Contingent Liability on Endorsements	£655,011		ADVANCES TO CUSTOMERS AND OTHER ACCOUNTS	30,988,092	5 8
REBATE on Bills not due	52,869	19 4	LIABILITY OF CUSTOMERS FOR ACCEPTANCES, as per contra	3,589,770	19 4
PROFIT AND LOSS BALANCE, as below	497,787	19 9	LIABILITY OF CUSTOMERS FOR ENDORSEMENT, as per contra	45,717	0 6
	£83,794,456	18 6	BANK AND OTHER PREMISES (at cost, less amounts written off)	1,558,763	8 2
				£83,794,456	18 6

Dr.			PROFIT AND LOSS ACCOUNT.			Cr.
	£	s. d.		£	s. d.		£	s. d.
To Interest paid to Customers	382,999	1 10	By Balance brought forward from 31st December, 1908 (London and County Banking Co., Ltd.)	104,178	13 5
„ Salaries and all other expenses, including Income Tax and Auditors' and Directors' Remuneration	906,220	14 0	„ Balance brought forward from 30th June, 1909, after payment of dividend declared July, 1909 (London & Westminster Bank, Ltd.)	30,714	12 11		134,893	6 4
„ Rebate on Bills not due carried to New Account	52,869	19 4				„ Gross Profit, after making provision for Bad Debts and Contingencies, and including Rebate brought forward	2,004,984	8 7
„ Interim Dividend for Half-year ended 30th June, at 20 per cent. per annum	200,000	0 0	NOTE.—This Profit and Loss Account covers the operations of the London and County Bank from 1st January, 1909, to 30th June, 1909, and of the combined undertakings of the London and County and London and Westminster Banks, from 1st July, 1909, to 31st December, 1909.
„ Depreciation in Investments	50,000	0 0
„ Bank Premises Account	50,000	0 0
„ Dividend for Half-year ended 31st Dec., at 20 per cent. per annum	350,000	0 0
„ Balance carried forward	147,787	19 9
	497,787	19 9
	£2,139,877	14 11					£2,139,877	14 11

GOSCHEN,
WALTER LEAF,
E. H. CUNARD,

Directors.

A. M. HAWTHORN,
H. R. WYATT,
T. J. RUSSELL,
F. W. HOWETT,

Joint Managers.

T. J. CARPENTER, Chief Accountant.

AUDITORS' REPORT.

We have examined the above Balance Sheet and compared it with the Books at Lothbury and Lombard Street, and the Certified Returns received from the Branches.

We have verified the Cash in hand at Lothbury and Lombard Street and at the Bank of England and the Bills Discounted, and examined the Securities held against Money at Call and Short Notice, and those representing the Investments of the Bank.

We have obtained all the information and explanations we have required, and in our opinion the Balance Sheet is properly drawn up so as to exhibit a true and correct view of the state of the Company's affairs according to the best of our information and the explanations given to us, and as shown by the Books of the Company.

LONDON, January 17th, 1910.

FRED. JOHN YOUNG, F.C.A.,
G. E. SENDELL, F.C.A., } Auditors.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER. Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Scholarship Examinations in March, July and December.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.
BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.

(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

LEIGHTON PARK SCHOOL (Near Reading).

Under the Management of the Society of Friends.

Boys from this PUBLIC SCHOOL have done well at the Universities and in business careers.

The School stands in its own grounds of about 45 acres, high above the town and the Thames Valley.

For Honours List, Prospectus, particulars of Scholarships, and other information, apply to the Head Master, JOHN RIDGES, M.A., at the School.

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey, Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK.
K. M. ELLIS.

STRAMONGATE BOYS' SCHOOL, KENDAL.

A Boarding School for Boys.

Founded by the Society of Friends in Kendal.

A strong staff—leisure-time pursuits—school journeys—good games—gymnastics—a magnificent country district.

The school has doubled itself in the last five years.

Prospectus, School Magazine, etc., from WILFRED SESSIONS, B.Sc. Headmaster.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD, HASLEMERE, SURREY.
COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Sandy Soil. 600 feet above sea level.

Healthy out door life, combined with thorough education on modern lines. Usual curriculum, including citizen-ship course, extension lectures, &c. Preparation when required for University and other careers. Handicrafts, gardening, riding, nature study, archaeology, &c.

Principal: Miss AMY KEMP.

SESAME HOUSE

for Home-life Training and for Training of Children, Lady Nurses and Kindergartners.—For full particulars apply,

The Principal, Miss EMILY LAST, 43A, Acacia Road, London, N.W.

THE INDEX TO VOLUMES
I.—V. OF THE NATION

may be had free on application to the Manager.

TANGYE'S

TYPE "AA" OIL ENGINE

For Farm or Estate Work,
Country-House Lighting, &c.

TANGYES LTD., BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED
WHITE
& BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

TOURS.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."

£12 12s. OPORTO, GIBRALTAR, TANGIER, ALGIERS,
PAERMO, February 15th.

£28 5s. PALESTINE, EGYPT, CONSTANTINOPLE, GREECE,
March 3rd.

Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

£7 7s. —SKI-ING, SKATING, TOBOGGANNING
TOURS, including Second Class Return Ticket
and Accommodation Hotel Aubepine, Ballaigues. Also Hotels at Mantana, Villars St. Beatenberg, Wengen, Lenzerheide, etc.—
Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, London, S.W.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE

Have the Largest Selection of
Other Bibles and Prayer
Books from

6d. to £10.

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

I
B
L
E
S

Illustrated,
Wide Margin,
Interleaved,
Teachers',
Interlinear

Revised,
and other Editions.
Telephone Central 329.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Bathrooms on every Floor,
Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading,
Billiard and Smoking Rooms.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) Single from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, table d'hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc.,
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) Hotel. Close Pier; 1st Class; moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara.

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House. Sussex Gdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel.

GREAT YARMOUTH.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 rooms. Facing Sea.

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCs.

CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments.

LANCASTER.

BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE. 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANDUDNO.

The WHITE HORSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LYNTON (Devon).

ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S HYDRO. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes).

NELSON.

RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station.

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boar's Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c., Lecture.

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

SOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment.

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas. Tel. 647

ROCKLEY HYDRO. Electric and other baths; Excellent cuisine.
Lift. Near Golf Links. From 7s. per day. Tel. 422.

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclist's Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

Your Week End
Is Not Complete

WITHOUT

The Saturday Westminster

(The Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette.")

It is the only Weekly Magazine Review of the kind.

"F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week.
An Unique page of "Problems and Prizes,"
Book Reviews and Special Literary
Articles by the best known Writers.

ONE PENNY. Post 6/6 per annum (home), 8/8 (abroad).

Offices: Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION PUBLISHING Co. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

He won't be happy till he gets it!

The Nation

VOL. VI., No. 19.]
Registered as a Newspaper.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1910.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE		PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK ...	725	Tariff Reform and the Elec-
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—		tors. By Sir Edward Evans	741
The King and the New		The Lords and Finance. By
Parliament ...	728	F. J. H. D. ...	741
The Use of the Majority ...	729	The Crisis and the Refer-
The Value of Labor Exchanges	730	endum. By W. H. Silk ...	741
The Purpose of German		"The Decent Church." By
Armaments ...	731	G. M. V. Hickey ...	742
LIFE AND LETTERS:—		Electoral Reform. By Liberalis	742
Water-Cities ...	733	The Popularity of the Budget.
"La Vérité Vraie" ...	734	By an Onlooker ...	742
On Pan-cakes and Pan-pipes	735	One Man, One Vote. By Justitia	473
The Bee in Winter ...	736	A Free Trade Fighting Fund.
SHORT STUDIES:—		By Hon. Treasurers. Free
The Choice. By John Gals-		Trade Union ...	743
worthy ...	737	POETRY:—
THE DRAMA:—		Old Susan. By Walter de la
From Grim to Gay. By		Mare ...	743
William Archer ...	738	THE WORLD OF BOOKS ...	744
COMMUNICATIONS:—		REVIEWS:—
The Labor Party and Three-		Oxford Reform ...	745
Corner Contests. By G. H.		The Reign of Louis the
Perris ...	740	Fifteenth ...	745
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—		A Seventeenth Century
The County Elections. By Sir		Quietist ...	747
Francis A. Channing, M.P.		Abraham Lincoln ...	748
J. R. Tomlinson, and Mary		The Ingenious Mr. Hogarth ...	748
Florence Coventry ...	740	The Censorship in Action ...	749
		THE WEEK IN THE CITY. By
		Lucellum ...	750

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

So far as we can gather, the majority has come back firmly, unitedly, and passionately resolved to subordinate every question to that of the veto. On the main issue no division exists; but on the question of tactics Sir Edward Russell, the veteran editor of the "Liverpool Post," and one of the wisest, as well as the most moderate, advisers of Liberalism, has raised a point which tests the extreme keenness of the party. Sir Edward insists that the question of the veto must be put even before the Budget, and that to pass that instrument before settling accounts with the Lords would be to surrender the only weapon by which the privilege of the Commons can be maintained. The fighting power of the Government would then have disappeared, and when the question of the veto was raised, the answer might be made that the issue raised by Lord Lansdowne's resolution had been settled. "The Budget has been referred to the people, and now you have got it. What more do you want?" Strong and prompt measures will, we are sure, prove to be the wisest. The fear that Mr. Balfour can come back to power, which the "Westminster" cherishes, seems to us illusory. Mr. Balfour can do nothing. His Ministry, if he could ever form it, would be made up of items and firebrands; the majority would, of course, refuse him supplies, and the Crown a second dissolution, which, indeed, he has no constitutional right to demand. In a word, he could never reach power, and, in our view, does not desire power.

SURELY in such a situation the Ministry has all the cards in its hands. Both the Labor Party and the main lead of Irish Nationalists (the latter in a very able and friendly article in the "Freeman's Journal") have signified their general adherence to the policy of attack on the veto, and their desire not to embarrass the Government in pursuing it. On their side, we hope that the Government will reciprocate this friendliness, and that especially in the new appointments. For example, it is most desirable that, if a change takes place in the Board of Trade, the Minister who succeeds Mr. Churchill should be in full sympathy with the Labor policy of his predecessor, and have the power as well as the will to carry it out.

* * *

In any case we are convinced that the Parliamentary Party will assent to the passage of the Budget, strongly desired as it is by all sections of reformers, only on the understanding of an immediate and practically simultaneous concentration upon the veto. On that condition alone can faith be kept with the constituents. Reports from Scotland and from the North of England are unanimous that the question of the Lords was even more closely and fervently debated than that of the Budget, and that Mr. Asquith's pledge at the Albert Hall has everywhere been interpreted as an earnest of immediate action. Many Liberal members have already made it known that they only hold their seats on condition of dealing with the veto. This is also the basis of the understanding with the Irish and of any closer relations that may be formed with the Labor Party. Upon it the Government possess a majority nearer 130 than 120, and we are clear that not a vote should be wasted nor a moment lost.

* * *

THE elections are now complete, with the exception of those for the Scottish Universities and for Orkney and Shetland. If these three constituencies adhere to the parties which now represent them, the new House of Commons will consist of 275 Liberals, 273 Conservatives, 72 Nationalists, 10 Independent Nationalists, or O'Brienites, and 40 Labor members. Thus the Protectionist Party is in a minority of 124 votes against a Government supported by a coalition of Liberals, Nationalists, and Labor men, who are unquestionably solid on the issue of the veto. The actual majority will even be larger than this, for Mr. Lowther is included in the ranks of the Conservatives, and he will undoubtedly be the Speaker of the new Parliament, while Mr. Chamberlain's, and probably Mr. Collings's, attendance is impossible. Leaving Ireland out, the Administration possesses a British majority of sixty-three. The results in the North are very striking. Scotland and the counties of Lancashire, Yorkshire, Cheshire, Derbyshire, Durham, Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmorland, send to Parliament 175 Liberal and Labor members and only fifty-four Conservatives. But for splits, the supporters of the Government would have been raised to 180, and those of the Opposition would have fallen to forty-nine. The Progressive majority in votes amounts to 388,812.

* * *

MUCH has been said as to the quality of the respective votes for the Government and the Opposition. On this point we have before us an instructive piece of evidence. A leading publisher writes to say that, for the purpose of selling books, his travellers divide England in half: one section takes the North, the other the South; the Northern section stretching from Birmingham upwards and including Ireland and Scotland. The returns of the Northern travellers are more than double the returns of the Southern travellers, the conclusion being that Northern England, with its great artisan populations, contributes the main body of the thinking and reading classes. Southern England, with its pleasure resorts, cathedral cities, and garrison towns, all more or less associated with wealth, is, in comparison with the North, a non-reading population. The Government, therefore, may fairly be said to rest in large measure on the working brain and the reflective forces of the country.

* * *

WE observe that the "Daily Chronicle" and the "Daily News" have both inaugurated and vigorously prosecuted a movement for raising funds for a democratic and Free Trade propaganda in the constituencies, to counteract the doings and sayings of the monstrous regiment of "Tariff Reformers" that has just retired into winter quarters. We strongly approve the object; but we hope that the movements will coalesce, and that the newspapers concerned will drop their special organizations as soon as a competent central machinery has been devised. This is a matter for the Liberal Party as a whole, and there could hardly be a more important one.

* * *

EIGHTY associated Labor Exchanges were opened on Tuesday, and Mr. Churchill, who made a tour of inspection of some of the London offices, has promised that by June next 230 will be at work. All over the country there has been a rush of workmen, chiefly of the unskilled classes, seeking registration. The women who have applied have been mostly clerks, shop assistants, and typists. Employers have been sympathetic, and in course of time there will, no doubt, be regular recourse to the Exchanges both by workmen and by capitalists.

* * *

THE Seine floods are very slowly but quite steadily sinking. The plain below Paris which stretches toward Saint Germain is still a lake, but in the city itself only a few streets beside the river are now under water. A thick and unclean coating of mud remains where the flood had been. Sanitary measures are being taken with the utmost energy, and as yet there has been no sign of an epidemic. But communications are still nearly everywhere broken, and the consequent unemployment continues. We are only now beginning to learn how serious is the suffering and loss in the villages and remoter suburbs. At Rueil the water on Wednesday still lay four feet deep in the streets, and out of 2,000 inhabitants as many as 1,500 need relief. At Saint Denis there are gathered some 1,500 refugees, and some 8,000 workmen are unemployed. There has been some marauding, which, however, was soon suppressed by popular indignation. The soldiers and sailors have behaved with the greatest energy and resource in the work of rescue and prevention.

* * *

OUR Paris correspondent writes:—"It is an experience worth remembering to have assisted at so splendid a demonstration of courage and coolness, of humanity and solidarity, as Paris has given to the world during this terrible week. We have been treated during the last few years to many laments over the decadence of morality in France. Paris has given the lie to the croakers. We need not be concerned for the future of a people that has faced a disaster as this has been faced. The rescue work was magnificently organised: soldiers, sailors, firemen, police, and voluntary helpers were all splendid. And the measures taken by the authorities could not have been better thought out. Throughout Paris the Seine on Friday was above the level of the soil; it was kept back only by the parapets. These were strengthened or heightened and gaps caused by paths leading down to the river were walled up. The result was that we never had water on the Place de la Concorde, or the Champs Elysées, or the Tuileries; some of the Quais were flooded, but not, except in the few cases already mentioned, by the Seine itself."

* * *

TURKISH bazaars and Viennese cafés have been more disturbed during this week by rumors and fear than at any time since the acute stages of the late Balkan complication. This nervousness had several causes. Anything may happen in Greece; Crete is nearing some period or crisis in her fever; Bulgaria is restive, and Macedonia disturbed. But the real fear in the background is, we imagine, of some Austrian move. We know, for our part, of no warrant for this alarm, but the Turks clearly think they know something. The sudden and clumsy attempt of Baron Aehrenthal to patch up a reconciliation with Russia is probably the origin of the unrest. The Turks dread above all else a renewal of the partnership between the two Eastern Empires which used to control their destinies. They can hardly expect a wantonly aggressive move. But, in any one of the complications which Greeks, Bulgars, or Cretans have it in their power to cause in the immediate future, such a partnership would be an awkward and perhaps a dangerous factor for them. They trust the disinterested influence of Great Britain and France, but they will never bring themselves to confide in the two Empires which used to be grouped during the Macedonian complication as the "interested Powers."

* * *

TOWARDS Bulgaria Hakki Pasha seems to be behaving with a commendable prudence. She can make herself respected. Some eight Macedonian Bulgars have been sentenced to death at Salonica for the murder of a Servian agent. What the evidence was no man can say, for they were tried in secret by one of the summary "brigandage" tribunals—a detestable expedient in time of peace. Even were they guilty, such a punishment contrasts too sharply with the leniency shown to the Turkish contrivers of massacre at Adana. The Bulgarians of the kingdom at once manifested their anger, and Hakki Pasha has wisely sent a reprieve to Salonica. Towards Greeks and Cretans he shows no such gentleness. They are not formidable. He has issued a sort of circular which reads like an ultimatum, threatening drastic action if the Cretans should send deputies to the National Assembly. This is a merely provocative move, for the Assembly cannot meet in Greece for several months to come. There are rumors of warlike preparations, probably exaggerated. To us the most ominous fact is the resignation on grounds of "ill-health" of Sir Douglas Gamble, the English Admiral who commands the Turkish Fleet. Such a withdrawal would be inevitable if Turkey had decided on some aggressive action. A British squadron, consisting of a battleship and three cruisers, has sailed for Greek waters, and it is said that the Powers propose once more to occupy Crete—a very proper precaution.

* * *

MEANWHILE, the internal situation in Greece is one of steadily increasing anarchy. At the suggestion of M. Venezelos, the very capable Cretan Premier, who has been busily wire-pulling in Athens, the Military League has unmasked a fresh battery. It has demanded the calling of a National Assembly to revise the Constitution. The Constitution may be faulty, but the changes which are publicly mentioned as desirable are relatively trivial. It is a natural suspicion that something much larger is contemplated—a constituent Assembly which might overthrow the dynasty, or establish a republic, or annex Crete. The King, the Ministry, and the wiser Opposition chiefs at first resisted this proposal, but the League followed its usual procedure of confining the troops to barracks, and the menace has had the usual effect. The King has yielded, and a new Cabinet is now in power, under M. Dragoumis, a respected personality, who was, however, badly compromised in the worst phases of the Greek raids in Macedonia. Colonel Zorbas, of the League, is his Minister of War. It is a part of the bargain that the League shall dissolve when the Assembly is convoked. But no one regards this promise very seriously. The Leaguers, through Colonel Zorbas, will still control the army. It is hard to see any end to this brainless military despotism, until, perhaps, in the fulness of time, the conspirators fall out among themselves.

* * *

THE German Ambassador delivered an interesting speech on Friday at a banquet in the Hotel Cecil. Protesting against the interpretations of German policy which have been current during this election, he said that since German unity had been accomplished Germans had no further thought of aggressive war as a means of attaining national aims. The very fact that Germany is a nation in arms gives her a sense of responsibility, and she will use her strength only for some just and great purpose. Her primary aim is to develop her export trade. That is the whole meaning of Weltpolitik, the policy which aims at the peaceful acquisition of new markets. War can play no part in that policy, for in international exchange the destruction of one of two rivals could not advantage the other. The commerce and credit of the world is far too closely knit to make war, under modern conditions, a profitable adventure to an industrial nation. The new German fleet does not aim at supremacy on the seas. It is required to safeguard and defend the growing interests of German commerce at sea. So far from being a secret menace, the building programme has been known to all the world for ten years, and is unalterably fixed by Act.

* * *

AN entertaining Cromwellian interlude has enlivened the sittings of the Reichstag. A typical Prussian Junker, Herr von Oldenburg, remarked that the obedience of the soldier should be so absolute that at any time the Kaiser may say to any lieutenant, "Take ten men and close the Reichstag." The Reichstag was divided between laughter and anger. Some members suggested that the Captain of Koepenick was really the proper person to give such an order. The Socialists demanded that the President should call Herr von Oldenburg to order. But the President, who happens to be the hereditary Prince of Hohenlohe-Langenberg, seems to have reflected that, in Court circles, these Junker sentiments would be popular. He refused to call Herr von Oldenburg to order, and fell instead, with all the weight of his censure, on the Socialist Deputy Ledebour. On a vote taken subsequently to remove this censure, only the Poles ventured to support the Socialists. The incident is pure comedy, but it does serve to show how little reality there was in the recent agitation against "personal rule." But the Reichstag is probably quite out of touch with German opinion. The Socialists have just won another seat by a by-election, the fourth since last year's Budget.

* * *

LAST Saturday afternoon a terrible accident occurred on the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway, as the Brighton express to London was approaching the Stroat's Nest station. One of the coaches in the middle of the train left the line; the couplings parted, the four front carriages remaining on the line; but the carriages behind were all wrecked, seven passengers were killed, and forty-two injured. From the evidence given on Tuesday at the Board of Trade inquiry, it is difficult to trace the exact cause of the disaster. The points outside the station appear to have been in good condition, and the signalman found them in working order after the accident. The chief mechanical engineer to the railway company seems to have thought that a front bogie wheel may have shifted during the journey, but he considered it improbable, and the inquiry was closed without a conclusion, as happens too frequently in these cases. Whatever was the cause, it is evidently imprudent to run these heavy expresses over points or round sharp curves at something between forty-five and fifty miles an hour, which the guard said was the rate in this case.

* * *

WE observe with pleasure that the Women's Social and Political Union have decided to drop militant tactics—for the present. Even if this is meant to be truce rather than peace, it is an event of some consequence, because it opens the way to a healing of some of the wounds made in this wretched war between men and women. We have always understood that the Government attached importance, from a social point of view, to the closing of this strife. We hope the report that prisoners belonging to the Women's Social and Political Union have just been set at liberty is evidence of this view, and we hope further that the one or two women belonging to the Freedom League, which is, we understand, included in the cessation of violent tactics, now in prison will be released, and that the pending actions against members of this body will be dropped. Then we can all begin to see a little clearer.

* * *

AN addition has been made to the long list of business and schoolmaster bishops by the appointment of Dr. Pollock to the see of Norwich. Little known as a preacher, and unknown as a writer, or even as a figure in Church activities, Dr. Pollock's success as assistant master at Marlborough, and as head master of Wellington, may be supposed to qualify him for the management of a not very difficult diocese. He is also an old blue. We should have thought that more than enough stress had been laid on the administrative side of a bishop's life; but appointment after appointment shows that it still overshadows both scholarship and saintliness. Is not the Anglican Church in danger of being managed to death?

* * *

WE regret to record the death of Mr. J. G. Talbot, who was a member for Oxford University from 1878 to the end of the last Parliament. Mr. Talbot lacked the intellectual distinction of his brother, the Bishop of Southwark, but he belonged to the same school of Churchmanship, which was also Gladstone's, and though his style betrayed a certain unreadiness of mind and timidity of thought, he was of the best type of member of Parliament. Mr. Talbot's party hardly seems to require such service as he gave it, but his line of religious thought will now be represented afresh in the House by Lord Hugh Cecil.

Politics and Affairs.

THE KING AND THE NEW PARLIAMENT.

"The ultimate authority in the English Constitution is a newly elected House of Commons; . . . no matter whether it be the imposing of a tax or the issuing a paper currency; no matter whether it be a question relating to India, or Ireland, or London—A NEW HOUSE OF COMMONS CAN DESPOTICALLY AND FINALLY RESOLVE."—Bagehot, "The English Constitution."

"The House of Commons may, as was explained, assent in minor matters to the revision of the House of Lords, and submit, in matters about which it cares little, to the suspensive veto of the House of Lords; but when freshly elected it is ABSOLUTE—it can rule as it likes, and decide as it likes"—The Same.

"The head of the Executive can overcome the resistance of the Second Chamber by choosing new members of that Chamber; IF HE DO NOT FIND A MAJORITY, HE CAN MAKE A MAJORITY."—The Same.

It is, we suppose, the business of the managers of the Opposition to put before the people of this country, and, we are bound to add, before its Sovereign, their own view of the political situation. But it is none the less the duty of the Government and its friends to bring that view into some relation with the facts. One correction is, we think, indispensable. The Opposition, by a direct violation of the law and custom of the Constitution, and by a long course of action subversive of its spirit and fatal to its practice, have challenged the powers of the Crown and brought up the whole problem of its relations to Lords and Commons. Now, they say, let us "leave the King out of the question." They should have thought of that last year and the preceding years. They could have left him out of the question, had it not been for their blind rage against the Budget, and their resolve to cut down a Liberal Government at all costs. They could have shown some feeling for the difficulties of his position, when, without even informing him of their intentions, their leaders devised and compassed their plot against the privileges of the House of Commons. Historians of the twentieth century will have some pretty strong remarks to make on the way the King has been treated by the party from which he had a right to expect consideration. It might have been thought that even Mr. Balfour's selfishness would have been stirred when he surveyed the inevitable consequences of setting the two Houses in acute conflict, and leaving the Crown to find an adjustment. No such vision crossed the brain of the wreckers who brought about the revolution of last November. The Crown might shift for itself, while they settled their account with Mr. Lloyd George. The election might yield a victory, and then all would be well. Even if they failed, there were other tricks in the bag, with (best of all) the hope that the King might be induced to act against the Constitution.

Well, they have failed, and now, forsooth, when the King has authoritative counsellors, when the country has decided to retain the men on whose advice he dissolved Parliament, and to accept their policy, the voices to which he must listen are those of the defeated party, able to count only 273 votes in the new House of Commons. For the second time the country has decided that it will not have Mr. Balfour at any price. Yet Mr. Balfour is to govern England. The Opposition is in the hands, not of Conservative, but of reactionary forces, which have been guilty of a flagrant coup d'état. Yet we are to proceed as if nothing in particular had happened, and as if the Constitution, which has stopped dead, were marching smoothly on. One party in the State, by virtue of an improper and unconstitutional use of the House of Lords, converts a trifling faction of 168 members into a winning party on four capital issues submitted to Parliament since 1906—finance, the land question, education, and the control of the liquor traffic. Now it is to continue and crown its work. "If they do these things in a green tree, what shall be done in the dry?" If the Lords and their agent in the Commons, or Mr. Balfour and his handy-men in the Lords, thus thwarted and repulsed a majority of 340, what measure of gracious forbearance will they hold out to a majority of 124?

The Tory Party have, therefore, set a pretty dish before the King. Let us, without using the language either of insincerity or of mere flattery, be thankful that at such a moment the Crown is in such good hands. "The value," says Bagehot, "of a discreet, calm, wise Monarch, if such should happen to be reigning at the acute crisis of a nation's destiny, is priceless. He can prevent years of tumult, save bloodshed and civil war, lay up a store of grateful fame to himself, prevent the accumulated intestine hatred of each party to its opposite." The Tory Party, indeed, are prepared to see this store of good-will spilt on the ground. They contemplate, without dismay, the abandonment by the Crown of the position which has given it its firm hold on the affections of the people. They see the Sovereign descending from the lofty position of impartiality which he and his predecessors have so long occupied, to the admiration of the Empire and of the world. They call upon him to descend into the arena of party strife, to reject the advice of his Ministers and the representatives of the people; to exclude the Liberal Party from office, and to convert the entire forces of Liberalism, Labor, and Nationalism into a permanent Opposition. They call, in short, for an even more complete upset of constitutional traditions than that unsuccessfully attempted by the House of Lords on November 30th. In making this demand they ignore not only the natural disposition and character of the Monarch, but the essential conditions of limited sovereignty. The King is not the actual ruler, the final source of energy in the British Constitution. He is the permanent and impartial Chairman of our Board of Empire. He is set to watch the sway of its dominant forces, and to keep something like an equilibrium between them. But this is a work of interpretation, of guidance, not of initiation. All our constitutional writers agree that the final working authority exists in the will of the nation, expressed through the representative power. Thus our Constitution, unlike the American Constitution, possesses "a single determining energy." Obviously this will exists at its utmost strength and purity when the House of Commons is newly elected. Then—according to Bagehot, the most lucid and penetrative of our modern writers on the Constitution—it is really autocratic. A new House of Commons can do anything and will anything. A fortiori, it can brush all serious obstacles from its path, and need tolerate lesser obstacles only by its own free choice. On this point the authority we have quoted is clear, and he has Professor Dicey's powerful support. "The head of the Executive can overcome the resistance of the Second Chamber by choosing new members of that Chamber. If he do not find a majority, he can make a majority." In other words, so powerful is this organ of the nation when it has received a fresh impress of its master's will, that its chief instrument and spokesman, the Prime Minister, is himself clothed with the necessary power to end the opposition of the House of Lords. His recourse to the Crown is to obtain an endorsement of that authority, which he exercises by virtue of rights inherent in and essential to the British Constitution. Bagehot, indeed, insists that this "safety valve" of the constitutional system, as he calls it, is best exercised by the direct "appointee" of the Commons, and by him alone, because, he says, few kings possess the knowledge of affairs, and also the character and temperament, which difficult political situations require in a governing head. Happily, we have a Monarch who possesses this training and these qualifications. But it is none the less true that, in thus approaching the Crown, a Minister fresh from a national mandate and from the resulting vote of a new House of Commons, is himself vested with real and far-reaching authority.

The inference from these facts is, we think, clear. The nation has spoken. The Ministry, supported by the House of Commons, is alone entitled to interpret that voice. Its power of divination is direct, and fresh from the source. No one can go behind it and pick its supporting forces to pieces. The Ministry is united, and there is no question of an alternative Cabinet. All the schemes aiming at reform of the Lords obviously wait on the settlement of the dispute as to powers. The election was taken on an abuse of power by the one House at the expense of the other, and only when that has been determined does the question of the final composition of the House of Lords arise. Withal, Mr. Asquith makes a just and reasonable demand when he declares that, as the Monarchy has long abandoned its absolute veto on legislation, the House of Lords should follow its example. But if he is to be fully armed for his task, it is essential that he should act with speed, and with clear apprehension of the exclusive character of the issue. We therefore hope to see the Veto Bill introduced at the earliest moment of the Session, if possible within a few days of its inauguration. And we trust to see the King's Speech stripped bare even of the hint of legislation which does not point directly to the dominant issue.

THE USE OF THE MAJORITY.

ARITHMETIC was never the strong point of the Tariff Reformer, but we had supposed him capable of distinguishing between a plus and a minus quantity. From a perusal of the "Times," we are driven to conclude that this was too favorable a view. The "Times" distinguishes three great Imperial issues on which the verdict of the constituencies has been given—national defence, the constitutional question, and Tariff Reform. On the third of them it admits some uncertainty, but on the first two "the answer is sufficiently clear," and "on both subjects it is completely reassuring to those who have upheld the Unionist and Imperialist view." One might suppose that there existed a majority of 124, comprising many Free Traders, but averse from Mr. Asquith on the supreme question of the Lords. An intelligent foreigner unacquainted with the actual figures, and reading the "Times" for the first time, might infer that on this Tariff question the country was pretty equally divided, but that the fear of constitutional changes had brought in the Unionists by a decisive majority. Now, this is worth pointing out, because it is not merely an eccentricity on the part of the "Times," but indicative of a state of mind, and also a deliberate and thoroughly unscrupulous tactic, which are widely prevalent among the Opposition. Having failed to destroy our majority, they profess to ignore it. They claim the verdict of the country for themselves, for the House of Lords, and against the Budget, and they claim it with just as much right as Mr. Gladstone would have had if he had claimed the verdict of 1886 as a decision in favor of Home Rule. Mr. Asquith's majority is larger than that which gave Lord Salisbury a six years' tenure of power. It is little inferior to the majority which defeated the Liberals in 1895 and inaugurated ten years of Tory rule. It is, moreover, a majority elected, as nearly as any majority can be under our system, on a single and comprehensive issue. With remarkable clearness, and with justifiable iteration, Mr. Asquith put before the electors the supreme question of the day. He declared his position at the Albert Hall. He confined his election address to the single point. He declined all promises of legislation on any question whatever until the authority of the House of Commons should be vindicated. The result is that he comes back to power with one of the largest majorities of modern times—a majority differing, indeed, within itself upon some issues, but united and concentrated on the one issue that governs all the rest.

There is no doubt of the opinion of the country. Tariff Reform has captured some of the agricultural districts and some of the decaying industries and ill-organised trades. But nowhere has the action of the House of Lords gained votes for the Opposition, and nowhere have its claims any serious social force to rely upon for a backing. It remains for the Government to execute the mandate of the constituencies, and with that object to subordinate everything to the vindication of the rights of the representative House. The Opposition places its trust in the inherent difficulties of the constitutional position. The limitation of the legislative veto, together with the formal extinction of the financial veto, must be incorporated in a Bill—it will, of course, be a single Bill—and this Bill must be accepted by the House of Lords. It is at this point that they expect to find salvation. The Lords are to throw out the Bill, and thus force a second dissolution within six, perhaps within three or four, months—a dissolution which is to find the Liberals exhausted in energy and finance, and their opponents prepared to be borne to power on the ever-flowing tide of beer. But at this point they make a little miscalculation. There exists, as we remind our readers in the preceding article, an ultimate resource known to the Constitution, by which the unreasonable opposition of the Upper House can be overcome; that is to say, by the creation of peers. There is no doubt whatever, in view of his Albert Hall speech, that Mr. Asquith will advise his Majesty that the time has come when this instrument, disagreeable and objectionable as it may be, must be brought into play. With characteristic disregard of precedent and of constitutional ethics, the Opposition appears to assume that the King will reject the advice of his Ministers for the sake of those who, we must assume, rejected his advice in the autumn. They may not see the full implication of this position, but it amounts to nothing less than the permanent institution of the Unionist Party in power, without regard to the views of the electorate or the composition of the House of Commons.

A demand so extravagant must be met with firmness from the outset. Fortunately, Mr. Asquith has made his position perfectly clear. Speaking at once for himself and his colleagues, he declared that he would neither assume nor hold office without adequate guarantees that the work of the House of Commons would not be wasted and its energies spent in ploughing the sands. The nature of these guarantees is known to all men; they consist in the requisite power to overcome in the last resort the opposition of the House of Lords, and to this end there is one means, and one only, known to the constitution. In the faith that the requisite guarantees would be obtained, constituencies have been fought and won, and even if there were any thought of paltering with the question among our leaders, which there is not, members could not face their constituencies with a record of pledges broken in this vital matter. It is urged by a few faint hearts that by keeping his pledge Mr. Asquith risks the possibility of a second dissolution. That risk is always before us, but let us ask fairly in which direction lies the best chance of averting it, in facing the question now while the controversy is fresh upon us, when no new issue has arisen, when a second dissolution would mean the putting of precisely the same question twice over to the electorate, or in deferring the decision till some months have passed, when the situation will, in fact, have changed in some material respects, and a second election, if troublesome to all concerned, would not be too absurd to contemplate? If, to take the worst that could happen, we suppose that Mr. Asquith failed at this juncture to obtain the guarantees of which he spoke, what would be the alternative? Mr. Balfour might attempt to form a Ministry and to carry on the Government? What would be his position? How could he deal with the existing House of Commons, and what shadow of right would he find for recommending a dissolution? His task would be hopeless, and if he attempted it, it could only be with the result of re-establishing Mr. Asquith more firmly in power, with a more assured authority for insisting on the conditions upon which alone he or any Liberal Minister can henceforward hold office. These conditions may be expressed in a moderate form, provided always that the fundamental object is secured, that after every allowance has been made for the claim of suspensory and revising powers there shall come a point at which the will of the people, expressed through their representatives, shall prevail. To secure this result has been the object with which the election has been fought, and upon which it has been won. Nor can any Liberal Government, now or in the future, hold power except with the assurance that this object is within its grasp.

THE VALUE OF LABOR EXCHANGES.

WHEN a factory manager wants a few more "hands" in one of his departments, a builder two or three more bricklayers, a tradesman another clerk or shop-assistant, his course of proceeding, so soon as our new Labor Exchanges are got into full working, will be greatly simplified. He will no longer be the creature of chance, taking on a man who happens to apply at the right time, or some one whom his foreman happens to know is out of a job, or some stray person who turns up in answer to a casual advertisement. He will ring up the Labor Exchange, stating his wants; they will tell him what men or women with the required qualifications they have on their register; if he comes down to the Exchange or sends his foreman, they will have the likely men on hand for him to inspect and interrogate; or if he will leave it to their discretion they will select the men that seem most suitable. If the local Exchange cannot directly meet his demand, it is in close, constant communication with neighboring Exchanges and can probably procure at short notice the labor he requires, or if this labor market is tight, the provincial Exchange is in touch with the whole national supply of labor through the National Exchange, and will be enabled to draw unoccupied men from some quite distant place to meet the particular demand. This will be an immense saving of time, trouble, and expense for the employer, securing him the pick of available labor from the widest area in the quickest time.

Not less advantageous is the new mechanism from the standpoint of the worker. It ought soon to banish from sight the pathetic spectacle of the workman, displaced by some new process or some trade depression, wandering from factory to factory, from yard to yard, with some dim and ever dwindling hope of being "taken on," sometimes led by vague rumor to tramp from town to town, gradually losing the expectation and even the capacity for regular employment. Hitherto, very little trouble has been taken to conserve the labor power which is the main source of our industrial civilisation: large masses of it have been suffered continually to waste and decay, poisoning by their enforced idleness the social system. Our postal, railway, financial, and other departments of profitable activity have long enjoyed clearing-houses which are veritable miracles of ingenuity. It is matter of regret, even of shame, that England, the most advanced country of the world in the arts of industry and commerce, should have waited for Germany, Holland, and other nations to lead the way in establishing a clearing-house for labor.

The success of the seventy Labor Exchanges now set up in all our chief industrial centres depends upon the fulfilment of two conditions. The first is a favorable attitude of mind in employers and workers. This is a matter of goodwill and of faith, a conviction that an impartial regard for social welfare dominates the administrator of the Exchange. The whole idea of the Exchange is based on a reasonable belief that to secure the proper post for the proper man is of equal advantage to both of the parties concerned. When employers on the one hand, workers and their unions on the other, learn by experience that the Exchange officials are not endeavoring to interfere with or to restrict, but rather to facilitate and enlarge, their choice and rights of bargaining, they will, we are convinced, be willing to adopt the Labor Exchange in the same spirit as the telephone or any other labor-saving device of our modern civilisation. How far and how fast this habit grows, will largely depend upon the discretion with which the able men appointed to manage the local Exchanges perform duties which, particularly at the outset, will involve great resourcefulness and responsibility.

The other condition of success is the early provision of those other instruments required to give efficacy to an unemployed policy. Though Labor Exchanges will abate the worry and the waste of unemployment, they do not furnish a remedy. Their operation will not sensibly increase the aggregate volume of employment. When a general wave of depression spreads over the national trade, large numbers of workmen registering their want of work at the Exchanges will not be able to find employment until trade revives: skilled hands, displaced by some new labor-saving machine rapidly introduced into the trade, will not easily pass into any allied trade at ordinary times. Thus it may well come to pass that the inability of Labor Exchanges to find work for most or many of the applicants may lead to disappointment, disparagement, and neglect. For this reason, if for no other, it is urgently necessary that, so soon as political emergencies allow, the other related sections of the unemployed policy, especially the insurance scheme already promised, should be brought into being. If every man in the building or the engineering trades can look forward with confidence to the fact that, whenever he is out of work, he can either obtain employment through the Exchange, or, in default, an income sufficient to tide him and his family over the period of idleness, a most notable advance in social order and social justice will have been made. The extension of the insurance scheme to all the staple trades, accompanied by the provision through the Labor Exchanges of "a waiting salary" for workers in those trades to which a compulsory insurance scheme may be inapplicable, will be a practical solution of the gravest problem of unemployment. Until these proposals are clothed in legislation, and some further machinery is devised for dealing with the cases which the Exchanges will sift out as unemployable, the full utility of the Labor Exchange must rest in abeyance.

Though further delay in the development of this unemployed policy will justly rank as one count in the indictment against the Lords, we cannot refrain from expressing our deep regret that the Government did not in the beginning of their career press forward this constructive policy. The defence of Free Trade, entrusted to them four years ago, urgently demanded it. Its neglect has placed in the hands of our Protectionists by far the most formidable weapon they possess, and one which they have wielded with immense effect in this General Election. It was evident four years ago that Free Traders had no arguments, simple and popular, by which they could meet effectively the passionate and specious appeals which their adversaries made for Tariff Reform as a cure for local trade depression and unemployment. Recognising as they did that Free Trade could not secure fullness and regularity of employment, and aware that Protection could not increase, but must diminish, the aggregate of national employment, they failed to take due account of the forcible appeals which could be made to the narrower local outlooks of ordinary men by politicians bent upon the art of electioneering. The only effective answer to these appeals consists in completing the machinery of which Labor Exchanges are the foundation. We must establish an instrument of social order, such as is most comprehensively described in the Minority Report of the Poor Law Commission, which shall secure for the body of genuine working-men and women in the country the open road to adequate subsistence upon honorable terms. Nothing short of this satisfies the sense of justice in the breast of the worker as he confronts the hazards of his life.

THE PURPOSE OF GERMAN ARMAMENTS.

The speech which the German Ambassador delivered at a banquet in London last Friday was interesting, not merely as an apology for the German navy, but also as an innovation in diplomatic practice. It went far beyond the platitudes about amity and peace which are customary on ceremonial occasions. It was, for all its quietness of form and its tact in phrasing, a consciously polemical utterance. It was an answer to exaggerations and interpretations which have played a part in the General Election, and it was spoken before that election was technically quite completed. The speech in itself has been much noted and commented upon. But it is a tribute to Count Metternich's skill that its comparative novelty as a procedure has passed unnoticed. This new method in diplomacy is, after all, so natural and so salutary that we are all disposed to accept it as though it were the commonest instead of the rarest incident in the intercourse of peoples. It marks the abandonment of the fiction which used to regard an Ambassador, first, as a species of international courtier despatched by one monarch to another, and, later, as an official of the Foreign Office accredited to do business with other officials as remote and sacrosanct as himself. He is gradually becoming the recognised spokesman of one nation to another, and it is proper that a spokesman should speak. The Germans, who know how to combine modernity in method with a very rigid aristocratic and monarchical tradition, have gone further than any other European people in discarding the reticences of the older diplomacy. It happened that Count Pourtales in St. Petersburg was making, almost on the same day, a speech as outspoken, and yet in all probability as calculated, as Count Metternich's. Our own tradition is bound as yet by all the old rigidities of silence. Our diplomatists abhor the platform as our Foreign Office ignores the Press.

The burden of the Ambassador's very quiet and temperate answer to English alarmists was a denial of the current Jingo suspicion that, in rebuilding her fleet, Germany aims at an eventual supremacy at sea. His statements, one fears, will make little impression in the quarter at which they are aimed. When an obsession has gone so far as this, any attempt to remove it is apt to be treated as one proof the more of a Machiavellian design. A Power which did scheme to build an Armada in secret would not scruple to use specious explanations as a screen. Yet the salient fact about the German preparations has been their candor and publicity. The whole scheme was mapped out in advance and published to the world. Its motives and aims were embodied with an almost startling frankness in the famous preamble to the Navy Act of 1900. That preamble, as the "Manchester Guardian" points out, is commonly misquoted. It runs thus, in its cold and almost brutal calculation:—

Under the existing circumstances, in order to protect Germany's sea trade and colonies, there is one means only, viz., Germany must have a fleet of such strength that even for the mightiest naval Power, a war with her would involve such risks as to jeopardise its own supremacy.

For this purpose it is not absolutely necessary that the German fleet should be as strong as that of the greatest sea Power, because generally a great sea Power would not be in a position to concentrate all its forces against us. But even if it should succeed in confronting us in superior force, the enemy would be so considerably weakened in overcoming the resistance of a strong German fleet that, notwithstanding a victory gained, the enemy's supremacy would not at first be secured any longer by a sufficient fleet.

There is here a perfectly sane and reasonable prevision. It would be folly to deny that it refers primarily to ourselves. But the eventuality which it contemplates is certainly not a German aggression. It is rather some such attack from our side as Mr. Arthur Lee coolly speculated upon in public. We have honestly to set this German ideal of a fleet strong enough to make an attack dangerous against our own consecrated standard of a fleet strong enough to crush those of the two next greatest Powers in combination. If we can, with any show of sincerity, maintain that our standard is unaggressive, the German criterion is modesty itself. For our part, we believe that the cold and open reasoning of this preamble, so far from concealing any ulterior ambition, is an exact and scientific rendering of the precise thought which does, in fact, inspire the German building. The presupposition in the minds of those who doubt its sincerity is, we suppose, the assumption that when once a Power begins to think in terms of force, no force is worth having which is not supreme. That is a crudity which all experience contradicts. One might as well argue that, because the French army must always be numerically inferior to the German, the French might as well disarm and fling themselves on the pitiful toleration of Europe. They know, of course, that however efficient their army may be, it can never again dream of crossing the Rhine or march to the music of "à Berlin." But it can, by a well-conceived plan of mobilisation, and by some superiority in armament, maintained by constant sacrifices and the best aid of science, hope to oppose to an invader a resistance which would make aggression a too costly and fruitless adventure. The same reasoning which inspires the French to maintain their army has tempted the Germans to re-build their fleet. Each hopes by adequate preparation to avert a conflict from which neither could expect to profit, and the chief purpose of the army in the one case, and of the fleet in the other, is to render diplomatic intercourse possible on something approaching equal terms. The breaking point, or the yielding point, in any negotiations will be postponed so long as the stronger Power is persuaded that, in the clash by which it may hope to overbear its rival, it would itself lose much of its own weight and solidity.

Count Metternich's speech was notable, not merely for the skill with which he contrived to suggest the defensive purpose of German armaments, but also for the rare excursion into a more speculative field, when he argued that modern credit and industry have made wars of aggression senseless and obsolete. Mr. Norman Angell, whose powerful tract on "Europe's Optical Illusion" was noticed in these columns, may congratulate himself, we think, on having gained a disciple in Count Metternich. The phrases, the very illustrations which have given this little book a deserved success, reappear in the Ambassador's speech. Once grasp the simple fact that all trade is an exchange, and no nation can desire the ruin of another. It is probable, indeed, that international credit is now so highly organised that the victor would suffer from the losses he inflicted on the vanquished hardly less severely than the beaten foe. A triumphant bombardment of Hamburg would no doubt mean ruin to Berlin, but it would also shake every bank and every insurance office in the City. These elementary conceptions which underlie all the modern intercourse between nations cannot be too widely popularised. War was a sane adventure when the aristocracy of the successful nation could annex the lands of the vanquished and reduce its peasantry to serfdom. The Normans behaved quite reasonably. But under modern conditions, where one community of traders and bankers can only hope to ruin another community of customers and clients, it is an unintelligible folly. When once this simple truth is grasped, a corollary follows. If war is obsolete, then armaments are a superfluous barbarism. Step by step the progress of law and custom has removed the incentives to war. Pillage on land and the confiscation of estates are utterly out of date. It remains to make the preying upon the enemy's commerce at sea equally antiquated. The preamble of the German Navy Act starts from the necessity of protecting German commerce. To secure the commerce of belligerents by international agreement is to destroy the last cogent argument for costly naval defences.

Life and Letters.

WATER-CITIES.

To the water-cities among the hurrying towns of Europe belongs an eternal crown of peace. Where no wheel has ever rumbled, there is the enduring calm. Where no whip has ever rent the air, there is the repose of a lasting kindliness. It is a literary fiction that Eastern towns are drowsy. Their cobbles ring through the long daylight to the clatter of incessant hoofs. The water-carrier and the melon-seller cry all day through the bazaar. The dogs rise up from their noon-time slumbers to chase the intruder from their traditional quarter, and to remind the human stranger of his eccentricity and his foreign garb. The thong and the stick fall amid guttural shouts upon the hides of the oxen and the worn coats of the asses. Peace comes only at sundown, when the stray traveller lights his furtive lantern, and the muezzin chants his reminder that prayer is better than sleep. If there is a world of opium and silence, it is hidden in shady courts, behind latticed windows, or in the quadrangles of the deserted Arab mosque, where the feet sink in the sand that lies deep on the flags and tiles, and memory searches for the deeds that cling to the musical name of Ibn Touloun.

The drowsy cities are the seats of sea-empires, where the spoils came in through Zuyder Zee or Adriatic, where the churches and the tombstones gloat on triumphant robberies, and the calm reposes on a past of deeds achieved. They are gloriously decadent, the two great water-cities. The canals of Amsterdam mirror none but the tall seventeenth century houses, with the dolphins that curl on either side of their rounded gables. Venice stands untroubled by present or future, massive in her enduring past. It is the silent element of water which laps them in the dignity of peace. The spell, indeed, is broken in Amsterdam, where the new red Bourse rises in its strong simplicity among tramways and carts. But the intrusion of traffic only serves to emphasise the tranquillity of the streets which border the canals. Here where the bookshops line a deserted quay, there where the barges are transformed into a market of flowers, and down those long avenues where only the ripple of a passing boat breaks the slowly moving shadow of the trees, the peace of centuries is unbroken and unassailed. The silence is only half the charm. Subtler even than the silence is the pervading sense of rest that belongs to still and untroubled water. A hurrying stream is the prototype of unrest. But water which has reached its level is the symbol of attainment. One does not ask of a canal from what melted snows its waters came, or down what gorges and cascades it flung itself in its need of calm. It has arrived. It is still. It brings its unimaginative peace to the men who build upon its banks.

It has been said of Paris during these weeks of flood that it was Venise malgré lui. It had, indeed, become a water-city. Boats plied through its streets. The sound of wheels was forgotten, until men must have longed for the unquiet rumble and the dusty air of traffic. The harried beasts which still survive the coming of petrol rested in their stables through a week of Puritan Sabbaths—if, indeed, their stables were not inundated. But there the parallel ends. The water came with ruin, and it may go out with pestilence. To the chance foreigner or the curious crowd which descended from the safe heights of Montmartre, the spectacle of the lake on the Champs Elysées and the canal in the Rue St. Honoré may have seemed merely odd and astonishing. The Parisian gaiety is equal to the task of extracting merriment out of mud, and laughter out of danger. The solemn middle-aged merchants and matrons climbing up ladders into their first-floor windows, and the gilded youth concealing long sticks of bread under their fur cloaks must, indeed, have made an entertaining spectacle. One smiles to think of deputies walking along a raised plank as they left the Palais Bourbon, for all the world as though a buccaneer were behind them. There is a touch of comedy in the exciting hunts in tranquil suburbs in which sailors from the fleet chased the pirates of the bakeries and the game shops. But the main note in all the chronicles of the flood is one of tragedy, faced, indeed, with energy and courage, but frankly realised in all its perils. While the good citizen felt anxious for the safety of the public buildings, the plain man watched for cracks in the walls of his jerry-built villa. And it was a triumphant destroyer, which swirled up to the parapets of the bridges. The dead shepherd chased his heifer past the closed doors of the Morgue. A wayside crucifix from some submerged Calvary told of ruined villages, as it crossed the shadow of Nôtre Dame. There was nothing in all this of the peaceful decadence of a water city. The Socialist newspapers chronicled day by day the miseries of the unemployed, and among the tombs of the disembodied great, the homeless slept on the marbles of the Panthéon. The ruin of angry waters surged even into the inner city through sewers and tunnels, and the engineer asked himself whether the street, which was a canal to-day, might not sink like the roof of a flooded mine to-morrow. It was a disaster which overshadowed its petty and ridiculous discomforts. Day and night the Seine and its island assumed a novel and tragic beauty. The Cathedral stood out in new perspective above the flood, like a tower isolated upon a lake, and the devil on its turret leered at the carcasses which swept past him on the waters. One fancies him, like the Gothic spirit on the "Auld Brig" of Ayr, rejoicing in the peril of the new bridges and presaging the ruin of the upstart world around him—

"As yet ye little ken about the matter.
But twa-three winters will inform ye better.
When heavy dark continued a'-day rains
Wi' deepening deluges o'erflow the plains . . .
Then down ye'll hurl, deil nor ye ever rise!
And dash the gumlie jaups up to the pouring skies,
A lesson sadly teaching to your cost,
That Architecture's noble art is lost."

One can fit into that landscape the cruel birds from strange latitudes which float above the river and hail the devil of the turret in Méryon's mad, immortal etching.

The catastrophe sets one reflecting upon the incurable improvidence of our kind. These floods are no rare happenings. The last which attained to anything like the same proportions was in 1876. But as many as fourteen are on record during the past century. Below Paris, and in open country, they may be comparatively harmless. But the very precautions which seem to tame the river, the quays, the parapets, and, above all, the bridges, make the flood when it comes peculiarly ruinous. The engineers and architects of the Second Empire were well aware of the danger, and calculated the height of their parapets in accordance with a long experience. But a thriftless generation since their day has allowed the parapets to be pierced, and created a new and much more serious danger in the tunnels and sewers. Forestry is not a neglected art in France. Yet the first days of the flood brought from the Vosges and the hills, whence the Marne and the Yonne draw their waters, complaints of the destruction of ancient forests and of taxes which discourage the enterprise of the individual proprietor. Engineers came forward to explain how safety might be purchased by the cutting of a canal above Paris, which, in times of flood, would diminish the waters of the river before it could break on the obstacle of the island and the bridges. It would certainly be a costly insurance, but no one reckons the loss to Paris from this single flood at less than a million sterling. That million may be multiplied twentyfold before this century closes; for as the city grows and values enhance, the loss from each flood must inevitably break the record of its predecessors. Already, amid the pressure of relief work and the collection of charity, the Republic has found time to nominate a Scientific Commission. It will be a curious experience to watch how its recommendations fare at the hands of successive Ministers of Finance, as the memory of the flood is submerged by some naval panic, and the pressure of financiers eager for the penetration of Morocco obliterates the recollection of these weeks of dearth and peril. One foresees how Government after Government will admit the imperative necessity, while Budget after Budget escapes the unwelcome burden. The law of averages is a poor stimulus to thrift and foresight. No generation is likely in the Seine valley to escape a disastrous flood. But the happy chance, verified by long years of immunity, is always there. Some Parisian Noah will acquire the name of crank by an annual interpellation in the Chamber. But the ark will not be built, nor the canal dug. It is a happy improvidence—the improvidence which digs the terraced vineyards on Vesuvius, and so kindly built Pompeii for our instruction. When every disease has its vaccine, when we cease to shake hands for fear of infection, when we restrict our diet to proteid pills and Metchnikoff curds, then, perhaps, we shall provide for floods and evacuate the zones of earthquake. But it will be a prudent and joyless and sterilised existence that is left to us, when the milk of human kindness has been Pasteurised and the wine of life has lost the bacillus of danger.

“LA VÉRITÉ VRAIE.”

By all means let us have the truth, the whole truth, and all the rest of it. If, as Mr. Edmund Gosse told the London Institute last Tuesday, there is a false and timid delicacy which hinders the truth of biography, let us shovel it away. Delicacy is all very well, and we are sorry to trample on anyone's feelings, but we are seeking truth—truth, though it blast us, as the Sartor said of spiritual things. We are out for truth, and are not to be put off with the golden syrup of relatives who keep one eye on the family credit, nor with the icy enumerations of an epitaph. The truth we seek may be harsh and unrefined and crude. It may poison our preconceptions, and disintegrate our reverence. That does not matter. Give us the truth about everyone, however unpleasant, however disillusionising, and we shall be grateful. Let no crook in the obliquities of character be smoothed over or concealed. Let the merciful darkness be explored, and the closest intimacies be uncovered. A mother may become merchandise, and a man play the Devil's Advocate over his father's bones. But at all costs we will have the truth about the dead, whether it be good or whether it be evil. For the truth is great, and will prevail over the defenceless.

No fear, no shame, no awe of shattered idols can deter us from that search, and, without jesting, we would only raise the further question, What is truth? It is very likely that Mr. Gosse raised the question, too, for the report of his lecture is skimpy as a ghost. But what is the truth of a dead man's being? How are we to get at the reality of his nature among all that jumble of contradictions, inconsistencies, uncertainties, and baffled desires? Take the simple and universal case of health alone. We would not fall into the heresy of the Manichæans, and separate body and soul as light from darkness; as in a Catholic marriage, the two are not to be divorced, being intermingled in one person. Certainly we must take account of the body with its strength or frailty, its endurance or collapses, its good circulation, which is happiness, its powerful digestion, which is will. But at once we are faced with the doubt whether the truth we are seeking is to be found only in health, or whether we must take account of sickness, too. The man we study will probably have been entirely different if ill, or if well; and the difference may have depended just on the change of a wind that blows as it lists. We should naturally choose the state of health for our discovery, but then we come upon men of high distinction whose life is a long disease, and we come upon others whose genius disappears when sanity breaks out again, as the soldier said of peace.

Shall we then catch the truth of a man's existence by describing every recorded side of his character, and every phase of his moods—good and bad, powerful and weak, healthy and sick together? The world would not contain the books that might then be written, and, though we outdid the hypnotists in the subdivision of the various kinds of self, or evoked qualities from the region of dreams, no mortal would be the wiser. For the truth we seek is not a jungle of contradictions, but a clear prospect to be apprehended. Through want of time or sympathy or interest, we judge our fellows by a working rule of thumb. We know we can depend on one man's honesty or another's courage, while it is useless to expect action from this man, or eloquence from that, or politeness from a third. But the men themselves are probably quite unaware of their gifts or limitations. To self all things seem possible, and the brave man knows he might have run away, the coward that he might have stopped. Self will not tolerate the sense of limit, either in the way of good or evil. You may praise a man's imagination as celestial, but if you imply a want of arithmetical accuracy, he is hurt. Congratulate him on his careful sobriety, and next day he will drink the gutters of Bohemia. Commend a woman for her light and charming form, but if you add that the Venus of Milo measures so many more cubic inches in substance, you will not increase her favor. Rise to ecstasy over a poet's verse, but if you suggest that Homer might have written differently, he will think you jealous.

What, then, is the biographer to do? In this tangle of unlimited possibilities, where is he to find the clue of personality—the real self which suffers or creates all these varying and contradictory actions, moods, or emotions, and in the end, as it were, strings them together and sums them up into what is called its life? The difficulty is increased by the biographer's own nature, for that brings into play another spirit of unlimited capacities and a character of its own. In a portrait gallery the works of the same painter all have a strong family likeness, though they may represent people of entirely different temperaments. You may say of a living woman she looks like a Gainsborough, or a Romney, or even like a Lely, meaning she is like the aspect of the painter's own mind. And so in biography, the writer plays his part, nor is his light dry, but moist with personality. If Boswell has no second in biography, Carlyle still comes in sight, superb as Tacitus in phrase, endowed with passionate sympathy and a fearless penetration. Yet he is himself his own portraits; his soul speaks in his Cromwell, and between his Cromwell and his Frederick the Great there is the resemblance of brothers, though they had no two points in common, except, perhaps, the management of cavalry on the field. Macaulay thought it was Boswell's folly that put him first as a biographer and all the rest nowhere. “If he had not been a great fool, he would never have been a great writer,” he says, in that striking, slap-dash way of his; it was “because Boswell was a dunce, parasite, and a coxcomb that he became immortal.” Well, we know it is not true, but perhaps a certain humility of disposition—a colorless neutrality, not anxious to impress itself and its own value into the picture—might help the biographer towards the truth so difficult to reveal.

If we wanted to suggest a further difficulty still, we might remember that the ideal formed of a man during his lifetime reacts upon himself, and he becomes what other people think he is. Knowing his reputation as a wit and a bear, Johnson became more witty and more bearish. Knowing the popular esteem for his melancholy, Byron put on desperation like a garment. Knowing how highly his friends valued his courage, Tartarin crossed the sea. But, indeed, if we go on like this, we shall terrify future biographers from attempting their task at all, and then, about once in a hundred years, the world will be the loser. We must admit that what we really want is difficult to find. We are sure that when Mr. Gosse demands the truth and nothing but the truth, he would admit that, too. As was noticed lately in these columns in reference to a new biography of Sir Philip Sidney, it is not often, in speaking of a man's life, that we can say, “There is the man himself; there is the essential spirit, burning, though only for a moment, with pure flame, while all the rest, though it last for years, is mere twilight, clotted obscurity, or the unenumerated hours of sleep.” It is not often, but in a biography that is worth writing at all, the moment may occur once or even twice, and there, perhaps, we shall find the real truth—"la vérité vraie"—that we and Mr. Gosse so much desire.

A week ago the members of the Thames Valley Legitimist Club were hanging a memorial wreath on the equestrian statue of Charles I. near Charing Cross. We do not belong to the Club ourselves, and are ignorant of the motives that impel inhabitants of the Thames Valley thus to expose their lives to risk of the hideous penalties inflicted on High Treason. But it can hardly be the Royal martyr's falsity, blindness, and family life that they commemorate, though in a biography of Charles all those things would have to come in as part of the truth. It is probably Van Dyck's pathetic portraits that stir their blood; or it is that verse of Andrew Marvell's. The reproachful look of passive dignity—those few minutes before death during which a king did nothing common or mean, appear to reveal the inner truth, the essential reality of the man, far more clearly than either loyal panegyrics or the detractions of the learned. Similarly, great biographer though Lockhart was, how chilly and uninforming is the elaborate conclusion in which he analyses the character of Scott! Let us but recall a few of those frigid sentences:—

"The grand virtue of fortitude, the basis of all others, was never displayed in higher perfection than in him; and it was, as perhaps true courage always is, combined with an equally admirable spirit of kindness and humanity. His pride, if we must call it so, undebased by the least tincture of mere vanity, was intertwined with a most exquisite charity, and was not inconsistent with true humility. . . . He was a patient, dutiful, reverent son; a generous, compassionate, tender husband; an honest, careful, and most affectionate father."

It smells of mortality and the chancel slab. With what relief we turn to our old friend: "Affliction sore Long time she bore!" But if we would have the true Scott, there are those last words he said to the same Lockhart: "My dear, be a good man. Nothing else will give you any comfort when you come to lie here." Or, better still, there is that saying of his son's, who wondered why so many famous people came to visit his father, but supposed it was because he was always the first to see a sitting hare.

When "Christopher North" died, Carlyle wrote of him, "John Wilson had much nobleness of heart, and many traits of noble genius, but the central tie-beam seemed always wanting." Perhaps it is, after all, that central tie-beam—the keystone, as we rightly say of an arch—that we really seek above all else in biography. The rest may be true enough, but apart from the keystone, it does not matter much. Unless all the bits of truth are bound together by the tie-beam, they do not matter at all; and if, like "Christopher North," the man had no tie-beam—well, life is short, and we can only pass him with the hope he may do better in heaven. We have only time for the essential, for the moments of clear flame, and those brief combinations of spirit when, as Abt Vogler says, out of three sounds are framed not a fourth sound but a star. So it is that when biographers, mumbling like ghouls the pitiful bones, produce for our edification "the truth" about this man or that, the world remains tolerantly indifferent. In its own vision it perceives a truer truth. Let the ghouls do their worst, the ideal of portraiture must still be preserved, and if there were no Shelley, youth would have to invent him.

ON PAN-CAKES AND PAN-PIPES.

ONE of those kind people who take the trouble to let a writer know when anything he has to say interests them said recently in a letter to the writer of these lines (à propos of something he had published), "the Bretons and Spaniards enjoy their festivals as a schoolboy eats a pan-cake, without even a remote thought of Pan." The recipient confesses that he was both startled and delighted by the suggestion of a connection, hitherto by him unsuspected, between Pan and pan-cakes. To him a Shrovetide pancake had been a pancake flat and round, and it had been nothing more. It had smelt of the frying-pan rather than of the fair humanities of old religion. Skeat derives pan-cake from "pan," not the god, but the broad shallow vessel, the Latin "patina," the Low Latin "panna." But what is the truth about this? The idea seems too good not to be true. The tossing of the pancake performed in some places has all the air of some old-world sacred rite. What more fitting than that the sacred cake should be solemnly eaten in honor of Pan on the day of "Carne Vale," of farewell to the joie de vivre, at the close of festivities and merrymakings before the wintry weeks of Lent?

Pan falls asleep every winter, but we do not say "farewell" to him till the Christmas merriment is over, and even then (unlike the schoolboy mentioned above) we look forward to his vernal woodland waking, and so our Shrove Tuesday pancake becomes the pan-cake of a prophecy. There comes every year some one day when Pan, the deathless, wakes from sleep, when the dead earth is alive again, and once more becomes life-giving and satisfying. In days now vanished and consumed by Time, the writer lived in a dilapidated cottage, behind which stretched miles and miles of deep green woods. There is nothing in the world like a spring wood in South-country England. As one writes one smells the good smell of wood where the woodcutters are at work in a clearing in the dry, warm air. These woods were to all intents and purposes his own careless park and pleasure-ground. Year after year he spent hours in them, day after day, all the long summer through. It was not quite "farewell my book and my devotion," but they were somewhat lazy pretexts for sauntering in that warm and still and solitary place. They were woods in which one might lose oneself—in which one never met another human creature, save now and again a game-keeper, or the wood-cutters at their work. Day after day each spring, one would ask the question, "Shall I try the woods to-day?" Sometimes one made the attempt too soon, only to be driven back by the chill, unkindly weather. But there always came some one day, when the winter spell was broken, and one felt again the old delight, the joy of the earth's waking. This was usually about the twenty-first of April. The last ten days in April and the first ten in May are the time of the fresh beauty of an English wood.

Long before that, of course, the primrose "ventures up," as Mr. Stephen Phillips says, and he is a poet, if but for that one word. It comes up, bud and stem and leaves all together, out of the earth, like the flower from an enchanter's pot, but it looks starved and stunted in the winds of March. By mid-April the stars are large and yellow on their long juicy stalks. One has no skill to tell of all the flowers, and cannot say which one loves best. The frail anemones in their shy clusters are the first venturers of all. How pure and gay they look when the one day comes! The orchises, with the strange mystical marks on their green leaves, bloom later on, in May, in their fresh beauty for a day or two, when the primroses are almost done. The different flowers had their haunts in different nooks and corners of the wood. One came now on primroses and anemones growing together, and now on violets. Here and there were banks of cowslips, and at the wood's farthest border a great sheet of bluebells. The flowers grew always best where there had been made a clearing in the wood the year before. One knows not what to speak of in the wood, or where to begin to praise. One thinks of the green woodland "rides," in spring, literally "primrose paths" which crossed one another in all directions. One remembers the bronze gold of the young oak-leaves, and the red and gilded oak-apples. One thinks, above all, of the silence, which made one long that tired town people might be bathed in it.

This silence was, for the most part, broken only by the noises of living creatures, by the notes of birds, and the whirr and rustle and hum of insects and furred and feathered and bristly things. These all knew the day of Pan's waking, and came to welcome him to his domain. Melissa knew when she would find the flowers. The sulphur-colored butterflies, flowers themselves, fluted out the self-same day. As for the birds, the trees were green Towers of Babel. The wood was haunted by nightingales, and the cuckoo mocked all day. The summer nights were filled with the scream of the nightjar. (It was pathetic, by the way, to hear a tired-looking woman, passing through the country of the wood in the train, say, one day in spring, "I should so like to hear the cuckoo—I haven't heard him once this year.") The long months of Pan's reign were happy ones for all the creatures of his woodland retinue. One saw, indeed, sad sights sometimes, say, a bright-winged jay, caught by the leg in a trap, fluttering and screaming. The writer came suddenly one day on a tree from the lowest branch of which hung the sleek, glossy bodies of seven freshly-killed moles—Septem Fratrum Martyrum.

Lent tells us that we are greater than and different from all the sensuous world of which we form part, and should rise above it. In summer it may re-absorb us, but in Lent hundreds and thousands honestly try to gain a certain amount of detachment from it. On the day of pancakes they bid it, for a time, farewell. What form should this farewell take? What is the best way to keep the carnival?

If the writer could choose his own way of spending Shrove Tuesday evening, the entertainment of his choice would be a beautiful and elaborate rendering of Hayden's "Toy Symphony." The performers would appear in their appropriate costumes. The drummer would be the "Joli Tambour" returning from the war, from whom the King's daughter, looking from her window, asked a rose. By the gallant boy would be a trumpeter, a little girl in white and gold, holding her trumpet to red lips in a grave, sweet, dead-white face, with long, straight, gold hair. The woodpecker would be in feathers, like the actors in "Chanticleer." The cuckoo would be, not a bird, but a voice, haunting the Symphony as he will haunt the wood when spring comes in, and a plot of beechen green would hide the nightingale. From a ripening wheat-field would come the strident cry of the corn-crake, calling up the very heat and stillness and fragrance of the summer night. The rattle would be twirled by a green-clad dancing wood-nymph, in the very ecstasy of spring. And, amid the performers of the Symphony, Pan himself would appear and disappear, giving forth from his pipes a music of piercing sweetness, the alluring, bewitching music of the sunburnt earth.

THE BEE IN WINTER.

At about the end of October, flower and bee bid one another good-bye for a long, cold, and dreary while. It will always be another flower that keeps the appointment—sallow catkin instead of hawkweed, red dead-nettle instead of rag-wort, colt's-foot instead of ivy bloom. Usually, it is a different bee, but the most worthy members of the bee tribe are wont to keep the rendezvous that they themselves as individuals have made. The great humble bees, unskilled misers, simply go fast to sleep, and forget everything till balmy March calls them. Their workers are all dead, and in the spring they must be their own workers till they can rear the first citizens of their new colony. But higher, because more efficient than they, the queen bee rests in her hive surrounded by a band of the same bees that did "stake boot upon the summer's velvet buds," or, at any rate, on the blossoms of early autumn. With store-houses and winter store, food and the apparatus for distilling the first nectar of spring, with her retainers and artificers, she sits, not asleep, not without carousing in her hall, facing the winter instead of ignoring it, watching for the dawn instead of passively awaiting a resurrection.

It was past the middle of last September when, for companionship and remembrance of summer days, we took our bees into the house. In Cyprus they habitually keep bees under the same roof as the dwelling-house. It must be pleasant to hear their murmur in the wall and exchange with them the confidences of the family and the city. It is a poor thing to let them stay out in the field as some do, far from the house, and often completely forgotten for weeks together in the depth of winter. Ours would have passed this winter in a skep in a cottage garden, which is almost as good as living in the cottage itself—if they had not been put in the brimstone pit and sent to sleep for ever. There was not a bee moving on the 28th of September, the day when we called for the condemned bees. The next hive was sending out rare foragers, but this was as still as the grave. We thought there could be no bees in it, but when the hive was turned upside down, it proved to have a greater population than the other. We took but half of them and their young queen into our little hive of four half frames. We wished to see how small a lot would come through the winter, carefully treated.

In their new quarters, the bees that had thought to have finished their summer's work awoke into new activity. A change will always so energise the bees, and some beekeepers use the fact to get the utmost yield of honey from a hive. Ours, though living in the room, were given flight under the window-sash till the end of October. Till the end of September they worked every day, some of them that had evidently discovered a bed of balsam somewhere, coming home like dusty millers. At the same time, they were taking syrup through the top of the hive and storing it at the rate of nearly half a pint a day. The wise beekeeper finishes his feeding before the end of September. It has not only to be stored, but medicated, by the bees, and capped before it can be a safe stand-by for winter use. The production of wax, even for capping, must be a wearing process. The handful of bees in our little hive only twice got up the wax-producing temperature, which seems almost like that of boiling water, and when they had taken some four pounds of syrup they ceased to take more. Towards the end of October they gave no signs of life for three or four days at a stretch, and then, on a fine day, would come out and fly round in a cloud for exercise, while even so late as October 14th one or two of them came home with signs of having visited the balsam blossoms. So much had they been awakened by transfer from their cottage skep to a frame hive in London.

At the end of October they had another change of locality, and at the same time were closed in the hive and kept entirely in the house. They stood upon a dressing-table, and were thus under close observation at shaving time. It was high time for them to be asleep, or at any rate to stay entirely at home. For the most part, the only sign of life was the daily conveyance of a little chipped wax and other debris to the furthest limit of the porch. Sometimes the little scavenger of the day could be seen at its brief work. A week or two later there was sometimes the body of a dead sister to be brought out, and when these grew to an average of two a day the bee-master had anxious moments. Sometimes, so quiet and without sign was the community, he thought they must all be dead; but the next inspection would prove them alive and well.

The bee books tell us that a hive must have for its winter sustenance from twenty to twenty-five pounds of honey. It is further stated that a few bees consume as much as twice their number, the problem being to convert so much sugar into heat as will keep the temperature of the hive habitable. Ours, which at first had seemed a solid hive full, scarcely covered in October one full frame. The four pounds of syrup they stored before November was nearly gone by December 12th. They had been living on this as well as storing it for ten weeks, which gives them little more than half a pound a week, or only twelve or fourteen pounds for a six months' winter. In the cold weather the stores went even more slowly than that. When they had finished the syrup, we gave them candy, of which they consumed half a pound in thirteen days. Then we moved them out of doors, the double-walled nucleus hive standing within a full-sized hive, also double-walled. They had cold weather, then a week of extraordinary mildness, when they came out quite busily, then fierce frost. Their first half-pound of candy out of doors lasted them more than twenty-four days, or at the rate of no more than seven pounds for the winter. There was, we are informed, not more than six pounds of honey in the skep whence our bees were taken, the swarm being a late one, and last summer disastrous from the honey point of view. On the twenty-four pound basis, then, thousands of skeps must prove tenantless this spring, for the cottager seldom gives artificial food. Or have bees the unsuspected faculty of apportioning a short supply so as to make it go as far as a superabundance? The great strain upon the stores comes, of course, when the young brood is being fed; but we claim to have proved, by summer experiment, that less than a quarter of a pint of syrup a day and a pinch of peaflour will keep a comb of brood. It is likely that in a good year the honey bee is self-supporting from the time of full fallow blossom onward.

The bee's great peril in winter is a sudden chill on a tempting day. Our bees were so clamorous to come out that on November 2nd, November 30th, and December 23rd we took them from the dressing-room and opened the hive on a warm window-sill. They chose safe days, and only flew for the few necessary moments. But once, when it was very cold outside, a few of them escaped in the room, and we had to catch them one by one and put them back. When one flew against the window, it dropped as though shot, and lay motionless where it fell. So do they fall when, venturing out on the wrong day, a drop of cold rain falls on them in full flight. If you take them up and put them in some warm place, as under the quilt of the hive above the cluster, they will miraculously come to life again. We wished to be so careful of each unit that we frequently revived our "dead" bees. Even those that had been hauled out to the porch by the undertaker-scavenger would return to life and go back to the cluster. In most cases, however, they shortly died again, and that time beyond recall. But our winter bees had been so sweet in life that they were like the holy ones who see not corruption. Their bodies did not even stiffen; under the microscope they were always like newly killed insects. We had a sneaking belief that in the sunshine of spring they would revive and take up their work again like young bees.

Those who keep vigil in the hive are always awake. A few are more awake than the others, some to broach the honey cells and feed the others, which take the nourishment almost automatically, some to keep the hive clean, others to fan a little when the state of ventilation demands it. Some say that the queen is the most alive member of the community, and even that she keeps the others awake. We have not found it so. Her serenity seems at least equal to that of her semi-sisters. But in this respect, no doubt, there are personal differences. An old queen may have a St. Vitus-like fidgetiness, constantly peering into cells, as though about to begin laying. The healthy queen forgets all about such things till the first bit of outside pollen or the pea-flour substitute of the artful bee-master bids her once more be fruitful and multiply.

Short Studies.

THE CHOICE.

SOME years ago in Chelsea there used to stand at the crossing of a street leading to the Embankment an old man, whose living was derived from the cleanliness of boots. In the intervals of plying his broom, he could generally be seen seated on an upturned wooden box, talking to an old Irish terrier, who belonged to a house near by, and had taken a fancy to him. He was a Cornishman by birth, had been a plumber by trade, and was a cheerful, independent old fellow, with ruddy cheeks, grey hair and beard, and little, bright, rather watery, grey eyes. But he was a great sufferer from a variety of ailments. He had gout, and some trouble in his side, and feet that were like barometers in their susceptibility to weather. Of all these matters he would speak to us in a very impersonal and uncomplaining way, diagnosing himself, as it were, for the benefit of his listeners. He was, it seems, alone in the world, not having, of course, in those days, anything to look forward to in the way of a pension, nor, I fancy, very much to look back on, except the death of his near relatives and the decline of the plumbing trade. It had declined him for years; but, even before a long illness ousted him in favor of younger men, he had felt very severely the palpable difference in things. In old days plumbing had been a quiet, steady business, in which you were apparently "on your own, and knew where you were"; but latterly "you had just had to do what the builders told you, and, of course, they weren't going to make allowances. If you couldn't do the job as fast as a young man, out you went, and there you were." This long illness, and the death of his wife coming close together (and sweeping away the last of his savings), had determined him, therefore, to buy a broom and seek for other occupation. To sweep a crossing was not a profession that he himself would have chosen before all others; still, it was "better than the 'house, and you were your own master." The climate in those days not being the most suitable for a business which necessitated constant exposure to all elements but that of fire, his ailments were proportionally active; but the one remarkable feature of his perpetual illness was that he was always "better" than he had been. We could not at times help thinking that this continual crescendo of good health should have gradually raised him to a condition of paramount robustness, and it was with a certain disappointment, in the face of his assurances, that we watched him getting, on the contrary, slowly stiffer and feebler, and noted the sure increase of the egg-like deposits, which he would proudly have us remark, about his wrists and fingers.

He was so entirely fixed and certain that he was "going in the river" before he went "in the 'house," that one hesitated to suggest that the time was at hand when he should cease to expose himself all day and every day. He had evidently pondered long, and with a certain deep philosophy, on this particular subject, and fortified himself by hearsay.

"The 'house ain't for a man that respects himself," he would say. And, since that was his conviction, such as respected themselves could not very well beg him to act against it. At the same time, it became increasingly difficult to pass him without wondering how much longer it would be before he finally sought shelter in the element of water which was so apt to pour down on him day by day.

It is uncertain whether he discussed this matter of the river versus the 'house with the dog, to whom he was always talking, but that there was a certain fellow-feeling between them on the subject of exposure and advancing age is more than probable; for, as he would point out: The poor old feller's teeth were going, and the stiffness across his loins was always worse when it was wet. In fact, he was afraid that the old dog was gettin' old! And the dog would sit patiently for an hour at a time looking up at him, trying to find out, perhaps, from his friend's face, what a dog should do when the enemy weighed on him till he could no longer tolerate himself, not knowing, of course, that kindly humans would see to it that he did not suffer more than a dog could bear. On his face, however, with its grizzled muzzle and rheumy eyes thus turned up, there was never a sign of debate; it was full of confidence that, whatever decision his friend came to in this momentous question between the river and the 'house would be all right, perfectly satisfactory in every way to dogs and men.

One very rainy summer our old friend, in a burst of confidence, disclosed the wish of his heart. It was that he might be suffered to go down once more to Fowey, in Cornwall, where he had been born, but had not seen for fifty years. By some means or other the money was procured for this enterprise, and he was enabled to set off by excursion train for a fortnight's holiday. He was observed, the day before his start, talking at great length to the dog, and feeding it out of a paper bag with carraway-seed biscuits. A letter was received from him during his absence, observing certain strange laws of caligraphy, and beginning "Honnored Sir and Lady." It was full of an almost passionate description of a regatta, of a certain "Joe Petherick" who had remembered him, of the "lucky weather," and other sources of his great happiness, and ended "Yours truley obedient." On the fifteenth day he was back at his corner, seated on his box in the pouring rain, saying that he was "a different man, ten years younger, and ready to 'go' now any day"; nor could anything persuade him from the theory that Heaven had made a special intervention on his behalf. But only four days later, the sun being for once in the heavens, he was so long in answering a salutation that we feared he had been visited by some kind of stroke; his old face had lost color, it seemed stiff, and his eyes had almost disappeared.

Inquiry elicited from him the information that he was better than he had been, but that the dog was dead. They had put it away while he had been gone, and he was afraid that he should miss the "faithful old feller."

"He was very good to me," he said; "always came for a bit of bread or biscuit. And he was company to me; I never knew such a sensible creature." He seemed to think that the dog must have pined during his absence, and that this had accelerated his end by making his owners think he was more decrepit than he really was.

The death of the dog, and the cold, damp autumn that year, told heavily on the old man; but it was not till mid-November that he was noted one morning absent from his post. As he did not reappear, his lodging was sought out. It was in a humble street, but the house was neat and clean, and the landlady seemed a good, rough woman. She informed us that our old friend was laid up with "pleurisy and the gouty rheumatics"; that by rights, of course, he ought to be in the infirmary; but she didn't like to turn him out, though where she would get her rent from she didn't know, to say nothing of his food, because she couldn't let him starve while there he was cryin' out with the pain, and no one but herself to turn a hand to him, with his door open at the top of the house, where he could holler for her if he wanted. An awful independent old feller, too, or else she wouldn't hesitate, for that was where he ought to be, and no mistake, not having a soul in the world to close his eyes; and that's what it would come to, though she would never be surprised if he got up and went out to-morrow, he was that stubborn!

Leaving her to the avocations which we had interrupted by coming in, we went on up the stairs.

The door of the back room at the top was, as indeed she had led us to suppose, open, and through it the sound of our old friend's voice could be heard, travelling forth:—

"O Lord God, that took the dog from me, and gave me this here rheumatics, help me to keep a stiff and contrite heart. I am an old man, O Lord God, and I am not one to go into that place. So God give me a stiff heart, and I will remember you in my prayers, for that's about all I can do now, O God. I have been a good one in my time, O Lord, and cannot remember doing harm to any man for a long while now, and I have tried to keep upsides with it; so, good Lord, remember and do not forget me, now that I am down, a-lying here all day, and the rent goin' on. For ever and ever, O Lord. Amen."

We allowed a little time to pass before we went in, unwilling that he should think we had overheard that prayer. He was lying in a small dingy bed, with a medicine bottle and glass beside him on an old tin trunk. There was no fire.

He was—it seemed—better than he had been; the doctor's stuff was doing him good.

Certain arrangements were made for his benefit, and in less than three weeks he was back again at his corner.

In the spring of the following year we went abroad, and were absent several months. He was no longer at his post when at last we came back, and a policeman informed us that he had not been there for some weeks. We made a second pilgrimage to his lodgings. The house had changed hands. The new landlady was a thin, anxious-looking young woman, who spoke in a thin, anxious voice. Yes, the old man had been taken very ill—double pneumonia and heart disease, she thought. Anyway, she couldn't have the worry and responsibility of him, let alone her rent. She had had the doctor, and had him taken off. Yes, it had upset him a bit; he would never have gone if he'd had his choice; but, of course, she had her living to get. She had his bits of things locked up all right; he owed her a little rent. In her opinion, he'd never come out again. She was very sorry for him, too; he'd given no trouble till he was took ill.

Following up her information, we repaired with heavy hearts to the 'house which he had so often declared he would never enter. Having ascertained the number of his ward, we mounted the beautifully clean stairs. In the fifth of a row of beds our old friend was lying, apparently asleep. But, watching him carefully, we saw that his lips, deep sunk between his frosty moustache and beard, were continually moving.

"He's not asleep," said the nurse; "he'll lie like that all the time. He frets."

At the sound of his name he had opened his eyes, which, though paler and smaller and more rheumy, were still almost bright. He fixed them on us with a peculiar stare, as much as to say: "You've taken an advantage of me, finding me here." We could hardly bear that look, and hurriedly asked him how he was. He tried to raise himself, and answered huskily that he was better than he had been. We begged him not to exert himself, and told him how it was that we had been away, and so forth. He seemed to pay no attention, but suddenly said: "I'm in here; I don't mean to stay. I'll be goin' out in a day or two." We tried to confirm that theory, but the expression of his eyes took away one's power of comfort, and made one ashamed of looking at him. He beckoned us closer.

"If I'd a-had the use of my legs," he whispered, "they'd never have had me. I'd a gone in the river first. But I don't mean to stay—I'm goin' back home."

The nurse told us, however, that this was out of the question; he was still very ill.

Four days later we went again to see him. He was no longer there. He had gone home. They had buried him that morning.

JOHN GALSWORTHY.

The Drama.

FROM GRIM TO GAY.

MR. H. B. IRVING's performance of "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde" entirely conquered an at first somewhat recalcitrant spectator. The opening act seemed to me heavy and unpromising. Mr. Comyns Carr has not quite done himself justice in the dialogue, which is curiously stiff, conventional, and old-fashioned—the dialogue of an Adelphi play of 1850. I cannot but think that even now this would be worth amending. A few judicious touches would take the starch out of the conversation. As it is, the party of men in Dr. Jekyll's library never for a moment resemble any real dinner party in Harley Street or anywhere else. But this conventionality of tone and treatment was not the only thing that troubled me. After Mr. Irving's first transformation from Jekyll into Hyde, I felt that he had not overcome the inherent difficulty of the theme—namely, the difficulty of differentiating Hyde from Jekyll without making him such a fantastic monstrosity that no one could ever have accepted him as a normal human being. Jekyll's friends, in the first act, talk of Hyde with disapproval and suspicion, indeed, but not otherwise than they might talk of any other disagreeable and sinister personage; whereas, when Hyde is finally presented to us, we feel that such a horrible Caliban could never have been thought or spoken of except as a loathsome freak of nature—a thing to be bottled away in spirits of wine. This difficulty was apparent in the late Richard Mansfield's performance, which had the additional disadvantage of being just as incredible in the Jekyll as in the Hyde incarnation. Mr. Irving's Jekyll is, of course, as dignified and austere as heart can desire; but when he changes into Hyde one feels that any possible plausibility in the action is gone, and that Jekyll's friends would certainly take strong measures if he was thought to be making a crony and confidant of a monster from a caravan.

This objection is, and remains, real. It is probably not within the resources of art to effect instantaneously such a change in a human personality as to render it unrecognisable, without at the same time making it grotesque. Mr. Irving's Hyde, in other words, is not prosaically and literally credible. But when once we have got over and accepted this fact, the power and horror of the thing quickly take hold of us. As the second act went on, I recognised the remarkable ingenuity of Mr. Comyns Carr's manipulation of the theme; and in the scene of the murder of Sir Danvers Carew, the requisite shivers began to run down my spine. The end of this act is surely not well arranged. The parallel bodies stretched on the floor are a trifle comic; and Lady Carew might certainly attain a better effect by merely shrinking appalled from her husband's corpse than by doing the conventional swoon. It is in the third act, however, that Mr. Irving's triumph comes. The agony of Jekyll in the first scene is finely portrayed; and the second scene, in Hyde's lodging, is a passage of grisly intensity worthy of the actor's father at the very summit of his power. I do not hesitate to say that Sir Henry Irving, master of the uncanny as he certainly was, never did anything more truly and irresistibly terrible than this. Mr. H. B. Irving has hitherto shown great ability in reproducing some of his father's achievements; but here he "goes one better" with no model to work upon. And the fourth act keeps well up to the level of the third. The whole performance is a masterpiece of the gruesome. Why one should take pleasure in the sensation of centipedes running up and down one's back is a curious question in æsthetics which at this moment I do not propose to examine. But the fact is patent and familiar; and lovers of the creepy may be assured that nothing creepier than Mr. Irving's performance has been seen in our time. Its merit does not end here, however. There is something really tragic and profoundly moral in the struggle of Dr. Jekyll against the recurrent and irresistible invasions of the bestial nature which he has incautiously allowed to concentrate and organise itself within him. Mr. Irving may be congratulated on having done, not only a gruesome, but a fine and memorable thing. One word of warning, however—he must beware of letting hereditary mannerism creep upon him. It would be a thousand pities if, through the very popularity this performance is pretty sure to attain, the Hyde in his artistic composition should gradually gain the upper hand of the Jekyll.

There are few things more difficult than to hit the just tone in writing of such a play as "The O'Flynn" at His Majesty's. To take it seriously is impossible; to dismiss it with contempt would be inhuman. It is an adroit, innocent, agreeable entertainment, without the smallest intellectual pretensions, but not without a pleasant literary savor, if only in the reminiscences it awakens. In describing it as "an original play derived from many sources," Mr. J. H. McCarthy resorts to the plea known in law, I believe, as "confession and avoidance." He has produced one of those shimmering patchworks of romantic frippery in which, ever since the days of "The Ballad-Monger," Sir Herbert Tree loves to drape himself. Scott, Hugo, Dumas, Gautier, Rostand—these are some of the collaborators whom Mr. McCarthy has taken unto himself—and a very pleasant company they are. How does his hero make his first entrance? Why, down the chimney, like Don César in "Ruy Blas." When the heroine drops in promiscuous-like to lunch at Wolf's Crag—I mean Castle O'Flynn—has not the hero his Caleb Balderstone to hand, in the person of his seneschal, Conacher O'Rourke?

What shall he do with the two bailiffs who happen to be in possession? Evidently he must take a leaf out of Goldsmith's book, and introduce them as noblemen and his friends. A little later, a suggestion is borrowed from Sheridan, and the process-servers, in the character of lackeys, take their place behind the hero's chair. Then the O'Flynn, like Cyrano de Bergerac, must be a fluent improviser; he must perform extravagances of self-sacrifice to save his lady-love a moment's pain; he must fight a duel, not, indeed, while improvising a ballade, but while drinking a bowl of punch; and at the last mouthful he must pink his man—"à la fin de l'envoi je touche." So we skip merrily from reminiscence to reminiscence; but the chief collaborator, as I learn from the "Times"—the contributor of by far the largest patch—would seem to be Théophile Gautier in "Le Capitaine Fracasse." The groundwork of the plot we may take to be Mr. McCarthy's own, and it is sufficient, if not particularly brilliant. It provides a number of picturesque scenes, and gives us, to balance the harum-scarum hero, a frank, amiable, womanly heroine. One or two of the scenes are extremely well put on. The picture presented by the Isle of Cyprus tavern during the colloquy of the two villains is quite unusually good. What an advantage villains possess in being able to dispense with limelight! The scene in Dublin Castle, too, is gay and effective. Altogether, the eye is gratified and the imagination pleasantly amused.

One or two of my colleagues, I observe, think the part of O'Flynn unsuited to Sir Herbert Tree. I should say, on the contrary, that he had seldom found a part more congenial to his humor or accordant with his methods. He plays it with buoyancy and infectious enjoyment; and he will presently be able to give it that little acceleration of pace which alone it lacks. The whole performance is competent in its kind. Mr. Henry Ainley and Mr. William Haviland are excellent as a polished and a sinister villain respectively; Mr. W. G. Fay is quite delightful as the Irish Caleb Balderstone; Mr. Edward Sass makes a clever grotesque of a bibulous Dutch General, and Mr. Hubert Carter is good as a heavy tragedian. Miss Evelyn D'Alroy has never been seen to greater advantage than in the part of the heroine, and Miss Auriol Lee shows tact and skill as a pert soubrette.

Mr. Lewis Waller deserves the greatest credit for having produced "The Strong People," by Mr. C. M. S. McLellan. It is not quite the great play it sets out to be, but it is extremely interesting and able. In Mr. McLellan's nature, the thinker and the playwright do not quite run in harness. They are apt to get in each other's way. The playwright cannot express the thinker's meaning, and when the thinker takes the stage, the playwright has to stand aside and mark time. Thus we have in "The Strong People" a powerful labor play of an old-fashioned type, but showing considerable ingenuity of invention, placed in an atmosphere of ideas which, though not precisely irrelevant, are too vague and high-flown to seem much to the purpose. At the same time there is real merit in both aspects of the play, which may, perhaps, be best described as a symbolical melodrama. The situations are strong and interesting, and the dialogue abounds in suggestive phrases and points of view; for instance:—

"The common man loves two things—himself and a woman. As for the truth, he hates it.

"When the madness for dying comes, it's stronger than the madness for living.

"Wherever there's a strong man, saviour or scourger, I back him to carry the world forward."

The general idea of the play, as I decipher it, is a very true one: namely, that half the ills of life arise from our failure to reduce material and moral values to terms of happiness, which, in a just acceptance, is the only real standard. Viewed as an exposition of this thesis, even the dramatically feeble last act is not without its value. The play is remarkably well acted by Mr. Lewis Waller, Mr. Lvn Harding, Mr. Guy Standing, Mr. A. E. George, and Miss Dorothy Dix.

WILLIAM ARCHER.

Communications.

THE LABOR PARTY AND THREE-CORNER CONTESTS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The position of the Labor Party at the end of the elections deserves separate consideration because this newest of Parliamentary combinations being itself a combination of groups, its actual strength is most often miscalculated, and because the relations of Labor and Liberalism in the near future present one of the most difficult and urgent of the problems with which the progressive forces in the country are now faced. The numbers of Liberals and Tories in the new House of Commons will almost exactly balance. Outside these two main bodies, lie the Nationalists and the Labor Party, both independent in constitution and ultimate aims, both cordially supporting the Government for the present, but very different in that the Irish are concentrated upon a single object lying largely outside the sphere of British interests, while the Labor Party is almost exclusively British, and competes directly with Liberal candidates for the popular vote, both in the large towns and in the industrial counties.

Free Trade, the Budget, and the campaign against the Lords have postponed what might have been in many constituencies a disastrous competition; and have given a breathing-time in which the future may be calmly considered. It is pretty certain that this defensive and preliminary work of democracy will occupy several years to come. If the time be used wisely, something at least of future trouble may be avoided. But there are two postulates. Neither Liberalism nor Labor can sacrifice its independence; and, if there is to be any accommodation, there must be give-and-take on both sides. There will be six or seven Liberal M.P.'s to every Labor deputy; but the Labor vote in Parliament is necessary, and the permanence of the Labor Party—although it has had the worst of luck in securing fewer Members for a large increase of votes—may be taken for granted. In the last House, it numbered forty-five members (including two of the miners' group); it now numbers forty. The main body of the miners' representatives were to sit on the Labor benches after the General Election. In all, there were seventy-eight Labor candidates, including twenty-six of the miners' list. Of these forty have been successful and thirty-eight unsuccessful.

Both successes and failures are exceedingly strongly marked. The men returned, especially the old leaders of the party (and it is remarkable that there are only three or four new recruits), have majorities which actually average nearly 3,500 votes. The men who have failed are very often left far behind. This fact points clearly to the practical spirit of the industrial constituencies—to the great popularity of the Labor men where success is certain, and to the determination of the working-masses not to risk giving away seats to the worst of their enemies. It may be said—and the figures in the constituencies where one Liberal and one Labor man have been successful against two Tories prove it—that Labor has polled thousands of Liberal votes. On the other side, it may be said, with equal truth, that Liberalism is always polling Labor votes, and that, throughout the country in constituencies lacking Labor candidates, the Labor organisations have worked as effectively as any against the common enemy. It is at least possible, for instance, that the 2,000 branches of the Independent Labor Party have done as much to keep the North true to Free Trade and the rights of the House of Commons as all the other agencies concerned.

Yet the Labor Party has lost nearly a half of its candidates, though they were chosen, as it was believed, in a conservative spirit with a view to avoiding unnecessary loss on the popular side. If we examine their failures, we shall find that, of thirty-eight, only ten occurred in straight fights with Tories. This, in itself, would be a smaller proportion of loss than that suffered by the Liberals in straight fights. But now we face the essential fact of the situation. In seventy-eight contests there were twenty-eight failures in three-cornered fights, and in twenty-three of the twenty-eight cases, the Labor man was at the bottom of the poll. At first sight, to Liberal readers, this will appear to be a fact for Labor men alone to reckon with. In reality, it demands equal attention from both sides, firstly, because any aggravation of feeling between the two sections must react most injuriously upon the situation throughout the country, and, secondly, because, in these twenty-eight three-cornered disasters, the seat was handed over to the Tories in five cases (not including Portsmouth and Preston), although in all these constituencies the Liberal and Labor votes combined were in a majority over the Tory. That is to say, if, a month ago, the Labor candidate had withdrawn in half of these cases, and the Liberal in the other half, the anti-Lords majority, apart from the Irish, would be larger than it is by ten votes—a margin that may soon be by no means a negligible matter.

The question to be settled is whether, during what I have called the present defensive and preliminary stage of democracy, this sort of thing is to increase or to decrease. If it is to increase, then, indeed, the elements of popular government are in peril. But it can easily be decreased, without any prejudice to the independence of Labor, or the dignity of Liberalism, by an exercise on the part of the responsible organisations on either side of that common sense and give-and-take which, in fact, are already in operation among the rank and file.—Yours, &c.,

G. H. PERRIS.

February 1st, 1910.

Letters to the Editor.

THE COUNTY ELECTIONS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am surprised that one obvious reason for our losses in the agricultural constituencies seems never referred to. The party has practically kept county members in nearly continuous work at Westminster for ten months or more in 1906, 1908, and 1909, three years out of four.

It has been physically impossible for members to give the constant and specialised and localised attention to each town and village and almost each elector, which modern electioneering, unhappily perhaps, but most indubitably, demands. While we have been kept walking through the lobbies, our opponents have been attending three, four, perhaps six meetings a week, keeping a running or rather freely flowing demoralisation at smoking concerts and village dinners, and employing masquerading scoundrels by the hundred, with pockets full of money, to treat without disguise in the public houses, and to reel off falsehoods by the fathom about what they profess to have seen in Germany and other protectionist countries. These have been the agencies, and the tyrants who have told wretched laborers that for a shilling anyone can see at Somerset House how each man voted in any constituency.

Hirelings such as these, free beer, intimidation, and candidates whose sense of honor has grown so dim that they either knowingly or with carefully closed eyes let these infamies be carried on for their gain: that has been the course of the Tariff Reform campaign of the past four years, financed by Americanised syndicates of capitalist sharpers. Meanwhile, Liberal members have had to trudge lobbies, and leave organisation and political education to local workers, enthusiastic and loyal, but not candidates making a personal appeal, and to itinerant and no doubt devoted lecturers and speakers who did not treat or debase the electors.

These facts must be recognised in the new schemes being started for giving hope and confidence, and stimulating better organisation among the rural electorate. One vivid illustration of the truth of this contention can be found in the all but universal fate of those M.P.'s who have acted as private secretaries to Ministers. I may be wrong, but my impression is that every one of those members, with the exception of two, and one of them an East London member, have been beaten, and badly beaten, at the polls.

I am old fashioned enough to think that the "private secretary" business has been gravely overdone. Ministers never, in old times, relied to the extent they do at present on such incessant personal help. It is in itself absurd, and has obviously ruined the chances of these members, who could find no time for work in their constituencies, besides making the serious sacrifice of losing the free opportunity of winning their spurs independently in Parliament, by taking up and pushing subjects of their own, and so getting that personal distinction which means always hundreds of votes.

If the party position is to be kept up or improved, these points, as well as all the rest, must have their weight.—Yours, &c.,

FRANCIS A. CHANNING.

February 2nd, 1910.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I wish to emphasise the point made by your correspondent "Liberal" as regards the want of secrecy in the ballot. I can corroborate his statement that "though they cannot tell how any one individual has voted, they can tell how each (smaller) district has." I was perfectly astonished at this last election to see how easily this could be, and was, done.

Where the polling district is a small one, mostly the property of one landlord, and the landlord, as often happens, one of the counting agents, the latter can tell almost to a vote whether the pledges given have been kept or not; and, if not, it is not a difficult matter, in a small parish, to "spot" the most probable delinquents and then to bring pressure to bear.

I do not wonder, under these circumstances, which I understand are nothing new, that it is difficult to convince the rural voter that the ballot is really secret. I do not wonder that he says "they have ways and means of finding out." I do not wonder that he temporises and votes with the powers that be over him, instead of according to his beliefs and his conscience. I do not wonder that he is afraid to act otherwise, for he has probably already bought and paid for his experience.

The matter can be remedied, as suggested by "Liberal," either by opening the papers face down, and then mixing with other polling districts before discriminating, or by simply numbering, instead of naming, the boxes.

Until something of this kind is done, small hope of unbiased electoral returns from the rural districts. It is a most important matter. Will not some of our newly-elected M.P.'s take it up?—Yours, &c.,

J. R. TOMLINSON.

Ryefield, Knutsford,
February 3rd, 1910.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In an article in your issue of January 22nd, I note the line of demarcation between North and South is very strongly insisted upon.

This has been fully justified by results during the present election.

I have worked in a very Tory constituency, and am amazed at the ignorance among the working classes, especially those engaged in agriculture. This ignorance is deplorable, and especially so when, in many instances, men were only too eager to hear and accept the truth about our Liberal politics. I do not despair of the South, if only men are persuaded that they will be supported and upheld by Liberals, when hard pressed by Tory landlords. We must promise them this, and educate them. Begin at once. We have no time to lose. Then, and then only, shall we bring the South into line with the North. In the meantime we must never lose hope.—Yours, &c.,

MARY FLORENCE COVENTRY.

Sutton, Surrey, February 2nd, 1910.

TARIFF REFORM AND THE ELECTORS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It may interest your readers to know that, though the return of seven Tories out of the nine representatives might appear as if Liverpool was in favor of so-called Tariff Reform, such is by no means the case. At our Chamber of Commerce, largely composed of Conservatives, a resolution in favor of Free Trade was passed by a large majority. Most of our leading ship-owners are of the same opinion. Up to a few days before the election it appeared as if our party was going to succeed, and so serious did the position appear that a meeting of 1,400 publicans was called and addressed by Mr. F. E. Smith, who urged each of them to use his influence on 10 electors—and they knew how—and then they would carry all the seats for the Conservative cause. This influence was used to the full, and, in addition, Mr. Gladstone, the respected chairman of the Mersey Docks Harbor Board, and a gentleman of great influence, wrote a letter in which he avowed himself a Free Trader, but advising those who were Conservatives, and others, to vote for the Tariff Reformers! This decided many of those on the fence. Notwithstanding all these factors, in a total poll of something over 63,000, we polled some 30,000 votes, and I am convinced of this—that, if a poll could be taken on this issue alone, it would be found that Liverpool was with all the great industrial centres of Lancashire, Yorkshire, and the North of England in the maintenance of our Free Trade system.—Yours, &c.,

EDWARD EVANS.

Liverpool, February 1st, 1910.

THE LORDS AND FINANCE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The following quotation from an unimpeachable Conservative source is a useful instance of the way in which our unwritten Constitution has been taken for granted by other people than those whose business it is to record the exact legal letter of what can or cannot be done by the Houses of Parliament:—

"Money Bills always begin in the House of Commons, because the greatest part of the supplies are raised by the people; and for this reason the Commons will not allow the Lords to alter them."

It is from "The Curiosities of London and Westminster Described," one of Newbery's children's books, published in 1788, and forms part of a description of the House of Commons. Eighteenth century children certainly would have had nothing revolutionary offered to them by so respectable a firm of publishers, so that we must conclude that the quotation represents the normal opinion of the day.—Yours, &c.,

F. J. H. D.

January 24th, 1910.

THE CRISIS AND THE REFERENDUM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The General Election which has now taken place has shown clearly, what was, indeed, well recognised before, viz., that it is quite impossible to determine accurately the points upon which the votes have been recorded on such an occasion. Not only have the issues themselves been so varied, but the motives which have brought together all the political influences which have united their forces in the endeavor to defeat the Liberal Government have been equally numerous. Fortunately, they have failed, and a majority of 120 is an unmistakable approval on the part of the country of the general policy of the Liberal Government as indicated by their work during the past four years and their intentions for the future, as plainly set forth by the Prime Minister in his speech at the Albert Hall and his address.

Now the predominant issue put to the electors by Mr. Asquith is that of the veto of the House of Lords, which has been made use of in such a manner of late years, that it has become impossible for a Liberal Government to undertake the responsibilities of office without its being taken from them.

How is that to be done? Doubtless there are several ways, some of which depend upon the exercise of the prerogative of the King, such as the creation of new peers, the summoning of a limited number, and others which will not commend themselves to many thoughtful men of all parties if they can be avoided.

Is there any other, which is consistent with the principle upon which our government is based, viz., the decision of the electors themselves? There certainly is, and although it is a short and easy road and may be called an innovation, that is no reason why it should not be adopted.

All the members of the House of Commons accept the democratic principle that the will of the people must determine the policy of the country, and the only justification advanced for the rejection of the Budget by the responsible leaders of the Unionist Party in the House of Lords was that the judgment of the nation must be given upon what they described as a revolutionary proposal, before they could be expected to accept it. Here, then, is common ground.

Let a measure be passed which shall give to the Government of the day the discretionary power of appealing to the country, not by means of a General Election, but by a referendum of the particular measure, when the two Houses of Parliament are at issue upon it. This would be taken upon the total number of votes given for or against and not the constituencies alone. I know there are many arguments that can be brought both pro and con in reference to the referendum as an abstract theory, but we are a practical people, and to secure the important, more than important, necessary result, on lines which shall be in harmony with the democratic principles of the nation, and provide a sure and certain way of ascertaining the judgment of the people, appears to me worthy of adoption even if it be an innovation. —Yours, &c.,

W. H. SILK.

21, Salisbury Road, Moseley, Birmingham,
January 31st, 1910.

"THE DECENT CHURCH."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The article under this title in last week's NATION is very interesting. The writer finds a text for his subject in some recent ebullitions, notably in the Woolwich incident and in some country parson's proclamation. That the incumbents quoted are obscure does not matter. They serve (for the sake of argument) as representative of the Church. It is scarcely worth while to remind the writer that what distresses him in one or two humble clergy is the recognised and deliberate policy of ministers in the front line of Non-conformity. He need not examine the records of the Non-conformist rank and file, though a glance at the pages of "John Bull" would help him to understand what can be achieved even by common soldiers in the Liberal army. But he will certainly search in vain among the leaders of the Church of England for any partisan display in the way of speech or behavior which can compare with the demonstrations in which the leaders of the Free Churches excel. When he says, however, that "to celebrate Mr. Crooks's defeat was to triumph over the cause of the weak, to sound the loud timbrel over the destitute and oppressed," he must permit a reader to demur at his convenient assumption. It is so easy to introduce the righteous note and associate the opposite side with everything tyrannical, rapacious, and oppressive. But it is much easier to claim righteousness than to substantiate the claim.

It is fair to comment on the "decent quietness" of the Church, and show how this placid attitude is disturbed by such voices as those which the writer quotes, especially if the undignified utterances proclaim the wrong programme. It is fair also to criticise "religion without enthusiasm," though the records of the Church reveal what has been accomplished by quiet and patient work, carried through without fluster or fury. It is work that can be compared with the performances of many who shine in demonstration and revel in passionate declamation. But I venture to question the soundness of the writer's final jibe at the "Church of a Class," the "ignoble alliance" with wealth, and his amiable reproof, "it was to the poor that the Apostles were sent." Who live among the poor but the clergy of the Church of England? In the town parishes they are to be found, residing in the midst of the people. When various places of worship are abandoned, the Church remains in the slum districts. There are many just causes of complaint against "the decent Church," but it is still the Church that ministers to the poor.—Yours, &c.,

G. M. V. HICKEY.

St. Mark's Vicarage, Dukinfield, Cheshire,
February 1st, 1910.

[The Church in the towns does in a measure live with the people; but is that true, in anything like the same measure, of the Church in the country?—ED., NATION.]

ELECTORAL REFORM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—On February 16th, 1907, your predecessor, "The Speaker," published the successful essays in a competition—"The best suggestion for the Amendment of the Election Laws, with a view to Diminish Corrupt Practices and to cheapen the Cost of Election." As a prize-winner, I venture to send you again the summary of suggestions with which my essay concluded. I have been struck in reading the letters sent to you and to daily papers with regard to the conduct of last month's election, by the fact that a stringent Bill on the lines of these proposals—proposals almost echoed by the other prize-winner—would have gone far to remove the grounds of their complaints. Is it too much to hope for such a Bill in the new Parliament?

CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES.

A.—GENERAL.

1. A candidate shall be held responsible for the acts of any person (to include "woman") working in promotion of his candidature, and such person shall be held to be his agent, unless it can be proved that the work was undertaken without the knowledge or consent (a) of the candidate, (b) or of any of his authorised agents, (c) or any recognised association or club working in his interests.

2. Electoral offences shall be considered as offences against public order, and the magistrates shall be given power of summary jurisdiction in such cases.

B.—TREATING.

3. No political meetings shall be held on any licensed premises.

4. All licensed houses shall be closed on polling day.

C.—UNDUE INFLUENCE.

5. Under the definition of undue influence (Act of 1883, Sect. 2) shall be included the canvassing of tenants and workmen, by landlords, employers, or their agents. The addition might be in words to the following effect:—

"Whoever, directly or indirectly, by himself or any other person on his behalf, attempts to induce another person to vote or refrain from voting—such person being (a) in the occupation of any premises owned by the offender, or (b) employed by him for payment or the promise of payment."

6. The lending of any vehicle for the conveyance of voters to the poll shall be an illegal practice and shall void the election.

7. A polling station shall be provided in every elementary school district.

8. If any elector shall object to the continued presence of any person at or near the polling station during the hours of polling, the presiding officer shall require such person to leave the neighborhood of the polling station.

D.—EXPENDITURE.

9. The present authorised scale of expenditure shall be substantially reduced.

10. The expenses of the returning officer shall be defrayed out of public funds, subject to an audit by Government officials.

11. No expenditure on posters or placards shall be legal, except on (a) a reasonable number of copies of the election address, (b) notices of a reasonable number of public meetings, (c) notices by the returning officer connected with the conduct of the election.

12. Not more than two sets of election leaflets, &c., shall be sent from the committee rooms of any candidate to the electors during the course of the election, i.e., one set containing the election address, and one on the eve of the poll with instructions as to the place of voting.—Yours, &c.,
LIBERALIS.

February 2nd, 1910.

THE POPULARITY OF THE BUDGET.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In showing the effect of the Budget on the General Election votes in constituencies lost by Liberals at by-elections between 1906 and 1909—i.e., prior to the Budget's introduction—you omit the two seats won from Liberals by Labor and Socialist candidates. This would have been correct in dealing with a set-back to Tariff Reform, but in their bearing upon the popularity of the Budget these two seats—Jarrow and Colne Valley—do, in fact, afford evidence more strikingly conclusive than can be obtained from any other results.

Both Jarrow and Colne Valley—as well shown by Mr. R. L. Outhwaite in the "Daily News" of October 25th, 1909—were lost by defections through disappointment at the Budget of 1907. Both seats were regained, in three-cornered contests, after the introduction of the more advanced Budget of 1909.

Jarrow in 1910 raised the Liberal from third place with 3,474 votes to first place with 4,885—an increase of 1,411 votes.

Colne Valley raised the Liberal from second place with 3,495 votes to first place with 4,741—an increase of 1,246 votes.

I had occasion to familiarise myself with all the contests in which Labor candidates have been concerned, and I do not hesitate to say that to the Budget, and the Budget alone, do the Liberals owe the remarkable way in which they have held their own, and even recovered lost seats, as at Haggerston, Jarrow, Colne Valley, and Lanark, in the three-cornered contests.—Yours, &c.,

January 31st, 1910.

AN ONLOOKER.

ONE MAN, ONE VOTE.

To the Editor of THE NATION

SIR,—Will you kindly permit me to give your numerous readers a personal example of how the present system of plurality voting affects the representation of the electorate of the United Kingdom?

I am not, I regret to say, engaged in any of the great commercial industries contributing to the wealth and prosperity of my native land. My income, all told, does not amount to £400 a year, derived from a very diminished property rental, yet I have been enabled, under the present conditions of a three weeks' polling, to record three votes in three different constituencies in Ireland—one in virtue of my occupancy of my residence in this city, and two as a freeholder in two county constituencies situate one hundred miles apart.

Had the polls for those constituencies been all taken on one day, I would have been deprived of the opportunity of recording my vote in one at least of the three. I would contrast with that state of affairs the position of a neighbor, who is a large employer of skilled labor, disbursing in wages £5,000 a year, and who is only entitled to exercise the franchise to the extent of one vote in respect of the house in which he resides.

Under such circumstances, is not the present system of Parliamentary representation indefensible?—Yours, &c.,

JUSTITIA.

Dublin, January 31st, 1910.

A FREE TRADE FIGHTING FUND.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR.—Free Trade is again victorious. Specious promises of higher wages and cheaper living, even when personally guaranteed by the leaders of Tariff Reform, have failed to delude the workers of most of our great towns. By overwhelming majorities they have shown their contempt for Tariff Reform. Scotland, Wales, and the North of England have declared almost unanimously against Protection.

In this great victory the Free Trade Union can claim no small share. During the years 1908 and 1909, the Free Trade Union has carried on an incessant propaganda which culminated at the General Election in one of the most strenuous campaigns ever conducted since the days of Cobden. It has issued a monthly paper, "The Free Trader," and a very large number of publications, which are essential to every Free Trader who wishes to be armed against the fallacies of Tariff Reform. During the year 1908, the Union held 2,943 meetings and distributed 4,145,195 leaflets and pamphlets. In 1909 these numbers were increased to over 5,000 meetings, and no less than 16,255,000 leaflets and pamphlets were circulated.

The Union has lately employed fifty permanent agents in different parts of the country. These agents have carried out systematic and specialised campaigns. They have trained local speakers and workers, and in the recent contest over a thousand speakers were engaged on behalf of the Union. As soon as the General Election was announced, the Union increased the number of its local offices to 60, and from these offices conducted no less than 5,000 meetings and distributed over 20 million leaflets and pamphlets, and 250,000 posters.

Successful as our work has been, the officers and Committee of the Free Trade Union realise the fact that the fight for the maintenance of our Free Trade system is not nearly over yet. We recognise that although Free Trade has more than held its own over the greater part of the field of battle, it can only retain its present ascendancy in the industrial centres by constant vigilance and ceaseless activity on the part of Free Trade workers. Free Traders are fully alive to the fact that periods of trade depression may render the very strongholds of our cause vulnerable to the attacks of the Tariff Reformers, who, having no definite cause to defend, adapt their policy to the particular interests in each locality.

But we have not only to defend what we already hold. If Free Trade is to gain a final victory over Tariff Reform, the ground which has been lost during the recent contest must be won back.

All Free Traders must view with great concern the apparent defection of the rural voter from the Free Trade cause.

For years past the agricultural laborer has been one of the most trusty supporters of Free Trade. The memory that Protection meant low wages and dear food has kept the laborer true to the principles of untaxed food.

Tariff Reformers have attacked existing revenue taxes levied on one or two articles of food and drink as an evil which they would remove. They have advocated protective taxes which they declare would be paid by the foreigner and would not increase the cost of living. We must expose the fallacy that commodities can become cheaper because they are taxed. We must do so in such a way as to make the truth obvious to the simplest mind. To accomplish this, occasional meetings are not enough. We must have a staff of Free Trade canvassers in every county, men and women who know their case, and who know the people, and who, in the cottages, in the fields, and in the lanes, can explain the great economic truths of Free Trade to the laborer and his wife, so that they will understand for all time. To do this work, the Free Trade Union must extend its forces in every direction.

We want to secure the best possible workers, and to commence the re-capture of the villages without a moment's delay.

This result can and will be secured, if Free Traders throughout the country are determined that it shall be. The present moment is the most vital period in the whole modern fiscal controversy.

Tariff Reform has twice suffered reverse at the polls. The great object which the Free Trade Union has in view is to secure a third victory for Free Trade, which, by including both town and country alike, shall be decisive. If the Union can secure a large annual augmentation of its funds, this crowning blessing for our people can be assured. To win Free Trade, Cobden raised £200,000. If we are to retain the untold boon which was then won for the British people, all Free Traders must be prepared to support the cause in a similarly generous manner. We earnestly appeal to Free Traders of all classes to assist us to the utmost within their power, even to the point of sacrifice, so that we may secure a fighting fund to enable us once and for ever to crush the conspiracy which seeks to gamble with the food of the people.

Full particulars of our plan of campaign will be forwarded to all subscribers who desire to become more fully acquainted with our work.

Contributions, both large and small, will be thankfully received, on behalf of the Free Trade Union, by either of the undersigned.—Yours, &c.,

BEAUCHAMP,

ALFRED MOND,

Hon. Treasurers.

Free Trade Union,

8, Victoria Street, Westminster, S.W.

February 2nd, 1910.

Poetry.

OLD SUSAN.

WHEN Susan's work was done she'd sit,
With one fat guttering candle lit,
And window opened wide to win
The sweet night air to enter in;
There, with her thumb to keep her place,
She'd read, with old and wrinkled face,
Her mild eyes gliding very slow
Across the letters to and fro;
While wagged the guttering candle flame
In the wind that through the window came.
And sometimes in the silence, she
Would mumble a sentence audibly,
Or shake her head, as if to say,
"You silly souls, to act this way!"
And never a sound from night I'd hear,
Unless some far-off cock crowed clear;
Or her old shuffling thumb should turn
Another page; and rapt and stern,
Through her great glasses bent on me
She'd glance into reality;
And shake her round old silvery head,
With—"You—I thought you was in bed!"
Only to tilt her book again,
And rooted in Romance remain.

WALTER DE LA MARE.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE following is our weekly selection of books which we commend to the notice of our readers:—

"Gambetta: Life and Letters." By P. B. Gheusi. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

"The Working Faith of the Social Reformer and Other Essays." By Henry Jones, LL.D., D. Litt. (Macmillan. 7s. 6d. net.)

"The Metamorphoses, or Golden Ass of Apuleius of Madaura." Translated by H. E. Butler. (Clarendon Press. 2 vols. 3s. 6d. net each.)

"The Bridling of Pegasus: Prose Papers on Poetry." (Macmillan. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Louis XVIII." By Mary F. Sandars. (Hutchinson. 16s. net.)

"Aspects of Christ." By the Rev. W. B. Selbie. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)

"Bound Together." By Mary E. Mann. (Mills & Boon. 6s.)

"Agrippa d'Aubigné." Par S. Rocheblave. Les Grands Ecrivains Français. (Paris: Hachette. 2fr.)

"La Duchesse de Duras et Chateaubriand." Par G. Pailhès. (Paris: Perrin. 7fr. 50.)

"En Angleterre." Par Raymond Recouly. (Paris: Fasquelle. 3fr. 50.)

"Paul le Normande." Roman. Par Jules Sageret. (Paris: Calmann-Lévy. 3fr. 50.)

* * *

THE Clarendon Press will shortly issue "Henry Fox, First Lord Holland: A Study of the Career of an Eighteenth Century Politician," by Mr. T. W. Riker, of Cornell University. The first Lord Holland has been painted in dark colors by historians. Macaulay calls him a needy political adventurer, and Lecky, after describing him as a man "of real ability and of indomitable courage," speaks in the strongest terms of the system of corruption which he fostered and by which he profited. Abraham Hayward claims for him "the very qualities most needed by a trading politician in corrupt, unsettled times," and adds, "it may safely be predicted that no arrangement or combination of his making was ever with his consent prevented or impeded by a principle." Holland had a dry wit which he used to advantage on occasion. He reproached Lord Bute for putting him off with a barony as a reward for his services, instead of the earldom for which he had stipulated. Lord Bute replied that it was only a pious fraud. "I perceive the fraud, my lord, but not the piety," was the answer. Again, when on his death-bed, he said to his servant, "If Mr. Selwyn calls again, let him in. If I am alive I shall be very glad to see him, if I am dead he will be very glad to see me." George Selwyn's "mortuary tastes" formed a frequent subject of banter among his friends.

* * *

THE biography of Lord Kelvin by Professor Silvanus Thompson, which Messrs. Macmillan are to issue this month, will present the great scientist under several aspects unfamiliar to the general reader. Very few people know, for instance, that Kelvin had a share in designing the "Dreadnought" type of battleship, or that he regarded the swift cruiser as more effective. The patent compass, which Kelvin invented, was offered to the Admiralty without any suggestion of payment, but received with such apathy that he decided to patent it and bring it to the notice of the mercantile marine. The book was, we are told, begun during Kelvin's lifetime and with his assistance, and among other matters recorded are Kelvin's part in the early history of the Atlantic cable, his university career, both as undergraduate and as professor, and his views upon several topics of current controversy.

* * *

THE same publishers have now almost ready Lord Acton's "Lectures on the French Revolution," held over from last season. The volume contains twenty-two lectures dealing with all the chief points of interest in the Revolution. It opens with a discussion of the writers whose work is generally regarded as heralding the catastrophe, and of the influence of America upon French political thought, and ends with a lecture entitled "After the Terror."

* * *

IN the "American Men of Letters" series there is to be issued a "Life of Bret Harte," which will probably be issued in this country by Messrs. Constable. The book is the work of Mr. H. C. Merwin, who has been engaged upon it for several years and has had access to unpublished manuscripts and other authoritative sources.

A BIOGRAPHY of Lord Morley, by Miss E. Major, is announced by Messrs. Nisbet. It deals with Lord Morley both as man of letters and as statesman, special attention being given to his Indian administration.

* * *

"THREE MODERN SEERS" is the title of a study by Mrs. Havelock Ellis of the philosophical teaching of Nietzsche, Edward Carpenter, and James Hinton. Hinton was a London surgeon of distinction, whose writings, though often striking and suggestive, have received little attention outside a small circle of admirers. The book will be published by Mr. Stanley Paul.

* * *

THE second of the three volumes of Sir Herbert Maxwell's "A Century of Empire" is to be published during the present season by Mr. Arnold. It begins with the year of the Reform Act, and it will be of special interest at the present juncture to see how the steps necessary to secure that great measure appear to a frankly Tory historian.

* * *

THE age of Henry of Navarre has been chosen for a volume of biographical sketches by the writer who calls himself "Le Petit Homme Rouge." It is one of the most stirring and attractive periods in French history, abounding in dramatic incidents and strong personalities, so that the author, who has issued several volumes dealing with the French Court, has a rich store of material at his disposal. Messrs. Chatto & Windus are to be the publishers.

* * *

AN interesting by-path of history has been explored by Mr. C. K. Bolton in a work called "Scottish Irish Pioneers in Ulster and America," which is to appear during the present season. Mr. Bolton has aimed at giving a systematic history of the emigrations from Ireland to the British colonies in America, before the time of the Revolution. His record is largely based on unpublished material, and is said to contain several new facts of interest, especially in relation to the Southern colonies.

* * *

By the sudden death of M. Edouard Rod on Saturday last the world of French letters is deprived of a serious and influential writer, if not a great novelist. M. Rod was a Swiss, and occupied for some time the position of Professor of Comparative Literature at Geneva. He left the University for Paris while still a young man, and threw himself enthusiastically into the campaign for realism in literature, which Zola, Maupassant, Huysmans, and the Goncourts were conducting. He modified his attitude in later years, becoming a "moralist" in the French meaning of the term, and using fiction chiefly as a means for expressing his social theories. He never attained the lightness and grace of style possessed by his French colleagues, but his books were widely read by thoughtful people. His most popular novels were "La Vie Privée de Michel Teissier," "La Seconde Vie de Michel Teissier," and "L'Inutile Effort," all of them romans à thèse. He also produced a critical work of value, "Idées Morales du Temps Présent."

* * *

THE first number of a new monthly magazine called "The Tramp" will appear in March. "The Tramp" will contain articles on little-known places in England and abroad, descriptions of walking tours, and articles on all subjects connected with travel. Short stories and sketches of an unconventional character will also be included, and a special feature will be made of modern verse. The editor, Mr. Douglas Goldring, has secured a strong list of contributors, and the venture is altogether a promising protest against literary and other conventionalities.

* * *

A SERIES, called "Masterpieces of the English Drama," has been arranged for under the general editorship of Mr. Alexander Jessup, who is also editor of Lippincott's "French Men of Letters" series. Each volume in the new series will contain four complete plays by a single dramatist, and will be edited by a different scholar. Amongst those in active preparation are "George Chapman," by Mr. Havelock Ellis; "William Congreve," by Mr. William Archer; "Christopher Marlowe," by Professor W. L. Phelps; "Ben Jonson," by Mr. Ernest Rhys; and "Beaumont and Fletcher," by Professor Felix Schelling.

Reviews.

OXFORD REFORM.*

It is difficult not to yield to impulse, and proclaim that Mr. Snow's book on the Reform of the University of Oxford is incomparably the best and wisest thing that has been written on this generally dispiriting subject. It is probably the sheer beauty of the book that is so persuasive, and beauty may be a dangerous guide. But, however that may be, Mr. Snow has converted the present reviewer—converted him, first, to a belief that Greek should be compulsory for the literary M.A. courses; and, secondly, to a belief in the mission of Oxford. If our present Oxford can really rise, shaking off the elements of mediocrity, snobbishness, and lack of faith which now stifle her, to be something like what Mr. Snow describes, she will, indeed, be a University for which men will be proud to live and die.

The great difference between this treatise and the various reforming articles which have appeared hitherto, the articles in the "Morning Post," those in the "Westminster Gazette," and the grandis epistola of Lord Curzon, lies not so much in the conclusions as in the spirit. True, the conclusions are different, too, but the spirit is more so. Roughly speaking—though the phrase does injustice to particular writers—the measures of the average "Morning Post" reformer, if carried out, would land us in a respectable and honest establishment for the rich, teaching a great many popular subjects, and attracting an increasing number of students by means of a shorter and less thorough course and a lower and wider entrance examination. The classical course would be lightened by throwing overboard the most difficult parts of it, which happen to be the most valuable; and, in Lord Curzon's scheme at least, business men would be attracted by a course in Commerce. We should get a University which, in spite of its many drawbacks in tradition, buildings, and situation, might in time be intellectually as good as Birmingham, though it could not hope to equal Harvard. A phrase constantly on the lips of this type of reformer is the argument that, if we fail to do so-and-so, the provincial universities will draw away our customers.

Now, what is the fallacy in all this? The fallacy is to suppose that the Universities are like rival shops, and that each University must contrive to sell all the wares that another does. The truth is that all the Universities between them are but imperfectly supplying the intellectual needs of the nation, and that in so doing they must co-operate. Glasgow has a great shipbuilding school, with an enormous tank for experiments. Is Oxford to make, with its utterly inferior resources, a little inland tank, in order that youths who wish to study shipbuilding may do so in the best public school society? Are we to start a school of brewing, because Birmingham has done so? No one urges either of these things; yet we have just established an Engineering School, with an excellent professor, but no plant at all, while Birmingham, barely an hour off by train, has the finest engineering plant in the world. And this at a time when an institution like the Bodleian, the pride of Oxford and a thing unique in the world, is crippled with poverty!

Why is it that anyone makes such a mistake? It is, we believe, partly that Oxford men are a little apt to forget the existence—and, we may add, the excellence—of the many new universities, and so to imagine that Oxford and Cambridge are the only real universities in the land. Partly, it is a widespread, unconscious snobbishness, which regards a university education primarily, not as an education at all, but as a class-stamp. The parent wishes to be able to say that he has a son at Balliol. Good, but, unfortunately, the son happens to be unfit for the higher studies pursued at Balliol. The boy is rich: let Balliol lower its standard a bit, or admit book-keeping by double entry instead of Greek or philosophy.

The answer to this is, first, to remember that the other universities exist and flourish, and deserve to flourish; and, secondly, that no university ought to lower its standard or risk spoiling its course in order to please persons who are not suited for it, and can get what they are suited for elsewhere.

If the commercial man or the science man was in any difficulty about his higher training in those subjects, the case would be different. Provision for the highest scientific education is, of course, an absolute necessity. But he is not. Scientific and commercial foundations are plenteous as blackberries, and their endowments are increasing every day. There are sixteen universities in the United Kingdom; there are probably some fifty or sixty universities accessible to English-speaking students. Some excel in one department, some in another. Two of the number excel in the department of Literature, History, and Philosophy, based upon the study of antiquity. Is it a hardship on anyone if they insist on an entrance examination adapted to their particular form of education? There are fourteen other universities in the Kingdom for the non-classical boy to choose from.

There is no hardship. There is only a question whether the sort of education which Oxford and Cambridge give, and which can be had at no other university in the English-speaking world, is worth keeping, and worth improving. It is here that Mr. Snow's book comes in. "This literary spirit is, among its other qualities, historical. It is not content with knowing things unless it knows their origins, and on the spiritual and intellectual side half our origins are Greek. In religion, philosophy, political thinking, fine art, the formal and conscious side of literature, the mathematical side of science, we are building on Greek foundations. The rank and file of intelligent people, the world of interested but unlearned readers, has to take these origins on trust, but a University is not a place for the rank and file. It is a place for leaders, for the people whose business it is to know these origins, if the common thinking of the unlearned is not to degenerate into a repetition of second-hand commonplaces."

The University is a place for leaders, but it is not a preserve for any class or any standard of income.

"The studies that are rising now are those that 'have money in them.' The time when plutocrats are attacking Greek is the time for Socialists to take it up."

"For, indeed, so long as there continue to be rich and poor, literary studies ought to be the studies of the poor. They are the best way, as I believe, and certainly the cheapest and most portable way, of satisfying the mental and spiritual wants of life. People must satisfy those wants somehow, just as they must satisfy their bodily wants—panem et circenses. It depends on their education whether they are to get their circenses out of gambling and fighting and drinking, or, at best, out of sport and mere frivolity, or out of religion and knowledge and art and politics and poetry and humor and love—in short, out of the components of literature. As Bishop Fraser's friend told him, 'Drink is the shortest way out of Ancoats.' Give Ancoats a chance and Ancoats will find that Homer is a better way."

We say nothing here of practical methods. They are carefully stated in the book. But, in general, the classical course for entrance is to be lightened by omitting all composition—including Latin prose—and all grammar except what is necessary for translation. To read and understand, in some degree, the great literature is the first thing; to analyse the language or to write it yourself is a thing that may come afterwards.

"As things are now, if you ask an ordinary business man, who has been to a grammar school and left it early, whether he ever learned any Greek, he will say, I once learned ὁ ἦ τό. If elementary Greek is to mean that and no more, certainly it will be of no use in itself, and there will be something invidious in retaining it as a protection to the further Greek of more fortunate boys. But suppose we can make the same man's successors say, 'I once read about Hector and Andromache,' or 'I once read the Beatitudes'?"

"Mater ubique tuus, liceat modo nunc quoque, miles": so runs the motto inscribed on this book. And whether his Alma Mater listens or no, the author has indeed shown himself her soldier.

THE REIGN OF LOUIS THE FIFTEENTH.*

It would be difficult to name a period in which the failure of government has created so wild a world of blunder, anarchy, and disease as the last period of the French

* "How to Save Greek, and Other Paradoxes of Oxford Reform." By T. C. Snow, M.A., late Fellow of St. John's College. Simpkin Marshall & Co. 2s.

* "Histoire de France: Tome Huitième. Le Règne de Louis XV." Par H. Carré, Professeur à l'Université de Poitiers. Hachette. 6 fr.

Monarchy. The death of Louis XV. leaves one brief moment for recovery, but the sands have almost run out when that disfigured corpse passes to the royal peace of St. Denis amid the jeers of jesting Paris. From his death-bed Louis the Fourteenth had warned his successors to remember the miseries of their people, and his words found their echo in the dying prayer of his great-grandson. But a death-bed repentance seldom amounts to restitution, and the French Monarchy learnt nothing from the remorse of dying kings. The truth is that the Monarchy was designed by Richelieu and Mazarin for other men than the last Bourbons. Louis the Fourteenth rescinded in one moment of pious zeal the religious settlement that had given its prosperity to France, and his hurricanes of pride and temper made shipwreck of her finance and her resources. Louis the Fifteenth had about as much self-control as one of the later Roman Emperors. If your Government is not a Government of laws, but of men, it matters enormously what sort of men are in power. Richelieu, in giving its final form to the French Monarchy, had taken it out of the reach of faction and civil war, but had put that omnipotent and absolutist throne at the mercy of the passions of individuals. Those passions destroyed it.

One attempt was made, indeed, to change that final form, and the beginning of the period covered by this volume is interesting for the Regent's experiment with the ideas of Fénelon. If the Duke of Burgundy had not been carried off by small-pox, he would certainly have made a serious effort to restore the power of the nobles, and to break down the centralised system of Versailles. It may be doubted whether the attempt would have succeeded if it had been made under the most auspicious conditions. Orleans was less of an enthusiast than Burgundy, and in his hands the experiment was a failure. It happened that France tried this plan at the very moment that Spain had abandoned it. Alberoni had just put the finishing touch to the process that introduced the French absolutist methods into Spanish administration. The Spanish Ambassador remarked at the time of the September declaration, announcing the departure from the old order in France: "Les Français ont habillé leur gouvernement à l'espagnole; mais la golielle leur ira aussi mal que la cravate nous allait mal à nous-mêmes au début." But the beginning of the Regency was marked by a reaction against the Versailles system, and men's thoughts turned to this aristocratic scheme as the only alternative. Seven Councils were created under the General Council of Regency, on which there sat the presidents of other Councils. The other Councils were those of Home Affairs, Conscience, War, Marine, Finance, Foreign Affairs, and Commerce. Saint Simon had wished to confine membership to the greater nobles, but Orleans took in some of his dissolute friends, and he was shrewd enough to know that government could not be carried on without the help of the trained bureaucrats. Thus the old and the new systems met in these institutions. Antagonism was inevitable. The Councils were not in all respects ineffective, for during these years there was a great development of roads and bridges. But the history of the Councils justified Louis XIV.'s scepticism; for, as the business was troublesome and tedious, the nobles soon lost their interest in them, and left them to their fate. Meanwhile, Orleans himself began to revert to the traditional methods. He began to withdraw important affairs from the Council of the Regency, and to receive the Presidents of the other Councils in private, thus reducing them to the status of the old secretaries. Dubois wrote to Orleans in August, 1718, urging him to suppress the Councils. He said that when the King became his own master they would certainly disappear, and that Orleans would have all the discredit of the destruction of the system he had introduced, and that he ought to lose no time in getting rid of the "grands seigneurs," and replacing them by simple Secretaries of State, who, as they had neither reputation nor family, would be simply his creatures. One by one the Councils flickered out, and the Council of the Regency itself disappeared in 1723. M. Carré (whose volume maintains the high standard of the series) summarises the causes of the failure of the experiment thus: the incapacity of many who took part in the Councils; conflicts between the nobles and the bureaucrats; the indifference of the public after the first excitement was over; the want of enthusiasm of the Regent; the opposition of many who had a personal interest in the restoration of the old system; and the inadequacy of a reform which did not concede either a representative régime or a serious control of government.

With the failure of this scheme, everything turned on the character of Louis XV. But, as M. Carré observes, the restoration of the old prestige of the Monarchy would only have been possible if he had been a perfect monarch. In such a situation it was a cruel irony that gave Louis XV. as King to France. Not that Louis was stupid, though his nervousness made him seem stupid. He was so self-conscious and timid that when he found in Madame Amelot someone still more timid than himself, that fact alone made him enjoy her society. His dread of new faces made him cling to his old Ministers. M. Carré thinks that he had ability enough if only he had made up his mind to govern. Twice he formed such a resolution: once after the disgrace of Bourbon in 1726, and again after the death of Fleury; but his idleness and his love of pleasure overcame him. He took, indeed, a strange and morbid interest in politics, for he had a secret police and a secret diplomatic intelligence service of his own. But, as M. Carré says, he made no use of his information, and he did not attempt to prevent mistakes that he foresaw. He was paralysed by nervousness, indolence, and his passion for amusement. His whole time was given up to hunting, and this, the main business of his life, he arranged with the utmost care and mastery of detail. When he did not go hunting, it was announced that "the King does nothing to-day." His sensual life seems to have begun from finding his wife dull. His first intrigue was regarded with composure even by the more virtuous of his contemporaries, who were not a little taken aback as one sister succeeded another in those rapid developments which were celebrated in a lampoon:—

"L'une est presque en oubli, l'autre presque en poussière;
La troisième est en pied; la quatrième attend
Pour faire place à la dernière.
Choisir une famille entière
Est-ce d'être infidèle ou constant?"

There seems to have been from the first a morbid strain in Louis XV.'s character. As a boy he had cruel habits, enjoying torturing birds. As a man, he took a strange interest in corpses, funerals, diseases. He was superstitious, and never lost his fear of Hell, and was punctual and regular in all religious devotions. "He follows the processions, kneels in the street when the viaticum is carried, but neither his piety nor his dread of Hell preserved him from a single vice." He had scarcely any intellectual education. Before he had grown up he was "déjà ennuyé, blasé, indolent." He had plenty of physical courage. Madame de Châteauroux persuaded him to throw aside his idleness and go to the front in Flanders in 1744. At Metz he fell ill, and was believed to be dying. All France wept and prayed for him. Unfortunately for himself, and unfortunately for France, he recovered, to die thirty years later hated and despised by the world.

"Provida Pompeio dederat Campania febris
Optandas: sed multae urbes et publica vota Vicerunt."

While the King was sinking into a condition of sensual lethargy France herself was full of energy and movement. The ideas of the Philosophers and the Economists spread fast in an aristocracy that was allowed no duties. In the decadence of the Monarchy there flourished the emancipating minds of Montesquieu, Voltaire, Diderot, Quesnai, and the passionate genius of the apostle of the Revolution. The King, almost alone, never gave a thought to improvement or to the regeneration of the community of which he was the costly ornament. De Tocqueville has some droll remarks on the way in which the intendants, catching the atmosphere of social sensibility, spoke and wrote of the trampled peasants. M. Carré thinks that, on the whole, the lot of the cultivators of the soil was better at the end of the reign than at the beginning, thanks to the influence of the Agricultural Societies, the Economists, and public opinion working on the local administration. But the burdens on the poverty of the nation, and the thousand and one obstacles to its enterprise and its freedom, became steadily more intolerable, and Louis XV., dying as he had lived, with a cynical selfishness in his heart, summed up alike the conscience of the consequences of his reign in the cry, "Après moi le déluge."

A SEVENTEENTH CENTURY QUIETIST.*

To most English readers the very name of Antoinette Bourignon is unknown. In Scotland it is indirectly familiar to theological students, because in 1711 the General Assembly classed her with Arius Socinus, Arminius, and the Pope, requiring candidates for the ministry to renounce her errors. This test of orthodoxy was maintained till 1889; but long before this she had been forgotten; and Professor Macewen's suggestive study of her life (1616-1680) and writings reopens a closed page of history, the problems of which present not a few points of contact with those of our own day. The record, indeed, is one of singular interest and significance:—

"In the latter half of the seventeenth century the life of the Reformed and the Roman Churches was at a low ebb. Dogmatism, superstition, and secularism were in possession, and it is instructive to see how a serious and vigorous mind came to abandon all definitely Christian dogma and to indulge in extravagances. Light is thrown upon the position and attitude of the celebrated quietists who were her contemporaries, and also upon the prevalence of revivalism, mysticism, and rationalism in eighteenth-century religion."

The line between saint and heretic is narrow. A slight, a very slight, change in the circumstances, and Antoinette Bourignon might have been a Catherine of Genoa. The docile temper of post-Tridentine sanctity, indeed, was not here; but her protests against externalism in religion, her denunciations of the clergy and the clericalism of her time may be paralleled in writers of acknowledged orthodoxy; a turn of the wheel, "the little more" or "the little less" of the poet, and the charmed circle might well have embraced her. As it was—though she seems never formally to have left the Roman Church—in 1700 the Vicar Apostolic in Scotland exhorted his flock against "the errors of the Borigionites" (sic), the Nuncio at Paris warned Propaganda of their prevalence, and Professor Macewen tells us of an all but successful attempt to assassinate her, in which the Roman authorities joined. Her character, like her teaching, was strangely mixed. She possessed not a few of the distinctive virtues of Catholic sanctity; she also possessed certain notorious and exceptionally disagreeable faults. And the reflection suggests itself that the life of a saint written with Professor Macewen's detachment and candor would be a document of singular interest. The hagiographer levels down in the interests of edification; the result is a lay figure—the wires are pulled, and the puppet dances; but it is machinery, not life. She was pathologically a sensitive and a neurasthenic; on one occasion she remained in a trance for eight days. At an early age she developed tendencies to megalomania and asceticism. The religious life attracted her; but no convent would receive her without a dowry, and her father, who had a low opinion of these institutions, refused his consent. Her Jesuit director, sensibly enough, advised her to marry, upon which she dispensed with his future services, having recourse for confession to her parish priest. It throws a light upon the relations between the regular and the secular clergy, relations which are little if at all changed in our own time, to read that, upon this becoming known, "she was visited by the religious of the several orders, who warned her that she would certainly be deluded by the devil for want of a director." The Protestant reader will learn with less satisfaction that she discarded not only her director but her Bible. "I read no more, because God taught me all that I needed." For twenty years she made no use of it; her self-opinionatedness was abnormal; never, it seems, for a moment did she lose sight of the Idols of the Cave. A grim, dour woman, without a touch of charm or womanliness, greedy of gear, a hard bargainer, a contemner of the brethren—"she had an inward assurance that three-fourths of mankind had consciously given themselves over to the devil, and that she had a divine commission to bring this fact to light." Autocratic and overbearing to excess, she was intolerant of the slightest independence: "a man would injure his conscience if he contradicted her on a single point, so clear is it that she is directly guided by God!" Courageous withal, a firm friend, and transparently truthful, she possessed a rare spiritual insight: "she had thoughts of God and conceptions of truth far above the level of those that prevailed about her"; hers was "a loftier plane, a larger view."

In the world of ideas she moved easily; but both her qualities and her defects were such as to unfit her for practical life. When, in 1653, she assumed the charge of an orphanage, she terrified the children by perpetually speaking to them of hell, and the "little black devils who were seeking to win their souls." The result, not unnaturally, was an outbreak of hysteria, put down to diabolical possession by the superstition of the age. It is creditable to the magistrates of Lille that, on the consequent trial, the children were acquitted of the charge of witchcraft, and the directors admonished to treat them with less severity. "The devil has his epochs," observes Professor Macewen; "and in the seventeenth century his power was great, reaching to every sect and nationality." The suspicion of magic attached to her throughout, probably by reason of the nervous disorders from which she suffered. The ground of her arrest in 1680 was that "she had power to contract and enlarge her person"—a not uncommon pathological phenomenon. It was as a witch rather than as a heretic that she inspired fear. The quality of her mind was critical: she stood aloof from the popular controversies of her time. A nominal member of the Church of Rome, she was neither Catholic nor Protestant, Jesuit nor Jansenist: the members of her colony at Nordstrand were forbidden to adhere to any sect or special religion, or to follow the usages and instructions of any; they must belong only to "the Christian Church." Disputes about sufficient and effectual grace, she held, were mere words:—

"It is indisputable that men require grace for salvation, but then God has given and will give to all men such grace as they require. He has created all, heathen and Christians alike, for salvation; the concealment of this truth is the chief offence of the Church. The Church of Rome, in particular, has become a great and boastful harlot. Monastic life is a fraud, and convents are the invention of the devil; the confessional is full of mischief and danger; modern churchmen have put the Eucharist in the place of Christ. The true Church is invisible, and exists only in the hearts of the faithful: if we bind ourselves by the opinions of the ancient Fathers we hinder the work of the Spirit; we must turn away from the so-called Church and seek for God in our hearts, remembering that He is always teaching new truths."

The Reformed Churches fared little better at her hands than the Roman. She disliked Calvinists and Arminians impartially: of the central doctrine of the Reformation, justification by Faith only, "it is an idea which stinks in God's nostrils," she wrote; "to propagate it is to sin against the Holy Ghost." Like the Modernists of to-day, while repudiating, or taking in a non-natural sense, every Catholic doctrine, she made vehement protestations of her Catholicism. Protestants took her for a Catholic, Catholics for a Protestant: the fact was that, in spite of her curiously unmythical failings, she was a mystic; the three-dimension space of denominationalism was not hers. Those who were sensible of the aridity of the religious world of the time were drawn to her. So wise and good a man as the Moravian Comenius held her in reverence, and clung to her for hope and consolation on his death-bed; Labadie was desirous of her co-operation—which she refused owing to her unwillingness to build up anything like a church. "The Holy Spirit," she wrote to him, "presides over no human assemblies": this settled conviction separated her even from that most unchurchlike of bodies, the Society of Friends.

Her theology, as such, did not escape the dangers that beset the narrow path of the mystic; a swerve to the right hand or the left and his balance is lost. She held the Scotist, as opposed to the Thomist view of the Incarnation: her doctrine of the Trinity was what theologians would label Sabellian, her Christology Socinian; the Atonement was "a cruel, hateful thought, set up, like the abomination of desolation, in the sanctuary"; she failed, says her biographer, to attach any unique office to Christ. It must be remembered that this, like other central truths, was presented by the current orthodoxy in its baldest and most unspiritual shape. A religious mind, just because it was religious, might well reject such a presentation, and fall back from Christianity upon conscience, from the Churches upon the light within. And it is probable that her formulas were more divergent from orthodoxy than her meaning. The clergy, Catholic and Protestant alike, dreaded less her heresies than her anti-clericalism: this, for clerics, is the unpardonable sin.

* "Antoinette Bourignon: Quietist." By Alex. R. Macewen, D.D., Professor of Church History in New College, Edinburgh. Hodder & Stoughton. 3s. 6d.

Professor Macewen sums up her career with insight and sympathy:—

"Her condemnation of the Churches of her time had a very solid foundation. Their methods and ministrations had many unchristian features. The doctrines which they selected for emphasis were grim and depressing. Worship and sacraments were to a large extent regarded formally. The spirit of unfruitful contention and wholesale antagonism was rife. Above all, the religious importance of conduct was ignored or kept in the background. The ethical and social ideals which churchmen favored were at variance with the Gospel of Jesus. In no writings of the period, not even in those of George Fox, is all this made clearer than in hers. . . . She gains distinction from the darkness which surrounded her. The Christianity of those days was dominated by the notion that revelation was wholly a matter of the past, God having revealed Himself finally in Palestine, so that any claim to be directly guided by him was a profane pretence. It was something to insist strenuously and fearlessly for a lifetime upon the truth that everyone, by self-denying aspiration and without official help, can reach peace with the Eternal Being, with conscious enjoyment of His light, and that neither nature nor grace abates human responsibility."

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.*

To the half-dozen good books written about Abraham Lincoln we must add this commemorative address of Dr. Putnam. Aiming not at biography, but at informed appreciation, it achieves real excellence. For the writer in a few chapters has succeeded in so relating the man to his great national task as to exhibit his true place in history more effectively than any other writer we have read. The fascinating story of his boyhood, and the multifarious trades and wanderings which made him so representative an American, he touches lightly, leaving such matters to formal biographers. But Lincoln's political career, and the magnificent resources of thought and character it unfolded, are presented in a masterly manner by one who, in his youth, lived through these great days, and bore no unworthy part in the great struggle. The critical acts of Lincoln are described with a vigor which never runs to waste. We see the powerful grasp with which the national statesman set his mind of steel to the issue, "Can the nation exist half-slave and half-free?" developing the full essence of the politics of the situation in his great debate with Stephen Douglas. Why such an art of political controversy has perished from modern party struggles, is a question that deserves consideration. For Dr. Putnam well observes, "I can conceive no better method for bringing representative government on to a higher plane, and for making an election what it ought to be, a reasonable decision by reasoning voters, than the institution of joint debates."

The union of powerful principle with the capacity of compromise has never been better illustrated than in these few years of Lincoln's rule. On minor matters he was flexible, even to weakness; on major matters he was never bent by other wills, but often of set deliberation took a middle course. How essential was this strong moderation Dr. Putnam shows very clearly. With all his hatred of slavery, Lincoln steadfastly refused to lend himself to the demands of the extreme anti-slavery men, who would encroach upon the legal rights of the slave States. The extraordinary skill with which, an official novice hoisted suddenly into the Presidential seat, he encountered the pretensions of his State Secretary Seward, and the hardly less troublesome machinations of Mr. Chase, the blend of humor and contempt with which he handled office-seekers, his capacity of appeasing or of disregarding hostility, and his profound knowledge of humanity, have never found an equal among the trained statesmen of the modern world. Dr. Putnam tells equally well the political and the military story, with the details of which he shows a fine, but not embarrassing familiarity. Lincoln's troubles in the conduct of the war he summarises in a telling paragraph:—

"Difficult as was the task of the men who led columns into action, of the generals in the field who had the immediate responsibility for the direction of those columns, and of the fighting line, it was in no way to be compared with the pressure and the sadness of the burden of the man who stood back of all the lines, and to whom came all the discouragements, the complaints, the growls, the criticisms, the requisitions or demands for resources that were not available, the reports of disasters, sometimes exaggerated and sometimes unduly smoothed over, the futile suggestions, the absurd schemes, the self-seeking applications, that poured into the White House from all points of the field of action, and from all parts of the Border States and of the North."

Besides all the trouble at home there were the constant threats of European intervention, which during the war hung over the Northern cause. For home-keeping politicians in America, foreign diplomacy has always proved a severe test. But Lincoln, as ignorant of European politics as of diplomatic methods, never made a blunder. One principle sufficed for him: he was not to take on any business but the one in hand. He just lived to see that through. Dr. Putnam tells how the news of his death fell upon the troops:—

"The Division Adjutant stepped out on the porch of the headquarters with the paper in his hand, but he broke down before he could begin to read. The Division Commander took the word, and was able simply to announce, 'Lincoln is dead.' The word President was not necessary, and he sought, in fact, for the shortest word. I never before had found myself in a mass of men overcome by emotion. Ten thousand soldiers were sobbing together. No survivor of the group can recall the sadness of that morning without again being touched by the wave of emotion which broke down the reserve and control of these war-worn veterans on learning that their great captain was dead."

THE INGENIOUS MR. HOGARTH.*

"OTHER pictures we look at—his prints we read," wrote Charles Lamb in a memorable passage on William Hogarth. In the same strain Horace Walpole had described the artist as "a writer of comedy with a pencil." It was the tendency among the literary critics of Hogarth's own time to regard him chiefly as a moralist and secondarily as a painter, and this view prevailed for many years after his death. But Walter Savage Landor wrote to John Forster that "in his portraits he is as true as Gainsborough, as historical as Titian," and the higher claim for Hogarth's position in the world of art has lately been pressed by many a latter-day enthusiast. The famous Portrait of Himself with his Dog Trump in the National Gallery, and that of "Captain Coram" in the Foundling Hospital, are held to establish Hogarth's equality with the great masters of color in the eighteenth century, with Reynolds, Gainsborough, Romney, and the rest. In fact, the contemporary idea of Hogarth as the satirical moralist of London life has with critics, with literary critics especially, given place to a conception of his art that places him on a far higher pinnacle of fame.

Walpole's estimate of Hogarth, which denied to him any but the scantiest merit as a painter, was undoubtedly too narrow. At the same time we should hesitate about accepting Landor's extravagant eulogy of his portraits or taking as the last word in Hogarthian criticism the superlative modern estimate of his position on the Olympus of Fine Art. We are the last to deny to his "Conversations" and "Assemblies" a unique artistic power as well as a human moral, nor do we forget that Whistler set the seal of his approbation upon them. The two great portraits which we have mentioned undoubtedly rank among the finest work of the English School, and if more of his portraits were known to us—there are a vast number that have never been traced—it is possible that his fame in this branch of art would be greatly enhanced. On the other hand, a cool and reflective judgment might decree that such works were not up to the standard of the "Captain Coram," and, inferentially, that the portraits we know were such as an ordinarily mediocre portraitist might, and often does, produce in a moment of unusual inspiration. There are, too, at least two opinions possible as to the artistic and dramatic merits of some of the larger "Conversation" pieces. We frankly confess that when one or two examples of this kind were shown at the Academy winter exhibition of 1908, we were appalled by their woodenness. It seemed in no way less than that observable in Hogarth's confessed failures in the Grand Style; the drama at which the artist aimed came perilously near to the burlesque that his enemies taunted him with; the movement of the figures was the arrested movement of the jointed doll. The fact, however, that Hogarth, painting on the large scale, may have produced mature works that in point of color and movement were not conspicuously superior to a Zoffany or a very early Gainsborough, in no way interferes with one's appreciation of the "Marriage-à-la-Mode" and other series of small pictures by which he is mainly remembered. It only illustrates the possible danger, or if not this, the foolishness, of claiming more than is necessary to establish Hogarth's greatness.

*"Abraham Lincoln." By George Craven Putnam. Putnam's. 6s. net.

*"Hogarth's London." By H. B. Wheatley. Constable. 21s. net.

For, if Hogarth had never painted a masterly portrait, if he had never produced anything but the small conversation pieces that in the aggregate make up a complete pictorial history of the London of his time, his greatness would none the less be assured. No better proof of this could be brought forward than Mr. Wheatley's book, which, dealing wholly with the significance of Hogarth's pictures of London life, and adducing only a brief and impartial summary of evidence for and against his title to a wider fame, shows us the painter-moralist in the most intimate light that painstaking research can shed. Hogarth appears as the Great Londoner, reverencing his city and drawn to its people even while he chided them; he is the great artist devoting himself to the immortalising of his age, careless of the labor it cost, and indifferent to what posterity might say of him. No man ever worked less for posterity. Mr. Wheatley carefully analyses each social phase that he treated, and it is shown how exhaustive a study of London custom and morality the total output is. One must remember, of course, the comparative unity of Society in those days. Not being split up into the many sections divided, as now, by subtle differences of taste, it was easier to comprehend as a whole; and this explains how it was that Hogarth, leading the quiet domestic life of the ordinary middle-class citizen, was yet able to seize and register with scrupulous truth the characteristics, virtues, and vices of every grade. His observation of the lower classes gave him a first-hand acquaintance with human nature, and it was his knowledge of human nature that enabled him to represent with the utmost truth the life, as in the "Marriage-à-la-mode," of an upper class that he could not have had the opportunity for studying otherwise than through an occasional glimpse of their drawing-rooms. And so we see this "strutting, consequential little man"—as Benjamin West called him—peering into High Life and Low Life, Life Political and Business and Professional, Theatrical Life, and the life of prisons and madhouses, always with the same keen eye for a subject for his satiric pencil, and always with a thought beyond the satire, a calculated artistic purpose.

"I have endeavored to treat my subjects as a dramatic writer; my picture is my stage, and men and women my players who, by means of certain actions and gestures, are to exhibit a dumb show," he wrote of himself, and the dramatic quality of his pictures cannot be too strongly insisted upon. It was serious drama, not burlesque; drama with a purpose; and no one was more bitterly resentful of the imputation of caricature than the painter himself. For the dramatic character of Hogarth's genius his close association with the stage of the day may have been partly responsible. The readiness with which he seized upon such a subject as the performance of Gay's "Beggar's Opera" for pictorial treatment is at any rate witness to the intense admiration and respect he had for native drama. He was no mean champion of its cause; not only glorifying the dramatic idea by making it the keynote of his art, but throwing himself heart and soul into the task of defending it against alien intruders. There are no more pungent satires in Hogarth's portfolio than those which deal with the public infatuation for Italian opera and masquerades. He condemned these "foreign fashions" just as he condemned the connoisseurs of the day for their extravagant patronage of the "Black Masters" and their consequent neglect of contemporary British art. His attitude on the latter subject has been severely criticised, and his enemies accused him of a wholesale philistinism, due to personal annoyance at the neglect shown to his own pictures. But this was not quite the case. His quarrel was not with the old masters, but with their ignorant appraisers.

Hogarth's life is a story of touching friendships and bitter enmities. His relations with Garrick, Gay, Fielding, and other eminent characters who helped to fill the stage on which he moved, were of the pleasantest. The history of his long duel with Wilkes, the demagogue, and Charles Churchill, the poetaster, is a fine example of eighteenth-century amenities. It was an age in which the bludgeon was more serviceable than the rapier; and Hogarth used the bludgeon for castigating, not only his personal opponents, but also the sins of the corporate society at his doors. His irony and wit were of the sledge-hammer type. But it must be remembered that the times were rough and hard, and that a fine-edged tool would have blunted its edge ineffectively against them; and before one criticises the grossness of some of Hogarth's satirical prints one should think of the far greater grossness of the real subjects as they presented themselves to him. The London of Hogarth's day is set forth so vividly in Mr. Wheatley's pages that one should not have to think twice before realising that what this great Londoner has left us is no overstatement of what he saw.

THE CENSORSHIP IN ACTION.*

THE Library Censorship has already fallen into the trap which, in the present condition of English letters, awaits all censorship, literary or theatrical. It has assumed as its standard a certain type of marketable article, and has decided that it will not countenance any deviations from that standard. Two books have been refused circulation; whether by way of the major or the minor excommunication, by a refusal to sell them, or to recommend them for sale unless they happen to be specially asked for, we do not know. Neither, so far as we can discover, contains a gross word or an alluring description. One has a very incidental and subordinate sexual interest, being in the main concerned with carefully elaborated and quite conventional descriptions of the life which white men live in West Africa, under the unusual restraints of white women's society. We can imagine and sympathise with Miss Gaunt's indignation at her book being made taboo to English readers who know what a very different picture she might have drawn. Mr. Hyatt, whose novel shares the fate of "The Uncounted Cost," has greater matter of complaint. He has taken an old and serious subject, familiar to students of life and of literature, which he treats with reserve, and, so far as phrasing goes, with singular purity. It is the theme of "La Dame aux Camélias," of "Manon Lescaut," of "Joshua Davidson," of "Crime and Punishment," of "Resurrection"; it is the side theme of "Les Misérables"; it forms the most beautiful episode in de Quincey's "Opium Eater," and it happens also to be closely woven into the Gospels, and to be the ground-work of one of the most famous of Christian traditions. In other words, Mr. Hyatt's book deals with the mystery of human nature which its saints and thinkers long ago discovered and made plain to it, that it is possible to soil the body and yet for the soul to go free. It is easy to deny this truth, and to discover every kind of qualification to it. But so long as the Magdalen remains a Christian saint, and the thought of Ann, the child street-walker, brings tears to every eye, such work as Mr. Hyatt's "Black Sheep" cannot be ruled out of literature, and unless we are to people Heaven with Pharisees, cannot be held to be immoral. On the contrary, if it is to be compared with the kind of fiction which the old commercial freedom and the new commercial censorship (and they are mere varieties of the same spirit) usually encourages, the contrast is in the main between work which is moral in intention and in effect and work which has no kind of moral aim or result, between meretricious, venal, and absurdly un-Christian writing, and the effort to represent things as they are, or to discover regenerative forces wherever they may exist.

Why, therefore, was Mr. Hyatt's work deemed unfit for circulation in the chastened society which delights in the novels of Mrs. Glyn? Mr. Hyatt is an artist, not a perfectly original artist. His literary types, and his experiences, derive in a measure from Mr. Kipling. He is fond of showing us the "gentleman ranker," half-hero, half-black-guard, thrust back into the civilisation which drove him out for some slight or reckless fault of youth. This type is not so attractive as the companion figure which M. Pierre Loti

* "Black Sheep." By Stanley Portal Hyatt. Werner Laurie. 6s.

"The Uncounted Cost." By Mary Gaunt. Werner Laurie. 6s.

has invented for his Parisian public. It wants charm and delicacy; above all, perhaps, it wants culture and self-possession. Mr. Kipling's and Mr. Hyatt's wanderers seem to have learned nothing but the arts of killing or governing savages; their Ulysses, come back to Ithaca, is driven straight on to drink and boredom. But in Lalage Penrose, (who is very far away from Horace's "sweetly smiling, sweetly prattling" Lalage) Mr. Hyatt has lit upon a figure which in its turn gives true illumination to his pages. Jim Grierson takes her from the streets, and makes her what nature meant her to be, wife and mother to the man who chose her. But, indeed, she no more belongs to them by right of soul and character than Dostoevsky's Sonia or de Quincey's Ann. Betrayed in innocence, she remains innocent; incapable of cruelty or serious falsity, she is saved by the absence even of the instability and want of self-control which mark her lover. This may be a romantic view; certainly it is a gracious one. Mr. Hyatt chooses to contrast Lalage with the group of conventional sensualists who, in good faith, try to break her relations with Grierson. There, undoubtedly, he forces his point. Grierson's marriage with the selfless Lalage was a right solution; his marriage with the slight, unfeeling girl from his own class and early surroundings who throws him over would have been a wrong solution. But the protesting relatives had a good deal of tough human experience on their side; a more rigorous artist would have drawn them more sympathetically, and a more delicate artist would have kept the earlier tie between Lalage and her lover on a finer string.

For this fault the book suffers. But the practical point is whether it is to be condemned and boycotted. Yes; if all our national literature is to be written virginibus puerisque. No; if it cannot be so written. No, again, because with us the practical alternative is that in excluding such work as Mr. Hyatt's we fall back on work which is frequently and obviously immoral. We decree that much of our modern fiction shall pass into the experience of the people, laden with the view that outside the respectable classes exists a mass of glittering and amusing life, which may be tricked out in the brightest coloring, but never set in relation to moral truth. This is the practice of a great volume of our stage-work, which deals with average sensual experience. This, too, is the view of conventional society, which would like to treat the underworld as if it did not exist, or had no right to existence. But the artist and preacher never consent to this view, and never will. They refuse to cut life in two, and in so doing they follow the religious reformer who often finds in the sinners the material for sainthood for which he sought in vain among the respectable. Where, therefore, is Mr. Hyatt wrong? He cannot be accused of grossness of style or suggestion. So far as we have ascertained, the book contains no passage, no sentence, of this character. Does his fault consist in drawing Lalage at all? In this respect, as we have said, he follows all the masters of literature. Or does he offend in making her unexacting, gentle in manner, and essentially pure of heart? Again, he is in line, not only with the great writers, but with the Christian moralists. It is therefore an offence against common sense and enlightened experience to say that such a book as "Black Sheep" can affront minds of average balance. If it does, the details and literary method of "Resurrection"—that is to say, of the greatest of modern novels—will offend them a hundred times more.

Much the same may be said of Miss Gaunt's novel, only with less emphasis, because in truth her work is not directly concerned with morals at all, and is in the main a book of adventure. As far as we can see, the only possible point of objection is that she introduces a lady who has trusted her lover unwisely, and has failed, after two years of companionship, to keep him to his promise of legal union. This episode is not even described. It is over when the book begins; and the point of introducing it is to exhibit the woman's scruples in engaging herself to an honorable man to whom she makes full confession of the past. There are passages in this study of a woman's delicacy which strike us as rather amateurish. There is not one that approaches offence. If the moralist can object to the Censorship's refusal to sell "Black Sheep," the average reader can barely discover a plausible ground for the rejection of "The Unaccounted Cost." The libraries, indeed, are following the path set them by Mr. Redford. It will lead to disaster.

The Week in the City.

				Price Friday morning, Jan. 28.		Price Friday morning, Feb. 4.
Consols	82½	...	81½
Midland Def.	58½	...	58½
Union Pacific	190½	...	187½
Mexican 1st Pref.	132	...	133½
U.S. Steel	84½	...	81½

THERE are a good many moderate politicians in the City equally afraid of Tariff Reform and Socialism, who think the result of the elections rather satisfactory. They do not see that it is practically impossible for any Liberal Government to stay in office without effecting radical changes, and of course they are all averse to another General Election. "We could not possibly afford it," said one of them to me. Everyone agrees that trade is going ahead, and the money market looks firmer. It is to be hoped that the big fall of last month in the price of raw cotton will last. If so it should mean another run of prosperity for Lancashire. Corn merchants, too, are beginning to look for lower prices. The Rothschilds are very busy with the Brazil 4 per Cent. Conversion Loan, which cannot be strongly recommended. It is really a device for getting cash for ordinary purposes. There has been some bad news from New York and Mexico City. In New York, Fish & Robinson, a big and old-established stock exchange and banking house, has failed through the gradual but heavy depreciation of securities in the last few weeks. In Mexico City a run on the United States Banking Co. has compelled it to close its doors, and this suspension has brought down the Mexican Packing Company, whose recent issue in London will be remembered. There are some people who feel rather nervous about the banking and currency situation in the United States, and the New York bankers are just now pursuing a conservative policy which has awkward consequences for large open accounts.

COST OF LIVING IN THE UNITED STATES.

The people of the United States are becoming desperate. Prices are prohibitive. Trade rather drags. Financiers are more nervous and greedier than ever. The new tariff is a hopeless failure. The proposed reforms in banking and currency look more and more difficult of achievement. The following letter from a Brooklyn correspondent to the Editor of the New York "Evening Post," gives a very clear idea of living in the United States, and of the awkward conditions that are being developed in the big towns:—

"SIR,—A clergyman remarked to me, 'My salary is the same as it was ten years ago. The cost of living is forty per cent. higher.'

"The tariff is the most prominent cause of this condition, but not the only one. The writer, who is daily brought in contact with the custom house, often wonders that any dutiable merchandise can be imported and marketed. You have here a few illustrations:

"An invoice, foreign, $1,500 value cotton goods, duty paid, $1,214.

"An invoice, foreign, $6,000 value, cotton goods, duty paid, $4,200.

"An invoice, foreign, $412, kid gloves, $212.

"If Mr. Payne's friend, Littauer, had his way, the third item would have been $340.

"The goods in question are of such a class that the plain people are the victims. Wealthy people would not use them. Another great cause of high prices is the enormous over-issue of paper currency, a large part of which is under a latent state of suspension of gold payments. Whenever there is a monetary stringency, gold can only be had at a premium. Every one is his own banker. Deflation is increased by the flotation of bank cheques practically uncurrent taking five to thirty days to collect.

"The legal tender act should be repealed; that would be the first step in real currency reform. If the Briton is wise, he will stick to Free Trade. A small duty is the thin end of the wedge."

At the present time both bread and clothing cost twice as much in the United States as in England, and all things are necessarily in proportion. The pretended prosperity is very largely a sham. It will be remembered that just before the election, Messrs. J. & P. Coats endeavored to turn the success of their thread works abroad, where they manufacture under cover of Protection, into an argument for Tariff Reform. But they refused to give any details, and they did not say they were about to close down their main factory

THE BROOK AND ITS BANKS.

By the late Rev. J. G. Wood, M.A., Author of "The Handy Natural History," etc. With 16 full-page Plates and numerous Illustrations in the text. Large crown 8vo., cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. New Edition.

BY MEADOW, GROVE, AND STREAM.

An Introduction to Nature Study. By HENRY HILTON BROWN, F.R.S. With 2 folded Coloured Plates, Photogravure Frontispiece, and 171 Figures in Black and White, from Original Drawings by the Author. Large Crown 8vo., cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

BY-PATHS IN NATURE.

By FRANK STEVENS, Author of "Adventures in Pondland," etc. With 72 Illustrations. Crown 8vo., cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

CREATURES OF THE SEA.

Being the Life Story of some Sea Birds, Beasts, and Fishes. By FRANK T. BULLEN, F.R.G.S. With 40 full page Illustrations by THEO. CARRERAS. Demy 8vo., cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

CLEANINGS FROM THE FIELDS OF NATURE.

By EDWARD T. CONNOLD, F.Z.S., F.E.S. With an Introduction by DAVID ANDERSON-BERRY, M.D., F.R.S.E. With Photogravure Frontispiece and 24 pages of Plates from Photographs, Photo-Micrographs, and Drawings by the Author. Large crown 8vo., cloth gilt, Medallion on cover, 3s. 6d.

HOW TO STUDY WILD FLOWERS.

By REV. GEORGE HENSLow, M.A., F.L.S., &c., Author of "Plants of the Bible." New Edition, with 12 double-page Coloured Plates and 57 other Illustrations. Cloth gilt, with Coloured Pictures on cover, 2s. 6d.

PONDS AND ROCK POOLS.

With Hints on Collecting for, and the Management of, the Micro-Aquarium. By HENRY SCHERREN. With Illustrations. 2s. cloth.

FOR READERS OF ALL AGES.
THE BOY'S OWN NATURE BOOK.
Written and Scientifically Accurate.

By W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, F.L.S., M.B.O.U., Author of "Fifty-two Nature Rambles," "Every Boy's Book of British Natural History," &c. With an introduction by the Hon. Sir JOHN COCKBURN, K.C.M.G., M.D. (late Prime Minister of South Australia), and Appendices descriptive of the Coloured Plates. With 2 folded Coloured Plates, a Coloured Frontispiece, and 64 Plates containing over 150 Pictures reproduced from photographs taken direct from Nature by the Rev. S. N. SEDGWICK, M.A. Large crown 8vo., cloth gilt, Coloured Medallion on cover 3s. 6d.

EVERY BOY'S BOOK OF BRITISH NATURAL HISTORY.

A Reliable Guide to British Wild Life and Nature Photography. By W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, F.L.S. With an Introduction by the Right Hon. LORD AVEBURY. Large crown 8vo., cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

FIFTY-TWO NATURE RAMBLES.

A Series of Open-Air Talks for Young People. By W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, F.L.S., M.B.O.U., Author of "Every Boy's Book of Natural History," etc. With 5 Coloured Plates from Photographs, and 100 other Illustrations from Photographs. Large crown 8vo., cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

RAMBLES WITH NATURE STUDENTS.

By MRS. BRIGHTWEN, Author of "Wild Nature Won by Kindness," etc. With 130 Illustrations. Large crown 8vo., cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

THROUGH A POCKET LENS.

By HENRY SCHERREN, F.Z.S., Author of "Ponds and Rock Pools," etc. Profusely Illustrated. Crown 8vo., cloth, 2s.

PUBLISHED BY

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, 4, Boulevard St., London, E.C.

And sold by all Booksellers.

Macmillan's New Books

LORD KELVIN.

The Life of William Thomson, Baron Kelvin of Largs.

By SILVANUS P. THOMPSON. With Portraits and other Illustrations. 2 vols. 8vo, 30s. net. [Tuesday.]

History of English Poetry.

By W. J. COURTHOPE, C.B., M.A., D.Litt., LL.D. Vol. VI. The Romantic Movement in English Poetry; Effects of the French Revolution. 8vo, 10s. net.

* * * Previously published. Vols. I.-V., 10s. net each.

THE TIMES.—"DR. COURTHOPE'S book has no rival on the same scale, and it will long remain a mine of learning for students to dig in and an interesting exposition of one view of the history of our poetry."

Anti Mias. An Essay in Isometry.

By R. J. WALKER. 2 vols. 8vo, 21s. net.

Physical Science in the Time of Nero.

Being a Translation of the "Questiones Naturales" of Seneca. By JOHN CLARKE, M.A. With Notes on the Treatise by Sir ARCHIBALD GEIKIE, K.C.B., Sc.D., &c. 8vo, 10s. net.

A Project of Empire.

A Critical Study of the Economics of Imperialism, with special reference to the Ideas of ADAM SMITH. By J. SHIELD NICHOLSON, M.A., D.Sc., F.B.A. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

SPECTATOR.—"A book which should give its readers as 'furiously to think' as any political treatise of our generation."

The Working Faith of the Social Reformer, and other essays. By HENRY JONES, LL.D., D.Litt. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

The CENTURY MAGAZINE

Illustrated. 1s. 4d. Annual Subscription, 16s.

THE SPELL OF DAMASCUS. The Holy Land. (Continued.) By ROBERT HICHENS.

STEALING A MARCH ON THE FAR EAST: Adventures of a Stowaway. By HARRY A. FRANCK.

THE CREATORS: IV. A Novel. By MAY SINCLAIR.

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

Labour in Portuguese West Africa.

By WILLIAM A. CADBURY.

Crown 8vo, with a Coloured Map, 2s. 6d. net.

Under the advice of counsel the publication of this book was postponed pending the libel action recently heard in the Courts. It is now issued with an additional chapter. It contains a full account of the author's personal experiences in S. Thomé and Príncipe, and on the Angola coast, and also reprints Mr. Burt's report of his previous visit and long journey to the Hinterland of Angola.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS, Ltd., 68-74, Carter Lane, London

DO YOU ASPIRE to become an Author or Journalist?

If you do, then we can tell you how to make the best use of your talents, how to avoid the heartache of returned MSS., how to "get there" by the shortest route.

Naturally, it takes some time to find your proper groove, the channel most suited to your particular bent, but if you have ability we say, unhesitatingly, "it can be done." You want to serve a short "Apprenticeship" under our guidance. We say short advisedly, because the very Newness of Discovered Genius finds a ready market, if directed into the proper channel.

It may be that you have a special aptitude for essay writing; perhaps you are a correspondent whose letters confer the greatest pleasure on the recipient; in either case there is the possibility of turning your gift to the very best account. Do so, get advice from those who can advise from experience.

Let us advise you. Send a note to-day to the—

LITERARY CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE,
Room 26, 9, Arundel Street, Strand, W.C.

in the United States (at Pawtucket) where two or three thousand hands have been turned into the street.

JAPAN, KOREA AND MANCHURIA.

The year 1909, writes a prominent authority on Japan, will not rank as one of Japan's good years. The country is still suffering heavily from the effects of the war, with the waste of capital involved, the huge debt thereby piled up, the expansion of the military forces that followed, and the consequent heavy load of taxation. The strain will be felt for many years to come, but probably the worst is now past, as the gradually expanding resources of Japan will enable the burden to be borne more easily. Perhaps the best feature of the year has been the abundant rice harvest and the consequent low price of rice, which is the staple food. The political centres of interest in the Far East have been Korea and Manchuria. In the former the principal events have been the suppression of the insurrection and the taking over of the judicial administration by Japan, which, together with the agreements signed at Peking on the subject of Chientao and the various railway problems in Manchuria, mark the steady advance of Japan towards a predominant position in the Far East. The movement is being watched closely, and Japan's attitude on the question of the open door and equal opportunity has been sharply criticised, especially in America. Holding the principal line of railway running through the most fertile districts of the Three Provinces, Japan has a natural superiority over all other foreign competitors which is bound to tell, even with the most scrupulous regard to the open door. But so far Japan's Continental enterprises have not proved remunerative to the country as a whole. Not only has it been necessary to budget for a larger army and navy than would be amply sufficient to guard the shores of Japan, but there is the tendency of Continental exploitation to divert attention from national development. In foreign affairs the loss of Prince Ito is almost irrevocable. He was a great diplomatist, and on very good terms with the Powers.

THE NATIONAL PROVINCIAL.

The report of the National Provincial Bank of England is a satisfactory one, considering what a bad year it has been for bankers. There is no change in dividend, and investments are written down below the market price of December 31st. Several new branches have been opened, and as the chairman, Mr. Fitzgerald, has said, "the year 1910 begins with distinctly more cheerful prospects." His warning against public and private extravagance on unproductive purposes is timely, and should be laid to heart.

LUCCELLUM.

THE LONDON CITY & MIDLAND BANK LIMITED.

ESTABLISHED 1836.

Authorised Capital - - £22,200,000
Subscribed Capital - - £18,235,680

Paid-Up Capital - - - - £3,799,100
Reserve Fund - - - - £3,419,190

DIRECTORS:

SIR EDWARD H. HOLDEN, Bart., Chairman and Managing Director.

WILLIAM GRAHAM BRADSHAW, Esq., London, Deputy-Chairman.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD AIREDALE, Leeds.
SIR PERCY ELLY BATES, Bart., Liverpool.
CHARLES G. BEALE, Esq., Birmingham.
ROBERT CLOVER BEAZLEY, Esq., Liverpool.
SIR WILLIAM BENJAMIN BOWRING, Bart., Liverpool.

JOHN ALEXANDER CHRISTIE, Esq., London.
SIR G. F. FAUDEL-PHILLIPS, Bart., G.C.I.E., London.
FREDERICK HYNDE FOX, Esq., Liverpool.
H. SIMPSON GEE, Esq., Leicester.
JOHN HOWARD GWYHER, Esq., London.

ARTHUR T. KEEN, Esq., Birmingham.
THE RIGHT HON. LORD PIRRIE, K.P., London.
THOMAS ROYDEN, Esq., Liverpool.
SIR THOMAS SUTHERLAND, G.C.M.G., London.
WILLIAM FITZTHOMAS WYLEY, Esq., Coventry.

HEAD OFFICE: 5, THREADNEEDLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.
Joint General Managers: J. M. MADDERS, S. B. MURRAY, F. HYDE.
Secretary: E. J. MORRIS. City Manager: A. D. RUTHERFORD.

DR.

BALANCE SHEET, 31st December, 1909.

CR.

LIABILITIES.			ASSETS.
	£	s. d.		£	s. d.
To Capital Paid up, viz.: £12 10s. 0d. per Share on—			By Cash and Bullion in hand and at
303,928 Shares of £60 each	3,799,100	0 0	Bank of England	13,063,799	19 9
„ Reserve Fund	3,419,190	0 0	„ Money at Call and at Short Notice	9,868,195	15 1
„ Dividend payable on 1st February, 1910	541,919	0 0			22,931,995 14 10
„ Balance of Profit and Loss Account	179,740	0 3
	7,739,949	0 3	INVESTMENTS:
„ Current, Deposit, and other Accounts	69,644,519	16 5	Consols and other British Govern-	3,901,252	4 9
„ Acceptances on Account of Customers	5,128,918	0 7	ment Securities
			„ Stocks Guaranteed by British Government, Indian and British Railway Debenture and Preference
			Stocks, British Corporation
			Stocks, Colonial and Foreign	5,087,050	13 3
			Government Stocks, etc.		8,988,302 18 0
			„ Bills of Exchange		6,795,327 3 9
					38,715,625 16 7
			„ Advances on Current Accounts, Loans on Security and other Accounts...		36,897,235 3 4
			„ Liabilities of Customers for Accepances as per contra		5,128,918 0 7
			„ Bank Premises at Head Office and Branches		1,771,609 16 9
					£82,513,386 17 3
	£82,513,386	17 3

REPORT OF THE AUDITORS TO THE SHAREHOLDERS OF THE LONDON CITY AND MIDLAND BANK LIMITED.

In accordance with the provisions of Sub-section 2 of Section 113 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, we report as follows:—
We have examined the above Balance Sheet in detail with the books at Head Office and with the certified Returns from the Branches. We have satisfied ourselves as to the correctness of the Cash Balances and the Bills of Exchange and have verified the correctness of the Money at Call and Short Notice. We have also verified the Securities representing the Investments of the Bank, and having obtained all the information and explanations we have required, we are of opinion that such Balance Sheet is properly drawn up so as to exhibit a true and correct view of the state of the Company's affairs according to the best of our information and the explanations given to us and as shown by the books of the Company.

LONDON, 8th January, 1910.

WHINNEY, SMITH & WHINNEY, CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS,

Auditors.

The Bank has Branches and Sub-Branches in London, the suburbs, and throughout the country. It also has Agents in all the principal Cities of the world.

Every kind of Banking business is transacted at the Head Office and Branches.

Bills, Annuities, Coupons and Dividends are collected in all parts of the United Kingdom, the Colonies, and in Foreign Countries.

Purchase and Sale of Stocks and Funds are effected.

For the convenience of Customers, monies can be paid in at any of the Branches and advised the same day to their own account.

Strong Rooms are provided for the security of Deeds and other property lodged by the Customers of the Bank.

Every Officer of the Bank is pledged by a signed Declaration to secrecy as to the business affairs of the Bank and its Customers.

THE FOREIGN EXCHANGE DEPARTMENT.

Telegraphic Address—"Cinnaforex, London."

Telephone—2481 London Wall.

ISSUES Currency Drafts on all Cities, Circular Letters of Credit and Circular Notes payable all over the world; also makes Mail and Telegraphic Transfers to all Cities.

COLLECTS Foreign Bills.

PURCHASES approved Foreign Bills.

ESTABLISHES Commercial Credits on behalf of Customers available anywhere against the usual shipping documents.

Drafts, &c., may be obtained direct from the Head Office or Branches, which are always ready to give quotations.

THE SHIPPING DEPARTMENT.

Telegraphic Address—"Cinnaship, London."

Telephone—2481 London Wall.

Is specially organised to look after Shippers' Freight Remittances from, and Disbursements to, all parts of the World by mail or cable.

CHAIRMAN: To those qualities of fine flavour and aroma that one requires for real enjoyment in smoking it adds the unusual attribute of coolness.

Whether smoked much or little it is always cool, always pleasing and burns evenly to the last shred.

BOARDMAN'S is the same tobacco milder, and

RECORDER the same, but fuller flavoured.

6d. per oz. from
all tobacconists.

R. J. LEA, MANCHESTER.

1d.
2

The Daily News

LONDON & MANCHESTER.

ALL OVER ENGLAND FIRST THING IN THE MORNING.

1d.
2

SITUATION WANTED.

LADY (YOUNG), interested in politics, desires re-engagement as Secretary. Expert Shorthand Writer and Typist. Energetic, bright, well educated, tactful and hard-working. Exceptional references. Address—"Reliable," c/o The Nation, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."

£12 12s. OPORTO, GIBRALTAR, TANGIER, ALGIERS, PALERMO, February 15th.

£26 5s. PALESTINE, EGYPT, CONSTANTINOPLE, GREECE, March 3rd.

Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,

LISTS SENT POST FREE. 53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

The 1s. Illustrated Bible, 1s. 3d. post free. The Red Letter Bible, from 5s. 4d.
The Indexed Salvation New Testament, 1s. 6d. post free. [post free.
The Red Letter New Testament, 1s., 1s. 6d. post free.
The Sunday School Prize Bible, with Coloured Illustration, 1s. 6d. post free.
Wide Margin Reference Bibles, from 3s. 9d. post free.
The Self-Explanatory Teachers' Bible, 12s. 6d., 15s., and 21s. post free.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

GLAISHER'S REMAINDER BOOK CATALOGUE

For FEBRUARY (No. 369),

NOW READY, and will be forwarded on application.

It comprises a Specially Attractive Selection of Publisher's Reminders, including many Good Bargains.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., Booksellers, 265, High Holborn, London.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER. Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Scholarship Examinations in March, July and December.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.

BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines, Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.
(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

BOOTHAM SCHOOL.

HEAD MASTER:—ARTHUR ROWNTREE, B.A. (Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History and Practice of Education Cantab.)

Preparation for Universities.

Citizenship Course. Leisure Hour Work.

Sixty Boys passed University Entrance Examinations in the years 1905-9.

For prospectus, etc., apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

LEIGHTON PARK SCHOOL (Near Reading).

Under the Management of the Society of Friends.

Boys from this PUBLIC SCHOOL have done well at the Universities and in business careers.

The School stands in its own grounds of about 45 acres, high above the town and the Thames Valley.

For Honours List, Prospectus, particulars of Scholarships, and other information, apply to the Head Master, JOHN RIDGES, M.A., at the School.

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey, Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK.
K. M. ELLIS.

STRAMONGATE BOYS' SCHOOL, KENDAL.

A Boarding School for Boys.

Founded by the Society of Friends in Kendal.

A strong staff—leisure-time pursuits—school journeys—good games—gymnastics—a magnificent country district.

The school has doubled itself in the last five years.

Prospectus, School Magazine, etc., from WILFRED SESSIONS, B.Sc. Headmaster.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD, HASLEMERE, SURREY.

COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Sandy Soil. 600 feet above sea level.

Healthy out door life, combined with thorough education on modern lines. Usual curriculum, including citizenship course, extension lectures, &c. Preparation when required for University and other careers. Handicrafts, gardening, riding, nature study, archaeology, &c.

Principal: Miss AMY KEMP.

EDUCATIONAL.

SESAME HOUSE

for Home-life Training and for Training of Children, Lady Nurses and Kindergartners.—For full particulars apply,
The Principal, Miss EMILY LAST, 43A, Acacia Road, London, N.W.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.O.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

The BOOK MONTHLY, for February, is now on Sale. Sixpence net.

CONTENTS.

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR. A Budget of Literary Talk, accompanied by many interesting Pictures.

A BOOK OF BOOKS. The Building of The Great London Literary Catalogue—James Milne.

LADIES' BOOKPLATES. The History in Brief of a very Pretty Fashion—Eveline B. Mitford.

THE GAMBLE OF IT. Or Blunders and Failures of English Publishing—R. Cochrane.

A LONDON LETTER. On certain Literary Lights of Land's End—The Editor.

"EARL WALTER." Good Gossip about Scott, by his Friend James Skene.

LIGHT AND LEADING. New Fact and Current Opinion Gathered from the Book World.

THE GENERAL READER. Snap-Shot Reviews of the Best and Best-Selling Books.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY. Particulars of Interesting Volumes Likely to be Published this Month.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH. A Classified Catalogue of the Noteworthy Books, New Editions and Reprints of February.

THE PERIODICALS. Contents of this Month's Reviews & Magazines.

Publishers: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

HIGHEST QUALITY TURKISH TOWELS AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY

BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;

And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED).

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it
WILL BE REPLACED.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Bathrooms on every Floor,

Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading,
Billiard and Smoking Rooms.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) Single from 3/6 to 6/0.Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, table d'hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."LONDON.*WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc., 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.THE QUEEN. Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) Hotel. Close Pier; 1st Class; moderate.SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week.BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.*BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.BRIGHTON.*THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.*THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara.DEAL.*BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.EASTBOURNE.*CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House. Susex Gdns. 5/- day.HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.EDINBURGH.*ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel.GREAT YARMOUTH.*MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day.GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.*THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.ILFRACOMBE.*COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 rooms. Facing Sea.KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCs.*CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments.LANCASTER.*BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh.LEEDS.*HOTEL METROPOLE. 2 minutes' walk from either station.LIVERPOOL.*COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone 3032 Royal, 3 wires.LLANDUDNO.*The WHITE HORSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea.LLANELLY.*CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LYNTON (Devon).ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres.MALVERN.*HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson.MATLOCK.*SMEDLEY'S HYDRO. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand.ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes).NELSON.*RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station.OXFORD (near).*SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boar's Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c., Lecture.PENTRE.*PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.SOUTHPORT.*KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment.ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas. Tel. 647ROCKLEY HYDRO. Electric and other baths; Excellent cuisine.
Lift. Near Golf Links From 7s. per day. Tel. 422.HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclist's Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop.WHITBY.*WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.Your Week End
Is Not Complete

WITHOUT

The Saturday
Westminster

(The Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette.")

It is the only Weekly Magazine Review of the Kind."F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week.
An Unique page of "Problems and Prizes,"
Book Reviews and Special Literary Articles by the best known Writers.ONE PENNY. Post 6/6 per annum (home), 8/8 (abroad).*Offices: Salisbury Square, London, E.C.*NOTICE.THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for
copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION
Office, 14 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden.Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION
PUBLISHING Co. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-
sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—
Gordon and Gotch.Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

SOME SUCCESSFUL GREENING BOOKS.

BARONESS ORCZY'S

LATEST AND GREATEST ROMANCE.

The Nest of the Sparrowhawk.

By the Author of "THE SCARLET PIMPERNEL." Eighth Large Edition Now Ready.

For Charles the Rover.

By MAY WYNNE,

Author of "A MAID OF BRITTANY."

"'Henry of Navarre' put the seal on May Wynne as a writer of historical romance, but in 'For Charles the Rover' she has gone one better."—SHEFFIELD TELEGRAPH.

The Secret of the Raft.

By HOUGHTON TOWNLEY,

Author of "THE BISHOP'S EMERALDS."

"If you want thrills you will find them here."—DAILY MIRROR.

The House of Terror.

By GERALD BISS,

Author of "THE DUPE."

"For a distinctly hair-raising series of situations 'The House of Terror' may be strongly recommended."—EVENING STANDARD.

The Disc.

By HARRIS BURLAND.

Author of "THE FINANCIER."

"Mr. Burland has not lost any of his great power of being interesting."—MORNING LEADER.

ANOTHER "WHEN IT WAS DARK."

The Serpent of the Cross.

By STEPHEN ANDREW.

"Should be read by every thinker. It is an intellectual treat as well as an interesting story."—REYNOLDS'S.

Don Q's Love Story.

By K. and HESKETH PRICHARD.

Illustrated by CYRUS CUNEO.

"Sustained interest, graphic writing, and strongly drawn characters make this the finest of the romances of these popular authors."—EVENING NEWS.

HAVE YOU READ IT?

BOOM

BY WILLIAM CAINE.

"We read 'BOOM' at a sitting, which means that we found it interesting, but it has even more than that to recommend it—it is a first-rate satire and an irresistible piece of humor."—Black and White.

AT ALL LIBRARIES.

SIX SHILLINGS EACH.

GREENING & CO., Ltd., 91, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

The Nation

VOL. VI., No. 20.]
Registered as a Newspaper.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1910.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., 4d. Abroad, 1d.]

CONTENTS.

PAGE	PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK ... 757	The County Elections. By H. Shaen Solly ... 776
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—	A Forecast. By Joshua Brookes ... 776
The One Thing Needful ... 760	Red Rubber. By Henry Cotton ... 776
"Veto" or "Reform"? ... 761	Religion Without Enthusiasm. By E. K. S. ... 776
The Perils of the Indian Press ... 762	"At the Door." By Frances F. Housman ... 777
Law ... 762	The Essence of Religion. By E. ... 777
Parties in South Africa ... 763	Gladstone's Singing Voice. By R. W. J. ... 777
The Next Step in Women's Suffrage ... 765	Scottish Liberal Journalism. By Anti-Monopolist ... 777
MEMBERS AND THEIR MAN-DATE. By a Parliamentary Correspondent ... 765	POETRY:—
LIFE AND LETTERS:—	The Suburb. By Thomas Burke ... 777
The Politician's Soul ... 766	THE WORLD OF BOOKS ... 778
The Underworld of Time ... 767	REVIEWS:—
Carlyle, the Poet ... 768	The Idea of a Free Church ... 779
The Bird-Play ... 770	Lady Westmorland's Corre- spondence ... 780
THE DRAMA:—	The Lesser Elizabethans ... 781
Mr. Frohman's Repertory Theatre. By William Archer 771	The Meaning of Music ... 782
LETTERS FROM ABROAD:—	The Polyglot Empire ... 782
A Sham Reform. By Ed. Bernstein ... 772	Through a Glass Darkly ... 783
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—	BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
The "Mitigation" of the Veto. By Historicus ... 774	Historical Essays ... 784
The Secrecy of the Ballot. By J. R. ... 774	The Mind of the Artist ... 786
The Gladstone League. By the Hon. Treasurers ... 774	Christianity is Christ ... 786
The Recent Elections and the Small Holdings Act. By A Country Liberal ... 774	Eton ... 786
The Meaning of the Scottish Elections. By English Lib- eral ... 775	The Conquest of the Isthmus ... 786
	The Growth of the English House ... 786
	THE WEEK IN THE CITY. By Lucellum ... 788

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accom- panied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

THE party leaders have summoned their followers for the meeting of Parliament on Tuesday next, and the first Cabinet Council was held on Thursday. So far as tactics are concerned, the procedure, after the conclu- sion of the debate on the Address, will probably follow the more normal order of a Session. The necessary financial resolutions and the Budget will be passed in a few days under a strict form of closure. This order is dictated by the necessities of the financial position, which are serious, for the country has already lost heavily through the action of the Lords, and further large borrowings must, if possible, be avoided. But there is no doubt that the Liberal rank and file, passionately attached as it is to the Budget, regards this procedure with real doubt, and thinks that in some measure it qualifies the Albert Hall pledge. The average party man argues that if the Government proceeds with the Budget, it has already "assumed" and "held" office without dealing with the Lords. On the other hand, the pledge exists in substance so long as the Government fully adheres to its policy on the Veto, and produces, without delay, a Bill which embodies it. Judging from Mr. Asquith's speech at the Albert Hall, this measure will closely follow the lines of the Campbell-Bannerman resolution.

* * *

MEANWHILE, the Tory Press proposes to substitute for the policy of "Veto First" a policy of "Veto Not At All." The merits of this proposal from the Tory point of view are undeniable. The Government, having sur- vived the elections, would then be its own executioner.

This result would be obtained by a variety of methods, all equally destructive. The Ministry would first con- fuse its followers in the country by the tactic of chang- ing front in face of the enemy. It would then alienate the Irish and the Labor Party. It would finally pro- duce a Bill extremely complicated, open to criticism from a dozen different points of view, needing months to evolve and several more months to debate. In the end, it would satisfy no one, and would prove to be equally objectionable to the Crown, the Peers, the Commons, the Liberal, the Tory, the Labor, and the Irish Parties. The very few Liberals who urge this course appear to imagine that there is some way of reconciling the opinions of those who desire to strengthen the House of Lords and those who wish to strengthen the House of Commons. For these and other reasons Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman advised the Liberal Party not to touch the question of "reform" until they had settled the question of "veto." His advice was never more pertinent than it is to-day.

* * *

SINCE these lines, and our articles on the situation, were written, something like a thunderbolt has come from Dublin. Mr. Redmond, speaking at a Nationalist dinner at the Gresham Hotel on Thursday night, declared that the Irish Party had fought the election on Home Rule and the veto of the Lords, and that on both these issues there was a majority of 120. He quoted the Albert Hall pledge, and stated that it was "inconceivable" that the Prime Minister would "palter with" it. If he did, the Liberal Party would be driven into the wilderness for twenty years. Unfortunately it had been suggested by the "West- minster Gazette" and "other so-called Liberal organs," that Mr. Asquith should "pass the Budget and deal with the question of the Veto at some convenient time in future. That is to say, it is seriously suggested that, having won a victory at the polls against the Lords, he should send the Budget back to them with a request to be kind enough to pass it into law. To do so would be to give the whole case against the Lords away. To do so would be to disgust every real democrat in Great Britain and to break openly and unashamedly the clear and explicit pledge on the faith of which, at any rate, Ireland gave her support to the Government. If Mr. Asquith is not in a position to say that he has such guarantees as are necessary to enable him to pass a Veto Bill this year, and proposes to pass the Budget into law and adjourn the veto question, I say that is the policy that Ireland cannot and will not approve."

Mr. Redmond added that he had no reason to sup- pose that Mr. Asquith would not stand by his guns, and that if he did he would have Ireland unitedly at his back.

* * *

WE cannot affect to be surprised at Mr. Redmond's outburst, or that he should be even more concerned at the tone and language of the "Westminster Gazette" than were the bulk of English Liberals. Nothing, we are afraid, was more likely to suggest that the Liberal Party were prepared to take the course which Mr. Red- mond deprecates, to drop the question of the Veto or to exchange that policy for the opposite course of a "re- form" of the House of Lords, conducted by agreement with the Unionist chiefs. This tactic was eagerly adopted by the "Spectator" with marked approval of the line suggested by Liberal "moderates." It happened to involve a plain breach of faith, both with the electorate and with the allies of Liberalism. It was a grave error, and we are sure that the "Westminster" now sees it to be an error.

* * *

NEVERTHELESS we cannot regard the situation as lost, or think that Mr. Redmond's words mean that his party will vote against the Budget in alliance with the enemies of Home Rule and the supporters of the Veto. Some regard must be had to the Irish situation, and the spirit of faction which Mr. Redmond has to control. What it does mean is that there can be no paltering with the problem of the Veto, and no delay in producing the Government's plans for dealing with it. The ideal position would be that which both Radicals and the Irish equally desire—namely, a statement from the Prime Minister, on the meeting of Parliament, either that he had obtained assurances on the Veto and would proceed with his Bill, or, not having obtained them, that he had resigned office. The less heroic policy is to proceed with the Veto simultaneously with the Budget, which, after all, not only provides Old Age Pensions, but averts the serious loss to the Irish taxpayer that a continued recourse to loans must involve. We see no great difficulty in such a course, and it is apparently that which Mr. Redmond has in mind. Probably he will not vote for the Budget unless he is satisfied as to the Government going straight on the Veto. But we cannot imagine that he contemplates voting against it.

* * *

MR. KEIR HARDIE, speaking as President of the Labor Party's Conference at Newport on Wednesday, re-stated its familiar attitude to Liberalism, with a characteristic emphasis on its "independence." On the question of the Lords, he spoke as a single-Chamber man, saying that the battle against them was peculiarly that of Labor. As Mr. Churchill said, it was the growth of the Labor Party which had stimulated the Lords to set up obsolete claims as a bulwark against the new social advance. He thought that the policy of merely "weakening" the Lords' veto would be a "toying with democracy," said that to deal separately with the legislative and financial veto was to make "two bites at a cherry," and added that the question of whether a reformed Second Chamber should be "elective" or "hereditary" was a mere family quarrel among Liberals. All of which means that the Labor Party will be a propulsive force for the Liberals on the Lords' question, but will work with them against the veto.—On the same day the Irish Party unanimously re-elected Mr. Redmond as their chairman, resolved to exclude members refusing the pledge, and passed a resolution congratulating the Irish League of Great Britain on its success in returning candidates "opposed to the veto of the House of Lords, and in favor of Home Rule."

* * *

On Wednesday Mrs. Asquith named and launched the fast river destroyer, "Paramatta," which is to be the first ship of the new Australian Navy. Captain Collins, the representative of the Commonwealth in London, declared at the ceremony that the event marked the end of the conception of a highly centralised Empire with subordinate parts, which is, we may say, the dominant idea of Toryism and Imperialism, and the beginning of free naval co-operation "in times of emergency" between the various self-governing units. This was also the line of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in the debates on the Canadian Navy. The Canadian Premier maintained, against the Opposition, the idea of national defence and the right of the Dominion to decide when its new naval forces shall come to the assistance of the Mother Country. This policy somewhat weakens the central material force of the Imperial Navy. In compensation, it adds greatly to the moral power of the Empire.

* * *

THE Labor Party decided in conference on Tuesday to press for a change in the definition of Trade Unions, so as to enable them to make compulsory levies on their members for the purpose of labor representation. Mr. Hardie considered the question as one involving the existence of the Labor Party, and not merely whether its Parliamentary representation should rest on compulsory or voluntary levies. Unions must have power to spend their money in their own way, apart from the general question of payment of members. Should, however, this reform be carried, the need for compulsory levies would cease. The Conference was not quite unanimous, Mr. Clynes declaring for a Parliamentary fund collected by free contributions.

* * *

AN admirable criticism of all schemes for "reforming" the Peers appears in the shape of a letter from Mr. Bodley, the greatest living English authority on the French Constitution, in the "Times" of Thursday. Mr. Bodley shows that the creation of a Second Chamber consisting of superior persons was attempted in the National Assembly after the war of 1870, and completely broke down. He also points out that all proposals to represent or discriminate between sects, professions, or institutions are equally open to objection, and adds satirically that the only reform of the Lords with which the democracy are likely to agree is that party leaders should give up the sale of peerages in return for contributions to the party funds. When the question of powers is settled we may, indeed, attempt the problem of the constitution of a Second Chamber. Till then, all efforts to remodel the House of Lords must break down on disputes as to who shall elect it, or who shall be elected to it, or how it shall be elected.

* * *

THE official proposals for the reform of the Prussian franchise give the measure of Herr Bethmann-Hollweg's quasi-Liberalism. Prince Bülow himself could have done no worse. There is to be no redistribution of seats, though the anomalies are now too flagrant even for satire. There is also to be no secret ballot—the Government will not abandon its power to coerce Civil servants. The three-class system remains, according to which the taxpayers in the first and second classes have, in the aggregate, twice the voting power of those in the third class, who outnumber them in the ratio of twelve to three. There is, indeed, a new method of reckoning votes by percentages, which in no way affects the preponderance of the first two classes. The one concession is that certain categories of citizens, graduates, meritorious civil servants, officers, and elected persons may be "promoted" to a class for which their property would not alone qualify them. The ascendancy of mere wealth is to be reinforced by the accomplishments and the virtues. It remains to be seen whether the Prussian Diet will endorse this humorous essay in reform. There seems to be some prospect that the Centre may join the "Radicals" and the Socialists in demanding at least the secret ballot. On the other hand, it is a little doubtful whether the so-called National Liberals will in that case consent to act with the Centre. The three-class system in any event is safe.

SPAIN has passed during the week through a Cabinet crisis of which the origins are clearer as yet than the consequences. Señor Moret, at the head of a somewhat divided Liberal Party, supported by Republicans and Socialists, tried to revive the anti-clerical policy which was defeated in 1906. He successfully restored the lay schools which had been totally suppressed. He next attempted the bolder task of revising the Concordat in obedience to French precedents. The Vatican haughtily refused to negotiate, but made a direct personal appeal to the King. It is said that he gave the correct constitutional answer, blamed the Papal Nuncio for his refusal to negotiate, vindicated the right of Spain in these circumstances to legislate freely in her own interests, and left the responsibility for their future policy with his Ministers. If this were all, it would be difficult to understand Señor Moret's resignation. But apparently there was simultaneously a revolt among the more aristocratic Liberals. We are not clear, however, whether its motive was sympathy with the Church; it seems to have based itself on hostility to Señor Moret's Republican and Socialist allies. The result has been a fresh Liberal "concentration," with Señor Canalejas as Premier, and Marshal Lopez Domingues as his most conspicuous colleague. Both of them were in the past leading anti-clericals. We do not profess to understand what has happened. We are told that the Vatican has been defeated, yet its responsible enemy has been overthrown. The moderates have upset the Government, yet the new Premier has a past which no moderate can well admire.

* * *

THE expectation that United South Africa would begin its career under a Coalition Ministry has now been sharply dispelled. Mr. Merriman in a public speech has dismissed the idea with the sharpest emphasis. The idea of a coalition, he declared, could have been hatched only in Throgmorton Street. "My idea of a Progressive," he went on to say, with that slightly acid wit which the duller people in South Africa have always resented and dreaded, "is a man who is fond of borrowing money, wants to imitate Australia, and has one eye on South Africa and one eye on the English Stock Exchange." It is probable that the Transvaal Dutch were originally in favor of a less definite policy. Critics point out that General Botha, though he happened to be at the Cape, was not chosen to make this declaration. General Smuts in a later speech has attempted to tone it down. But it is clear that the new Parliament will be chosen after a conflict on the ordinary party lines.

* * *

THE unfortunate Persian Nationalists are at their wits' ends to rid themselves of the Russian troops, which are still, to the number of over three thousand, camped at various points on Persian soil. Their occupation is by no means passive. Punitive expeditions are not infrequent, and the individual Cossack is accused of maltreating Persian civilians. Every rascal in the country, so say the Persian newspapers, has hoisted the Russian flag over his house, and under that symbol defies the law. The Mejliss has questioned the Foreign Secretary on his failure to bring about the withdrawal of the Russian forces. The unhappy man had no answer to give—it is only too obvious that there are no cards which even the adroitest patriot could play—and an adverse vote forced him to resign. Russian opinion is pleased to regard this pathetic protest as a challenge.

* * *

WE discuss the new Indian Press Law elsewhere, but we are glad to note that the debate in the Legislative Council was closed by a speech from Lord Minto announcing the release of the nine British subjects who, fourteen months ago, were deported from their homes in Bengal without being informed of the offence they were supposed to have committed. The Governor-General, in stating the decision of the Indian Government, declared that the position had changed, and that the political movement with which these prisoners were connected had degenerated into an "anarchical plot," with which it could not be supposed that they were connected. It is hard to think that there was no relation between the deportations and the degeneracy in Indian political propaganda of which the Viceroy complains. If there was no such connection, the law of agitation in India follows a different course from that which it follows elsewhere. For the future, at least, we hope that no subjects of the King in India will be deprived of their liberty save through the sentence of a Court of Justice.

* * *

THE "Spectator," in its last issue, chose to express its disbelief in the charges of intimidation of rural voters brought forward in these columns and elsewhere, apparently on the ground that as the writer, when a Liberal, investigated one such charge and found it false, he now, having become a Tory, discredits them all. The question, of course, is one of evidence, and of the wish and capacity to receive and weigh evidence. But in this matter we have some tolerable guides to the truth. Intimidation and attempts to undermine the secrecy of the ballot are alleged by almost every Liberal member and candidate we have met or corresponded with. Intimidation, conveyed in the form of written threats and warnings to dependents, has been openly practised by great territorial magnates like the Duke of Sutherland. Intimidation in the shape of the withdrawal of custom has been admitted and defended by one of the most active of Tory propagandists, whose work should be specially dear to the "Spectator's" heart.

* * *

THIS gentleman, by name Mr. Millar, and by occupation the Secretary of the Liberty and Property Defence League, urged the boycotting of Liberal tradesmen by their Tory customers. Their politics, he said, could be ascertained through the local Conservative agent, and "heads of households" in "transferring their custom" should openly give a political reason. Interviewed by the "Morning Leader," Mr. Millar stated that he "knew" from statements made to him by "many Conservative property owners," that "the withdrawal of custom from Liberal tradesmen has been practised largely." "At my own place in Norfolk," he added, "a friend came to me and asked me where I got my groceries. I did not know, but found out and told him. 'Oh, but that won't do,' he said; 'he's a wrong 'un—a Radical.'" Is this intimidation, or only "moral influence"? The "Spectator" might examine the question.

* * *

WE much regret to record the death of Mr. J. Allanson Picton, who was a frequent contributor to the correspondence columns of THE NATION. Many who do not remember Mr. Picton as a Congregational minister, or even as a Radical member for Leicester, will have been attracted by his brilliant book, "The Mystery of Matter." But his resignation from the ministry of the Congregational Church, and his plea for a non-dogmatic basis for church membership, were sensations of more than thirty years ago, and formed one of the many landmarks of the advance to a broader spirit in Free Church theology and criticism. Mr. Picton's earlier book remained his best, but his "Life of Oliver Cromwell" contains some admirable and eloquent writing.

Politics and Affairs.

THE ONE THING NEEDFUL.

"As for the possibility of the House of Lords preventing ere long a Reform of Parliament, I hold it to be the most absurd notion that ever entered into human imagination. I do not mean to be disrespectful, but the attempt of the Lords to stop the progress of Reform reminds me very forcibly of the great storm at Sidmouth, and of the conduct of the excellent Mrs. Partington on that occasion. In the winter of 1824, there set in a great flood upon that town—the tide rose to an incredible height—the waves rushed in upon the houses, and everything was threatened with destruction. In the midst of this sublime and terrible storm, Dame Partington, who lived upon the beach, was seen at the door of her house with a mop and pattens, trundling her mop, squeezing out the sea water, and vigorously pushing away the Atlantic Ocean. The Atlantic was roused. Mrs. Partington's spirit was up; but I need not tell you that the contest was unequal. The Atlantic Ocean beat Mrs. Partington. She was excellent at a slop or a puddle, but she should not have meddled with a tempest. Gentlemen—be at your ease—be quiet and steady. You will beat Mrs. Partington."—Sydney Smith on the Lords in 1832.

WHAT is it in Liberals that makes their opponents take them for abnormally simple folk? Is it their appearance or their character? Ought we to welcome such an attitude as a moral tribute, or to resent it on the ground that it is anything but an intellectual compliment? Certainly, when our leaders are asked by the "Times" in every other issue, or by the "Spectator," with weekly iteration, not merely to learn from a beaten enemy, but to take their policy and tactics from him, we must assume either that these journals imagine that a new race of Liberal statesmen has arisen, owning no kinship to the virile stock of Bright and Gladstone, or that the ties of honor which bind even the robber chieftain to his "band" have no force as applied to a leader fresh from such a token of confidence as North Britain has given Mr. Asquith. These disinterested counsels are various in form, but they have a single purpose. They suggest that Mr. Asquith is relieved from all obligation to follow the path traced by his predecessor, in the marking out of which he played a leading part. They hint that if he is absolved from adopting Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's principles, he is equally free to desert his own. They advise that the thoughts and plans of three years should go for nothing, or be switched on to the opposite track, and the King, the Lords, and the Commons presented with a new issue, which has little or no relevance to the elections. Next, the Prime Minister is invited to contemplate the weakness of his Parliamentary position. The majority is composite, and unstable; Mr. Hardie may be trusted to upset it, or, if not Mr. Hardie, then Mr. Healy; if not Mr. Healy, then Mr. Redmond. While Mr. Asquith is invited to destroy his party, he is not offered a substitute. He may enter on the "reconstruction" of the House of Lords, on the lines recommended by "A Peer," or "Another Peer," in the columns of the "Times," but let him and Sir Edward Grey beware of anything like "elective" "reconstruction." Thus does Toryism, flattered by the history of the last four years, please itself with the dream that, whether in office or in opposition, it will always remain in power.

Such criticism seems especially insulting to a character so loyal and a mind so steady as Mr. Asquith's, and there is only one aspect of it which deserves consideration. The majority is composite. Mr. Asquith has to deal with the political problem which has faced every German Chancellor since Bismarck, and to adapt his tactics to those on which most European Prime Ministers conduct their Ministries. He has to treat with three separate political organisations, united for certain definite purposes, not entirely united on others. There is no reason to suppose that this is a passing phenomenon in our politics. Exceptional circumstances—the Home Rule split, the South African War, the Tory disruption of 1906—banished it for a few years; but it has recurred, and will recur, for it is an inevitable and general consequence of Western as of British democracy. It betokens no weakening of the essential fibre of Liberalism, which remains both in ability and in governing force the predominant partner of the alliance, and the shaping element in its policy. So long as Home Rule and the organisation of industrial democracy remain unsettled questions, and the three parties agree in the main on their solution, there is a natural and stimulating character in such an association. But in fact the union which binds Liberalism to Nationalism and the Labor Party is direct and simple. It may not be a union for all purposes, but it is emphatically a union on the issue submitted to the electors. In other words, it represents a compact to get rid of the absolute veto of the House of Lords. So, while the Government maintains its own line of battle, it may treat its allies with the measure of confidence which it extends to its more regular followers, and will receive an answering measure of support. Such a degree of co-operation does imply the mutual communication of plans and methods. There is nothing unusual, nothing undignified, in such a "way of life"; it does not suggest the implied falsity under which Mr. Balfour for two years "led" a party acutely divided between Free Trade and Protection, while he gave each faction the impression that he was its friend.

These are tactical issues; but we shall underestimate the strength of the majority if we fail to reckon the impressive moral force which created and sustains it. Behind the Government which, this week and next week, will make or mar the destinies of the country, stand the best half of England and the three nations that have done so much to make England what she is. No statesman with imagination could desire a more admirable and powerful following, especially when he remembers the elements of which his adherents consist. If they are faithfully dealt with, the organised workmen of England, whether they belong to the Labor Party or whether they formally adhere to Liberalism, the flower of the middle-classes, the Scottish farmers and workmen, the Welsh and Irish democracies, will see this quarrel with the Lords through. They are not open to the Protectionist lure, as are the small traders of the Midlands, and they have reached a stage of economic and moral development which puts them outside the petty circles of social pressure that environ the laborers and the dependent classes of southern England. The men who endured year after year of the American Civil war, and put behind them the temptation of slave-grown cotton, will not fail to the call when we reach the next decisive stage in the fight for representative government. Only they must not be met with indecisive or self-conflicting counsels; they must be led up to the redoubt where they were instructed that the force of the enemy lay. No British leader who thus handles his people need fear betrayal by them, whatever their sectional formation may be; and in the shallow manœuvring of papers like the "Times" and the "Spectator," and in the shower of contradictory and complicated proposals for the "reconstruction" of the Upper House which pours from their columns, we have the evidence of the fears that this emergency in our politics arouses in those who provoked it. Those proposals, those perturbations, mean one thing, and one thing only—the knowledge of their authors that the House of Lords cannot be defended, and that, if possible, a new rampart of privilege must be built up in its place. That policy can only succeed if the Liberal Party is induced by weak men on its own side and astute men on the other side to give it sanction and countenance. So long as Liberalism is united for Free Trade and against the veto of the Peers, neither Protection nor the House of Lords has a chance. Let its ranks be divided, or its aim deflected and obscured, and a grave and perhaps fatal approach will have been made to the double but really unified end of securing a tariff through the corrosive action of the Lords on the principles and practice of representative government.

"VETO" OR "REFORM?"

WE complained last week of some Unionist writers who appeared to have a difficulty in realising that a majority of 120 is not the same thing as a minority of 120. We are afraid that this week it is necessary to remonstrate with some of our own friends who, while conscious that they have a majority, seem already to be forgetting the issue upon which that majority was obtained. Yet, as we have often insisted, it is seldom that a leader has so clearly and narrowly defined the question before the electors as Mr. Asquith defined the issue of the late election at the Albert Hall and in his address to his own constituents. The election—we must be forgiven for emphasising the obvious and reiterating the familiar—was fought on the veto of the House of Lords. It was fought on the entire veto, not on finance alone, but on legislation as well. It was not fought on the reform of the House of Lords. It was fought on the supremacy of the House of Commons. Moreover, it was on this issue that it was won. Where we lost, we lost on Tariff Reform. Where we won, we won on the Budget which the Lords had thrown out, and on their right to throw out Budgets and other Bills. The Lords have no backing in the country and no popular force exists as an obstacle to dealing with them. Lastly, the Government had a specific scheme for meeting the situation—a scheme maturely resolved upon after prolonged discussion in 1907, and adhered to during the two-and-a-half years that have since passed. The essence of this scheme was to secure the supremacy of the House of Commons, and it was in this form that the issue was presented to the people by Mr. Asquith.

In the face of these plain facts, we confess ourselves unable to understand the suggestions tentatively put forward by one or two of our Liberal contemporaries in London and the provinces, that the solution of the question between the Houses is to be sought through the reform of the House of Lords. We can quite understand the attitude of anyone who should maintain that this would be ideally the better plan. It is, in fact, the proposal of Sir Edward Grey, who, however, seems to us to have made it clear that there must be a preliminary dealing with the veto. If such a reform were sufficiently democratic, if it included the total abolition of the hereditary principle, and the substitution of a second chamber elected by the present constituencies, differently grouped and purged of the plural voter, it would, considered in itself, have much in its favor. But to those who contemplate such a reform we would put two simple questions. In the first place, do they for a moment suppose that anything so democratic or anything approaching it has any chance of passing into law? Do they consider that any of the social and political forces which will resist the limitation of the veto would be placated by a scheme involving the extinction of the hereditary principle? The "Times," which discusses Sir Edward Grey's proposal, declares emphatically that the Unionist Party will not look at it. But if this be the case, is it not clear that from the moment such a scheme came into existence a process of whittling down would begin, which would gradually strip it of its democratic character, and end by setting up that which all Progressives have feared, a new House of Lords, Conservative and partisan as ever?

But, secondly, we would ask a more pressing and immediate question. What do they suppose that the supporters of the Government and the members of the two allied parties would think of such a change of front, commended, as it is, to them by the appeals of the "Times" and the "Spectator"? The election has been fought on a distinct issue. Not a few doubts have been expressed in the course of the contest as to the sincerity of the Government in dealing with that issue. Everywhere Liberals have stood most stoutly by Mr. Asquith's Albert Hall pledge, and have, on the whole, succeeded in convincing doubters that that pledge would be carried into effect. Some strain may be put on the confidence of those who have given a strictly literal interpretation to Mr. Asquith's words, when they see Ministers remaining in office without assurance of power to deal with the Lords, even for the purpose of passing the Budget and introducing the Anti-Veto Bill. Many Liberals have all along assumed that an understanding existed with the King, and their disappointment at the discovery that no such understanding obtains must be reckoned with. It is fair to take into full consideration the urgency of the public finances and the intrinsic merits and great public importance of the Budget itself. But the natural condition of passing the Budget as the first business of the Session is that the Anti-Veto Bill should be laid on the table without delay, and that on its rejection measures were either taken to force it through or to appeal once more, in one form or another, to the support of the nation. If the Anti-Veto policy be dropped, and the policy of a reformed Second Chamber substituted, the débâcle would be inevitable, immediate, and overwhelming. Ministers have had this question pressing upon them for three years; for more than twelve months they have repeatedly declared it to be the dominant issue; they have devised their own method of dealing with it, have put that method in the forefront of an electoral appeal, and have won the election on the issue formulated by themselves. They cannot be expected to discover at the striking of the twelfth hour that their solution was all along untenable, and that in principle their opponents were in the right. Will our reforming friends picture to themselves the position of an honest Liberal candidate fighting next May or next July the battle over again in the same constituency which was convinced by the cogency of his argument against the Veto in January? What chance, what time, would such a candidate have to convert the electors to an entire change of plan?

If they refuse to look into the future, our contemporaries may deign to cast a glance at the past. How do they conceive that the Campbell-Bannerman scheme was arrived at? It is not an ideal scheme, we have conceded. It is not a perfectly logical scheme. We imagine it was reached as the result of prolonged discussion by the process, we take it, of eliminating constructive schemes which only produced hopeless divergence. As soon as we begin a constitutional reconstruction, we get on to ground on which every man has his own opinion. There are two-chamber men and single-chamber men. All single-chamber men—including, we believe, the bulk of the Labor Party—are united in opposition to any scheme of reform. Among two-chamber men there are Whigs who wish to see a house of Milners and Curzons, and Democrats who think that that would be one degree worse than a house of Lord No Zoos. The Democrats, basing themselves on the Campbell-Bannerman resolution, would be strong enough in this Parliament to wreck a Whig reform. Similarly the Whigs and Tories would destroy a democratic reform. In short, no agreement could be reached on these lines, any more than it could be reached in 1907. In that year it became apparent that agreement was possible only on a preliminary step—the restriction of the veto. It was not, we imagine, supposed that this step would be the last step. It was not to be the final solution of the constitutional problem. It was to realise a condition preliminary to solution. It was seen that while the House of Lords remained in possession, the delicate work of constitution-making was impossible. It was like setting up the machinery of civil government under the guns of the enemy. The first thing was to take the fort, and clear the ground for a further advance. This was the rough logic of the situation, and it remains unaltered, or altered only to be reinforced by all that has passed since June, 1907.

THE PERILS OF THE INDIAN PRESS LAW.

It is characteristic of all experiments in repression, and all systems of exceptional laws, that they lack finality, and grade themselves in a continuous ladder. There is never a final stage in piecemeal coercion short of the total suppression of all civil liberties by martial law. At each step the puzzled and hesitating Government hopes that it has gone far enough, and stops short, astonished at its own moderation. Experience shows that sedition has only deepened into anarchy. But the Government, instead of realising that the coercion itself is a factor in the aggravation, persuades itself that the repression has failed only because it was a half-measure. The patient is visibly worse, and the doctor concludes that he must therefore administer a double dose of the original purge. The experience is as old as history, and its records are a polyglot book. It has its Spanish-Dutch chapter, its Italo-Austrian chapter, its Anglo-Irish chapter, and to-day the weary tale is being told anew in India. There have been more press-laws since the century opened than we care to task our memory to remember. Each was a little more severe than its predecessor. Each was followed, so runs official testimony, by the yet more daring licence of the Press which it sought to curb. And true to all its traditions, the official mind draws the conclusion that a little more of the remedy which has failed must at last produce the desired result. By such a process of reasoning have we reached the Press Law, which was presented, its first official business, to the reformed Imperial Legislative Council last Friday. It is not the end. One can conceive still more drastic laws. This law, as we gather from Sir H. Risley's speech, was based on Austrian models. It is by this mechanism that the Servian Press is reduced to silence in Bosnia. When it has failed there are other models left. There is the censorship by which Russia governs Poland.

The tradition of an inviolable Press is so deeply rooted in the English mind, that it is with reluctance that we bring ourselves to admit any limits to its freedom. But one limit there clearly is. No Government which has anything to fear from sedition can tolerate, if it rules an inflammable race, direct incitements to violence, or outspoken eulogies of crime. It is bound to provide for such offences a calm and impartial tribunal, but it is also bound to punish the offender as it punishes his dupes. The new Press Law departs in two ways from this principle. It makes the executive officer in the first instance the summary judge of all Press offences, and empowers him to confiscate literature, to decree the forfeiture of the printer's surety money, and finally to confiscate the press itself. An appeal lies, indeed, to the High Court, but before it could redress a harsh sentence, the press or the newspaper might find its business ruined. The second departure is the more serious. The common law and the previous exceptional laws have enacted summary processes and severe penalties for direct incitements to murder, violence, or sedition. The new law takes cognisance of wider and subtler offences—offences not as much against public order as against the Government itself. It will henceforward be a sufficient ground for suppressing any publication, that it has sought to stir up "hatred and contempt of Government or of a native prince." There is a sense in which all the writing of an Opposition, if it is vigorous and ruthless, is directed to this end. It is in all constitutional countries the common form of the "Outs" in their warfare against the "Ins." Any appeal to public opinion against the Government, if it is hotly worded, and if the grievances alleged are serious, may be fairly represented as an attempt to bring that Government into hatred and contempt. The more irreconcilable parties in all free countries would frankly avow this intention. "L'Humanité" in Paris, "Vorwärts" in Berlin, and "Justice" (longo intervallo) in London are busied in nothing else but an attempt to bring the government of the "bourgeoisie" into "hatred and contempt." No Irish editor would hesitate for a moment to admit that his ruling passion is to foster such an attitude towards the rule of Dublin Castle. It may be urged that while this phrase is dangerously wide, no Government composed of Englishmen, educated in English traditions, could desire to stretch it to its full and logical implications. But the apologist who urges that defence has omitted to read Sir H. Risley's speech on the Bill. He gave a long catalogue of the sort of criticisms with which he wishes to deal. A few of them, like the charge that the Government poisons the wells, would deserve punishment, if, indeed, they do not rather merit contempt. But in the list are the following proscribed opinions—"that the Government drains the country of its wealth," "that it has destroyed religion by a godless system of education," and "that it allows Indians to be ill-treated in the Colonies." If the Indian Press is forbidden to comment on the economic drain of Indian wealth to England, in pensions, salaries, and dividends, if it may not express an honest conservative prejudice against secular education, if it may not echo the complaints of Lord Curzon himself about the persecution of Indians in the Transvaal, there is an end of any liberty of printing. The newspaper which prefers to exist above ground and in the open will be driven to servility, to silence, or to such hints and periphrases as French journalism was forced to employ in the worst days of the Second Empire. The resolute man will do what the Socialists do in Russia; he will print underground or take to smuggling. The consequence in either case must be an increase of the existing resentment which will be no less formidable because it can find no public vent. The legal liberty to oppose a Government or to subject it to any fundamental criticism has come with this Act to an end. What remains of it in practice will depend on the individual good sense of the Judges of the High Court. The worst consequence of such a suppression of opinion is not that it fosters discontent. It is rather that it makes loyalty inoperative because it renders it perfunctory. If no publication may adopt a tone that is not loyal, the sincerest loyalty is discredited because it is no longer free.

It will be urged that the release of the "deported," or more properly "imprisoned," suspects, which the Viceroy announced on the passage of this Act, is in some degree a counterpoise to the harm which it may do. That is, we fear, an optimistic calculation. To Indians, as to the leader-writer of the "Times," this "alternation of cane and jam" must be very puzzling. A quasi-representative Council is called together amid high hopes of a new era. It is then given the task of forging a snaffle-bit for Indian opinion. The suspects are, indeed, released, but for a reason which seems to condemn the whole policy of repression. Since their arrest, it is said, the movement of which they were leaders has degenerated from the sort of sedition which is frank and moral into a murderous anarchism. If this is a fair rendering of recent events, there could be no harsher verdict on the policy of the Indian Government than that it has itself pronounced. For the implication is that the men who were imprisoned as the source of all the mischief were, in reality, the forces which restrained its more reckless tendencies. And, clearly, a measure of repression which was outside all the regular forms of law, instead of intimidating, has only exasperated the extremists. The Reforms, which seemed so promising when Lord Morley first drafted them, are in some danger of being converted, by the detailed regulations of Simla, into a scheme which no longer moves the Hindoo element to any real measure of hopefulness. The repression which accompanied them stands confessed of failure. There is, in all this, evidence of mediocre statesmanship, on the Indian side, which is of ill augury for the future. An Indian Secretary reforms in vain, if the men who administer are themselves incapable of realising the true character of the task that confronts them. They will not understand that, on the intellectual side at least, the educated India which faces them is their equal in the field of criticism and dialectics. They see stirring about them a proud and assertive national spirit, to which they offer no career and no constructive work worthy of its ambitions. Their intelligence, when they face an audience or pen an official document, does for a moment emancipate itself in theory from the cruder forms of the doctrine of race-subjection. But in all the friction of race with race, and in all the restricted social intercourse of the natives and the invaders, the old tradition survives. It may be a decade, it may be a generation, that will pass before some event occurs which at last makes this uncertain policy finally untenable. The preparation for that inevitable event is too grudging, the process of readjustment is much too slow.

PARTIES IN SOUTH AFRICA.

A SPEECH made a few days ago at Cape Town by Mr. Merriman, repudiating the notion of a coalition Government in the new Union Parliament which will meet next summer, has been received in certain quarters here as if it were a sudden abandonment of an accepted policy of peace in favor of a reversion to a policy of racial strife. There is no particle of truth in such a representation. No responsible leader of the dominant party in the Cape, the Transvaal, or the Orange Free State gave any countenance to the notion of a coalition in which the responsibilities and, we may add, the spoils, of office should be shared among the two groups of politicians who in their several States had been opposing one another all their lives. It is, of course, undeniable that important new issues may arise in the national politics of the country, which may come to divide public opinion upon lines different from those which the narrower State issues hitherto disclosed. If so, we may expect changes to occur in the composition and character of parties. But, until such issues ripen, it is only natural that the parties and policies which have held the field in the separate States should become the basis of the party system in the national Parliament. For that Parliament has received by the Constitution a legacy of most of the important controversies which divided parties in the States. Moreover, as Mr. Merriman pointed out, so far as coalition implied dispensing with the two-party system, upon which the British Parliamentary system has always thriven, it would enfeeble and endanger politics by removing the only effective engine of criticism. If all the great, wise, and eminent men in South Africa were packed into office in the Union Government, is it not likely that their authority would be used to lull the popular mind to a security and apathy which would endanger the Commonwealth? For if the cost of liberty is eternal vigilance, it is surely unwise to imprison in office the most effective watchdogs.

However, it is needless to labor the theoretic disadvantages of a course which was never seriously contemplated by any of the South African statesmen. That the politicians of the beaten party in the Cape and the Transvaal should have fostered the notion of erasing the existing party lines by trading on the new fervor of nationalism, is vieux jeu in politics. Eminent politicians out of office have in this country from time to time proposed to lead a "national" party; practically, the Tory Party is proposing it to-day. So it was natural enough that Dr. Jameson and his financial colleagues in Johannesburg should have sought to put upon the public mind in South Africa and in this country this idea of a coalition Government which should secure for them by amicable agreement what they could not hope to attain by success at the polls. The notion was welcomed here, not merely for the obvious advantage it appeared to secure for the British in South Africa, but because it chimed in with a certain shallow sentimentalism which liked to think that the horror of the war and the concentration camps had passed into eternal oblivion, leaving behind no traces of animosity. So speakers at the Colonial Institute or other centres of Imperialism still continually represent the blood shed in the Boer war as the very cement of national union. History dispels such romantic illusions. There is, indeed, a working measure of genuine goodwill between the white races in South Africa, but that it should have been so strengthened by the events of the last twelve years as to erase all memories of past antagonism, and to reconcile all those differences of material interest and mental valuation which exist between the races, is no other than a paradox. It is far better and safer to face the stubborn facts which underlie South African politics.

The Dutch and the British are still widely sundered by the social and industrial conditions of their lives. The strength of the former lies in agriculture and their widespread hold upon the land, the latter are mostly town-dwellers, engaged in commercial, industrial, and mining enterprise, more concentrated and more mobile in their residence. This economic cleavage may slowly give way, chiefly on the side of a gravitation of the educated Dutch into town life and commerce. But this coincidence of racial with economic demarcation must continue to exert a dominant influence upon politics, both provincial and national, affecting many grave issues of native policy, railroad and fiscal questions. Growing social intercourse, with accompanying intermarriages, the most solid basis of union, cannot be expected to achieve rapid results, unless larger numbers of British settlers can be drawn into rural life in the Transvaal and Orangia. This remedy has hitherto proved impracticable.

It is therefore best to recognise that, for some time to come, the party government for South African politics will run along the familiar lines of racial and economic distribution. This generalisation, however, is subject to one very important qualification. Though Mr. Merriman foreshadows a South African party based upon a common action of the Afrikaner Bond in the Cape, the Unie in Orangia, and Het Volk in the Transvaal, he does not suggest the possibility of actual fusion between the powerful Dutch organisations. For he is well aware that in the future, as in the past, issues are likely to arise in which the Dutch of the Cape will not see eye to eye with those of the Transvaal, and that the members of the Unie in Orangia may range themselves sometimes with one, sometimes with the other State. Geographical position and its related problems of transport have usually furnished the substance of past disputes. These in some measure will survive the Act of Union, and it is likely enough that new issues, relating to native government and territorial rights, may come up and cross the lines of racial division. Indeed, we may trust the astute politicians of the Rand to evolve and foster such issues as may create division in the constituent parts of the South African party. This, we take it, will be a normal duty of the Opposition in the Union Parliament. In any case, the reasonable and legitimate conflicts of interest and of feeling between the Cape and the Transvaal, alike in economic and in constitutional questions, are likely to provide a strong and perhaps a salutary check upon the excess of racialism which might have prevailed had the Dutch used their superior political organisation to enforce a closely welded national policy upon the new Parliament. It must never be forgotten that the most salient fact in South African civilisation is the concentration of national wealth in a few small spots of earth. The possession and working of these national treasures by little cosmopolitan groups of able business men, who must find it necessary constantly to intervene in national politics, will inevitably, as time goes on, give increased prominence in South Africa to those problems of capitalism and labor, wealth and commonwealth, which tend in all advanced industrial nations of the world to swallow up the older and the minor issues.

THE NEXT STEP IN WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.

WE must await exact information as to the effect which the elections have had in increasing or diminishing Parliamentary support for women's suffrage; but though we shall expect to find the friendly majority reduced, we shall be slow to believe that it has been extinguished. Of three elements in the victorious party it is safe to say that Liberalism is still overwhelmingly favorable, that the Labor men are practically unanimous, and that Irish Nationalism yields a clear surplus of votes in favor of reform. The Tory Party was always divided on the question; it will probably remain divided until it sees clearly where its material interests lie. It is more important to discover the real feeling of the new Parliament towards "votes for women." The Liberal majority will necessarily have been chilled by the electoral tactics of the "suffragettes," and by their campaign of petty injuries to Liberal Ministers. But it does not follow that the cause is lost. Behind the "militants" lies a permanent and powerful force of womanhood, with full right to speak for all that is best in the life of their sex. It includes large masses of the manual workers of the country. It speaks for the great body of professional and intellectual women, whose part in the national life grows more important every year, and whose claims to the vote the bulk of their fellow-workers among men long ago conceded. It has unfortunately happened that these women have been practically unheard during the tumults of the last two years. Ministers' ears have been shut to the rational argument, while the battle of physical force, which could only have one end, raged on their doorsteps. This phase of the controversy is over, we hope for ever. With its close, the banishment of women's suffrage to the police courts ceases also. The hostile case is still argued, ably enough, in this quarter or that, but the general intellectual assent of the community to the principle of the suffrage indicates one of the most absolutely finished causes that we know of in politics. Practical difficulties remain; the form of the vote is still a matter of discussion among women themselves and between rival schools of male suffragists. But it is a strong tribute to the moral strength of the case that it has not only survived the worst blows of its friends, but has emerged in a form which statesmen who desire a true representation of the national life are bound to recognise. The argument must clearly be heard again, and the strength of the party behind it fairly tested. Liberal statesmen must see that the demand for the suffrage is no flash in the pan; on their side, women are clearly bound, now that "militant" tactics have been dropped, to show what elements of sober strength they have gathered, from all orders and degrees of their sex, in support of their claim. For these reasons we hope that if the Ministry retains office for any length of time, its chiefs will again be open to the reception of deputations, and to other constitutional methods of discussing a grievance which cannot, after all, be fully and authoritatively argued in a Parliament of men. Liberalism owes a good deal to the part which women have played in its propaganda. We hope that the debt thus incurred will be freely paid to the entire suffrage movement.

MEMBERS AND THEIR MANDATE.

(BY A PARLIAMENTARY CORRESPONDENT.)

ON the eve of the elections, a certain hierarchy of Birmingham exhorted the faithful to inaugurate the New Year with a new Ministry. In a sense, the behest has been fulfilled. Ministers are back with new hearts for their work, and with new instruments to carry it on. Strange to say, a good many of us have yet to realise this elementary truth. On all hands one hears and reads of the obligation imposed on the Government to a spirited course of action by virtue of their supposed dependence on the Nationalist and Labor Parties. People who speak thus are suffering from an illusion, of which, however, they will be happily and completely cured within the next few days. If the Government are dependent more on one party than on another, it is on the Liberal Party, and if able to satisfy that party in the mood in which it is now returning to work out its destiny, they need have no qualms about any other. As in the Budget fight, so in the coming conflict for the supremacy of the Commons, it is Liberalism that will lead. To imagine otherwise is to reveal an innocence of mind only to be dispelled by experience.

"Could you do it again?" inquired a Minister, addressing himself, a few days ago, to one of the sixty Liberal members who have been entrusted to bring back Scotland's answer to the challenge of the Lords. "Yes," was the reply. "Again and yet again—that is, assuming you do your part." From Lancashire comes much the same response. There, too, Liberalism, if its elected spokesmen are not in error, could "do it" again, and perhaps do it even better—granted the hour and the man. But the occasion must be worthy, and the leadership strong, unflinching, and clear. All through the North, as well as, generally, on the lips of the Northern members, the word is for action. Questions of tactics, such as the relative positions to be given to the Finance Bill and the Veto, do not appear to be causing much concern. On the whole, the wish seems to be to get the Budget into a position of security, to exhibit it to the electorate as a tangible and visible token of Liberal triumph, and, not least, to let it work out its own vindication in the eyes of the rural constituencies, deluded as those have been, in too many instances, into an erroneous conception of the aims and precise application of Mr. Lloyd George's great scheme. Shortly, it is now a question, not so much of whether this or that stage should have precedence, as of the precise character of the essential step. On this point the feeling of members representing the great urban centres is unmistakable. Novices and veterans—shrewd old Parliamentary hands as well as the most ardent 'prentice hands—are virtually at one in the demand that Ministers should concentrate on the Veto. In this sense, at least, all, or nearly all, are in favor of the "Veto first" policy. Schemes of reconstitution, even by way of reform, may come afterwards. In any case, urgency can scarcely be pleaded for such experiments, whereas the restriction of the Veto has been shown to be a matter of vital and pressing necessity. And that Liberals in the new Parliament feel it to be so, and desire to join battle rather on this than on any less definite issue, is pretty certain to become manifest as soon as the lists are set.

A fighting policy, some are objecting, may lead to another election within a few months. One is constrained to reply that even this threat seems to have no terrors for the men who will be sitting on the Ministerial benches next week. After all, to quote an expression used by one of them, they must do what they have been sent to do. Usually the Ministerial Party is the defending force, but in this Parliament it must, from the outset and by the nature of things, be in the attitude of the challenger. Moreover, in the opinion of those who will have much to do with settling its destinies, it must act as if prepared to go to the country at any moment. In short, it must concentrate on the Veto, even though everything else be sacrificed. Such sacrifices are sometimes the wisest policy. For instance, Scotland is still waiting for its Land Bills owing to the action of the Lords, or, as the Lords would say, owing to the obstinacy of Ministers in resisting that action. Yet Scotland, though bereft of legislation, visits its wrath, not on the Government, which by assenting to a compromise might have obtained for the people something they did not want, but on the Lords, who, in three successive years, never wearied of renewing this Barmecidean offer. The lesson is plain enough, and one need not labor the moral by extending its application to schemes of House of Lords reform, elective Second Chamber, and so forth. Men fresh from the constituencies may be trusted to "do what they have been sent to do."

To complete this record of reflected impressions, note should be made of the fact that many of Mr. Asquith's supporters, and apparently not a few of his adversaries, are persuaded that the Prime Minister is approaching his task armed with the necessary powers to ensure its success. Perhaps they are right—at all events, they cannot be far wrong in assuming that the Minister at the head of the Government enjoys the confidence of the Crown. Moreover, there is an expectation, still more widely diffused, that from the many difficulties of the situation a statesman of Mr. Asquith's resource and courage will prove himself capable of plucking a certain profit. After all, he has one advantage over his rivals. To him the position may, indeed, be difficult; to them it is plainly impossible.

Life and Letters.

THE POLITICIAN'S SOUL.

THE cynic, whose métier consists in contrasting theories of conduct with practice, thoroughly enjoys himself at election time. Theory shows him the free and independent elector pondering in his equal mind the conflicting claims of various policies as set before him by skilled, impartial exponents, and after full consideration achieving a reasoned judgment which he duly registers upon election day. Practice discloses—well, what you may learn just now by sitting for a couple of evenings in the smoke-room of a party club. So we are invited to believe that the "politics" of a General Election are nothing else than the "art of electioneering," and that this art consists at bottom of playing on the passions and self-interest of the various orders of electors, irrespective of the merits of the cause, so as to "get his vote." The cynic shows you next the career of the politician who, having by these means secured the requisite majority of votes, takes his place in the great council of the nation. There, driven by the necessity of reconciling as he may the pledges given to his constituents with the demands of the party whip, he sacrifices his private judgment and conscience upon the altar of opportunism, and the same arts of "management" which he successfully applied to the electorate are now practised upon him by the "powers above." Nay, should he play the game so well that in due course he attains office, he is no nearer to the sphere in which liberty of thought and conscience have free scope: he must not only subordinate his personal feelings and judgment, but set himself to coerce and cajole lesser politicians. So our cynic warms to his task of exposure. The higher walks of politics substitute a more conscious roguery for dupery, until the master statesman is revealed as the Machiavellian monster who, by manipulating the elaborate instrument, sucks the heart blood of humanity to feed his conception of the State. Thus painted, politics, indeed, appears "a dirty trade," and the politician, what Adam Smith dubbed him, "a crafty and insidious animal."

Such an account of politics needs, of course, no refutation: it carries its own condemnation. If there were really in the elector, the candidate, the member, the official, no real bias in favor of truth, justice, and the public good, if the art of the electioneer, the demagogue, the wire-puller, the whip, were as unmoral and as absolute as was pretended, nothing deserving the name of a State, or even such an organ as a party, could have ever come into existence.

We need not, indeed, discuss so false a view, except so far as it suggests the more relevant question why it is that politics and politicians are terms which tend, in modern times particularly, to gather opprobrium. The theme is not novel, but Professor Pollard, speaking the other day at the Society of Arts, gave fresh point to it in a discourse which served upon the whole as a moral defence of the politician. Dwelling upon the difference between the most developed form of ancient society and our own, he drew attention to the fact that whereas politics virtually absorbed the thoughts and energy of every citizen in such a State as Athens, it plays but a trivial part in the life of the vast majority of our citizens, being delegated as the special function of a little class. This helps to explain part of the opprobrium, both its exaggeration and the tincture of truth it contains. For the passing of politics from a universal pursuit into a particular profession involves, on the one hand, a craft or mystery, and exposes its expert operators to temptations to abuse of power; upon the other, it raises suspicions based on ignorance and directed to exaggerated fear of these abuses. The modicum of truth underlying our cynic's picture explains the special charges usually made against the politician, the "economy of truth" which he is said to practise, and his habit of compromise on matters of principle. The former charge admits, no doubt, of an effective formal rebuttal. One has only to refer to the accepted usages and amenities of social intercourse, to the prevalent arts of advertising and of bargaining in most businesses, for close analogies to every form of suppressio veri or suggestio falsi charged against the politician. Even the diplomatist, "a good man sent to lie abroad for his country's good," differs little, if at all, from the good agent or traveller whose "country" is some line of cotton goods or some insurance policy.

Indeed, up to a certain point there is the same validity in the ethical defence which is set up in the two cases. The rigid moralist who insists that there cannot be a different standard for a man speaking in a public and in a private capacity, that a statesman supporting a policy which he does not privately approve is a liar just as much as if he fabricated a false statement for his private ends, disregards a vital distinction. Professor Pollard brought out this truth by a very forcible example when he reminded his audience that, since a Cabinet Minister was sworn not to reveal the King's counsel, it was evident that circumstances might arise requiring him to utter a formal lie in order not to break his oath. This embodies the essential truth that a politician, in acting as a member of a Cabinet, or even a party, is no longer a private individual bound only by the sanctions of private morality. He becomes a part of a larger composite personality, in which his own personality and the responsibility attaching to it are in a measure merged. Those who tell us so confidently that "the best men" will never enter politics because they will not submit to this sacrifice, speak without warrant. There exists, no doubt, a type of high-minded man who is temperamentally incapable of the sort of moral sacrifice required. But to describe him as "the best man" is to beg the whole question. Indeed, it may be urged that, if he be "the best," an impassable gulf divides ethics and politics, and the latter art, deprived of the finest human sustenance, must ever tend to degradation and decay.

This assumption we refuse to make. On the contrary, history discloses numerous instances of men who have not merely passed through the dust and strife of politics with their standards of private conduct unscathed and unimpaired, but whose personality has been matured and enriched by the very sacrifices which have been imposed upon them by consideration of the larger good of the company with which they acted. The practical ethics of politics is not so much looser than as different from the ethics of the mere individual. The ultimate standards, however, do not differ, though theorists have sometimes defended statecraft as an act of short-sighted national selfishness. The final condemnation of Bismarckism is not that it takes "utility" for its good, and insists that all national conduct is legitimate which makes for that good. Its real intellectual and moral fallacy lies in an interpretation of national utility which leaves out all that counts most in the worth, true power, prosperity, and progress of a nation. A statesman who bends all his efforts to secure, by hard, selfish use of physical force, some narrowly conceived material gains of trade or territory during the present generation, at the cost of antagonising other nations, is not to be blamed for seeking the "good" of his own nation, and applying every method of expediency to attain it. His fault lies in a misconception of the national welfare, of the part which moral forces play in securing it.

There is nothing in the ethics of politics different from the ethics of all human co-operation. Wherever a man enters into stable agreement with his fellows to seek a common end by organised means, he undertakes to act and speak differently from what he would had he not entered this fellowship. He must no longer be judged by the standards rightly applied to him in his "private" life, for in this sphere of life he is no longer a private person but a member of a new moral personality. He may, indeed, be charged with an excessive sacrifice, a "slavery to party," and such partisanship is a real moral danger. So, too, the party or company to which he has attached himself may be chargeable with tyranny, or perfidy, or other vice, and he, as a member, will incur in his social capacity a share of the blame. But the view of political morality which treats the conduct of a Government, a party, or any other company, as if its agents or members had retained all the private liberty and responsibility which they possessed before they entered its service, is manifestly false. Those who are so deeply concerned about the politician's soul should bear in mind this difference between a politician and a mere man.

THE UNDERWORLD OF TIME.

SOMETIMES, for a moment, the curtain of the past is rolled up, the seven seals of its book are loosened, and we are allowed to know more of history than the round number of soldiers with which a general crossed a river, or the succession that brought one crazy voluptuary to follow another upon the Imperial throne. We do not refuse gratitude for what we ordinarily receive. To the general it made all the difference whether he had a thousand soldiers more or less, and to us it makes some. To the Imperial maniac it was of consequence that his predecessor in the government of civilised mankind was slain before him, and for us the information counts for something, too; just as one meets travellers who satisfy an artistic craving by enumerating the columns of a ruined shrine, and seeing that they agree with the guide-book. But it is not often that historians tell us what we really want to know, or that artists will stoop to our questionings. We would willingly go wrong over a thousand or two of those soldiers, if we might catch the language of just one of them as he waded into the river; and how many a simpering Venus would we grind into face-powder if we could follow for just one day the thoughts of a single priest who once guarded her temple! But, occupied with grandeur and beauty, the artists and historians move upon their own elevated plane, and it is only by furtive glimpses that we catch sight of the common and unclean underworld of life, always lumbering along with much the same chaotic noise of hungry desires and incessant labor, of animalism and spiritual aspiration.

One such glimpse we are given in that book of "The Golden Ass," now issued by the Clarendon Press, in Mr. H. E. Butler's English version, but hitherto best known through a chapter in Walter Pater's "Marius," or by William Adlington's sixteenth century rendering, included among "The Tudor Translations." It is a strange and incoherent picture that the book presents. Pater well compares it to a dream: "Story within story—stories with the sudden, unlooked-for changes of dreams." And, as though to suit this dream-like in-consequence, the scene is laid in Thessaly, the natural home of witchcraft—where, in fact, the present writer was laid under a witch's incantation little more than ten years ago, and might have been transformed into heaven knows what, if a remembered passage from this same book of Apuleius had not caused an outburst of laughter that broke the spell only just in time. It is a savage country, running into deep glens of forest and precipitous defiles among the mountains, fit haunt for the robber bands with which the few roads were infested. The region where the Lucius of the book wandered, either as man, or after his own curiosity into mysterious things had converted him into an ass (whereas he had wished to become a beautiful bird)—the region recalls some wild picture of Salvator Rosa's. We are surrounded by gloomy shades, sepulchral caverns, and trees writhing in storm, nor are cut-throat bandits ever far away. Violence and murder threaten at every turn. Through the narrow and filthy streets young noblemen, flown with wine, storm at midnight. When a robber chief is nailed through the hand to a door, his devoted followers hew off his arm to set him free. They capture girls for ransom, and sell them to panders. When one is troublesome, they propose to sew her up in the paunch of the yet living ass, and expose her to the midday sun. One of the gang, disguised as a bear, slays all his keepers, and is himself torn in pieces by men and dogs. All the band are finally slaughtered or flung from precipices. Gladiatorial beasts are kept as sepulchres for criminals. A slave is smeared with honey and slowly devoured by ants till only his white skeleton remains tied to a tree. A dragon eats one of the party, quite cursorily. What with bears, wolves, wild boars, and savage dogs, each step in life would seem a peril, were not the cruelty of man more perilous still. Continued existence in that region was, indeed, so insecure, that men and women in large numbers ended the torments of anxiety by cutting it short.

And then there were the witches, perpetually adding to the uncertainty by rendering it dubious in what form one might awake, if one awoke at all. During sleep, a witch could draw the heart out through a hole in the neck, and, stopping up the orifice with a sponge, allow her victim to pine in wonder why he felt so incomplete. With ointments compounded of dead men's flesh she could transform a lover into a beaver, or an innkeeper into a frog swimming in his own vat of wine and with doleful croak inviting his former customers to drink; or herself, with the aid of a little shaking, she could convert into a feathered owl uttering a queasy note as it flitted out of the window. Indeed, the whole of nature was uncertain, especially if disaster impended, and sometimes a chicken would be born without the formality of an egg, or a bottomless abyss spurted with gore under the dining-room table, or the wine began to boil in the bottles, or a green frog leapt out of the sheepdog's mouth.

So life was a little trying, a little perplexing; but it afforded wide scope for curiosity, and Apuleius, an African, brought up in Athens and living in Rome, was endlessly curious. In his attraction to horrors, to bloodshed, and the shudder of grisly phantoms there was, perhaps, something of the man of peace. It is only the unwarlike citizen who could delight in imagining a brigand nurtured from babyhood on human blood. He was, indeed, writing in the very period which the historian has fixed upon as the happiest and most prosperous that the human race has ever enjoyed—those two or three benign generations when, under the Antonines, provincials combined with Romans in celebrating "the increasing splendors of the cities, the beautiful face of the country, cultivated and adorned like an immense garden, and the long festival of peace, which was enjoyed by so many nations, forgetful of their ancient animosities, and delivered from the apprehension of future danger." The slow and secret poison that Gibbon says was introduced by the long peace into the vitals of the Empire, was, perhaps, among the causes that turned the thoughts of Apuleius to scenes of violence and terror—to the "macabre," as Pater said—just as it touched his style with the preciousness of decadence, and prompted him to occupy a page with rapture over the "swift lightnings" flashed against the sunlight from women's hair. He was, in fact, writing for citizens much like the English of twenty years ago, when the interest of readers, protected from the harsh realities of danger and anxiety, was flattered equally by bloodthirsty slaughters, the shimmer of veiled radiance, and haunted passages to the unknown gods.

Those passages to unknown gods were much affected by Apuleius himself. The world was at the slack, waiting, as it were, for the next tide to flow, and seldom has religion been so powerless or religions so many. Of one abandoned woman it is told as the climax of her other wickednesses that she blasphemously proclaimed her belief in one god only. Apuleius seems to have been initiated into every cult of religious mystery, and in his story he exultingly shows us the dog-faced gods of Egypt triumphing on the soil that Apollo and Athene had blessed. Here was Anubis, their messenger, and unconquered Osiris, supreme father of gods, and one whose emblem no mortal tongue might expound. It was at the great procession of Isis through a Greek city that the ass was at last able, after unutterable sufferings, to devour the chaplet of roses destined to restore him to human shape; and thereupon he took the vows of chastity and abstinence (so difficult for him to observe) until at length he was worthy to be initiated into the mysteries of the goddess, and, in his own words, "drew nigh to the confines of death, trod the threshold of Proserpine, was borne through all the elements, and returned to earth again, saw the sun gleaming with bright splendor at dead of night, approached the gods above, and the gods below, and worshipped them face to face."

It was this redemption by roses, and the initiation into virtue's path, that caused Adlington in his introduction to call the book a figure of man's life, egging mortal men forward from their asinal form to their human and perfect shape, that so they might take a pattern to regenerate their lives from brutish and beastly custom. And, indeed, the book is, in a wider sense, the figure of man's life, for almost alone among the writings of antiquity it reveals to us every phase of that dim underworld which persists, as we have supposed, almost unnoticed and unchanged from one generation of man to another, and takes little account either of government, the arts, or the other interests of intellectual classes. It is a world of incessant toil and primitive passion, yet laughter has place in it, and Apuleius shows us how two slave cooks could laugh as they peered through a chink at their ass carefully selecting the choicest dainties from the table; and how the whole populace of a country town roared with delight at the trial of a man who thought he had killed three thieves, but had really stuck three wine skins; and how the ass in his distress appealed unto Cæsar for the rights of a Roman citizen, but could get no further with his best Greek than "O!" It is a world of violence and obscenity and laughter, but, above all, a world of pity. Virgil, too, was touched with the pity of mortal things, but towards the poor and the laboring man he rather affected a pastoral envy. Apuleius had looked poverty nearer in the eyes, and he knew the piteous terror on its face. To him we must turn if we would know how the poor lived in the happiest and most prosperous age that mankind has enjoyed. In the course of his adventures, the ass was sold to a mill—a great flour factory employing numerous hands—and, with his usual curiosity, he there observed, as he says, the way in which that loathsome workshop was conducted:—

"What stunted little men met my eye, their skin all striped with livid scars, their backs a mass of sores, with tattered patchwork clothing that gave them shade rather than covering! . . . Letters were branded on their foreheads, their heads were half shaven, iron rings were welded about their ankles, they were hideously pale, and the smoky darkness of that steaming, gloomy den had ulcerated their eyelids: their sight was impaired, and their bodies smeared and filthy white with the powdered meal, making them look like boxers who sprinkle themselves with dust before they fight."

Even to animals the same pity for their sufferings is extended—a pity unusual among the ancients, and still hardly known around the Mediterranean. Yet Apuleius counted the sorrows of the ill-used ass, and, speaking of the same flour mill, he describes the old mules and pack-horses laboring there, with drooping heads, their necks swollen with gangrenes and putrid sores, their nostrils panting with the harsh cough that continually racked them, their chests ulcerated by the ceaseless rubbing of their hempen harness, their hoofs swollen to an enormous size as the result of their long journeys round the mill, their ribs laid bare even to the bone by their endless floggings, and all their hides rough with the scab of neglect and decay.

The first writer of the modern novel—first of romanticists—Apuleius has been called. Romance! If we must make these rather futile distinctions, it is as the first of realists that we would remember him. For, as in a dream, he has shown us the actual life that mankind led in the temple, the workshop, the marketplace, and the forest, during the century after the Apostles died. And we find it much the same as the actual life of toiling mankind in all ages—full of unwelcome labor and suffering and continual apprehension, haunted by ghostly fears and self-imagined horrors, but illuminated by sudden laughter, and continually goaded on by an inexplicable desire to submit itself to that hard service of perfection under which, as the priest of the goddess informed Lucius in the story, man may perceive most fully the greatness of his liberty.

CARLYLE THE POET.

CARLYLE commended "the French Revolution" to his readers "that all men may know what are the heights and depths which are still in man." It is as a revelation of these "heights and depths" that his work stands to-day imperishable in literature. Mr. A. W. Evans, in his admirable introduction to a volume of well-chosen selections ("Carlyle," Masters of Literature Series: George Bell), reminds us of the distinction drawn by Huxley between his attitude and that of Tyndall. Tyndall "was disposed to regard Carlyle as a great teacher. I," said Huxley, "was rather inclined to take him as a great tonic." The time when Carlyle was regarded as a great teacher has long gone by. He has passed from the category of the preachers into that of the poets. He had, indeed, no teaching to give, though he preached, with fury and eloquent appeal, for nearly eighty years. He exhorted his hearers to "do the duty which lies nearest to them." If they asked him what that duty was, he called them blockheads. If they asked him why they should do it, he called them swine. A peasant, he despised the city peoples, with their facile, short-sighted enjoyments. A man of simplicity who had fought his way into intellectual supremacy, he condemned those whose strength failed to carry them through so arduous an enterprise. And he swept away in collective contempt as "the mob," "Democracy," the crowd, all who had never possessed ambition enough to essay the journey, or energy to attain that journey's end. He fought bitterly and scornfully against the best of that strange century in which he lived. He thought that meat was more than life and raiment than body. An effort towards freedom was to him an effort towards the consumption of the East wind. For Mazzini and his labors for the making of a United Italy from the inspiration of an Idea, he entertained a kind of contemptuous affection: seeing him drifting, an "ineffectual angel," through a world of iron purposes. Yet United Italy came; and so came also many other historic transformations outside the region of Carlyle's philosophy. Ragged men or great business communities felt new fire within them for an "Idea"—the Ideas of Liberty or Equality or Democracy which he despised so heartily—and in the strength of that fire were able successfully to exhort mountains to be removed, and to be cast into the midst of the sea. Lord Acton, who loved freedom and the struggle for it with a kind of personal passion, thought Carlyle, after Froude, the "most detestable of historians." His "honey" has been carried into the "aristocratic hive." His ideal of a nation was something near that of the dominant classes in the German Empire to-day, of some Poor Law reformers of yesterday or to-morrow. Men, regimented and drilled by an aristocracy of birth, breeding, and intellect, are to be sorted, classified, ticketed, driven by whip and goad into cleanliness and godliness and some measure of efficiency in the great revolving machine of a State hierarchy. All that is asked of the "horde" is, not "Government," but acquiescence—"consent" in dumb, patient fashion to let the efficient rule. Of Democracy as a mystic, sacred thing, of Liberty as an end in itself, and not merely as a means towards comfort or piety, he knew nothing at all. That is why, for all the magic splendor of his pictures of individual achievement, his "French Revolution" is so remote from a philosophy of history. He sees the "social movement" arising from discontent and boundless privation. He ascribes the Revolution to the misery of the peasants, and the misery of the peasants to absentee landlordism and luxurious expenditure at the Court. He thinks that if the landlords had maintained a just feudal rule, in strict hierarchical system, and if the peasants had been fed, no Revolution would have happened at all. He never saw that the Revolution was a child as much of Hope as of Despair, and that here also an idea was clothing itself in form and making the rocks dance at its advent in the world. So the fight for American unity and the liberation of the slave became for him merely cant and Quashee; and the admittance of the artisans of England into Government "shooting Niagara"; and the progress of the people in the second half of the nineteenth century, with widening education and an increasing standard of life, was hailed as "torpid, gluttonous, sooty, swollen, and squalid England, given up to the deaf stupidities, and to the fatalities that follow, likewise deaf."

It arose partly out of spiritual blindness, which saw only the worshipful man—the hero—as worthy of adoration; the spiritual blindness which terminated in the exaltation by others of the Superman. It arose partly also out of a great impatience with life's stupidities and futilities, and progress so long delayed, man's strength spent, and seemingly in vain. Tortured by bodily pains, "like a rat gnawing at the pit of his stomach," he was tormented no less by similar maladies of the soul. The rat was gnawing there also, exciting to fury as he looked out on the world of men, and saw how it was marred and ruined by folly triumphant, and incurable cowardice and ease. Mr. Evans, in kindly verdict, explains the former judgment, as blinded just by the glory of the individual, so commanding and desirable as to flare out, dazzling, against a grey indistinguished background of negligible lives. "His admiration for inspired men overwhelmed his belief in the inspiration of humanity, and led him to think that, provided a people went the right road, it mattered little whether they were driven or whether they chose it for themselves." In any case, his Social Utopia is shattered by all human experience. His Ireland, which would be justly ruled by the iron hand of alien authority, his fox-hunting squires, who are to give up their hunting (where, perhaps, they are doing least harm) to reorganise a beneficent feudalism, his Captains of Industry and regiments of Labor—the wind has blown them all away, into the region where Dr. Francia and his ideal Absolutism, and all similar Dr. Francias have been driven before man's demand for freedom. Anarchs would wander through the streets of his Empire of hierarchical efficiency and bring it all tumbling to the ground; such anarchists as exultations and agonies, and love, and man's unconquerable mind.

Turn from Carlyle, preacher and social reformer, to Carlyle, mystic and poet: you are passing from barren lands into a large and spacious kingdom. This man had the quality of enchantment about him, so that under his touch the daily experience of mankind became an apocalypse, and every common bush was burning with fire. He set the human story in the background of all the Eternities. He found life not dwarfed by this vast encompassing background, but adequate to its high challenge; lifted out of the dust, able to move easily in a region of supreme issues. The background became, of necessity, mystic. Duty ceased to be the trodden way of an ephemeral race, but somehow kindled and inspired by a sense of countless influences and expansions amid a region secure from the triumph of time. Mankind, as in the great central passage of the "Sartor," is "marching from the fire origins of the visible universe to its fire consummation; 'like some wild flaming, wild thundering train of Heaven's artillery,' levelling earth's mountains and filling up her seas; marching, also, 'from mystery to mystery, from God and to God.'" That God is sometimes the Spirit behind the visible things, weaving at the roaring loom of time, sometimes the God of Mount Sinai, visible in lightnings and thunders, sometimes "the ancient elemental powers" who have fixed in "adamantine rigor" the laws of the life and death of nations, and who are "entirely careless how you vote." He makes no attempt to reconcile these conceptions of Deity. In "Sartor" the first is dominant, in his visions of history, the third. His is not here that God who declares His Almighty Power most chiefly in showing mercy and pity. His is the God who will put a hook in the mouth of the King of Assyria and turn him whither He will, who will destroy in one night the armies of Sennacherib, outside the holy hill of Sion, to whom the Song of Miriam is appropriate praise, exultant over the Egyptians lying dead by the sea shore. Above all, his is a God of Flame, a Man of War. Carlyle's test of all religions would be found in the traditional challenge on Mount Carmel. Build you here your altars: there build you yours. Call upon the Deities of your worship, with strong crying and sacrifice, and the "God who by fire shall answer, let Him be the God." The answer by fire was the only valid reply. His favorite hero, Ram Dass, had enough fire in his belly to burn up the sins of the whole world. That fire came to be his test of character also. All his heroes have it—Dante, Burns, Cromwell, Mirabeau—fire restrained, smouldering, choked down, only occasionally revealed; or fire flaming out into sudden action which leaves the world amazed.

"He is warming his hands by the fire of life," wrote Maurice of another, "but it will never burn or scorch him in the least." Were it otherwise, "the fire would be in his heart while he was arranging his knick-knacks and watering his flowers, and it would come out, though it burnt up the pretty cottage and garden and church, and all Borrowdale and Derwentwater." Carlyle never warmed his hands at the fire of life. The fire was in him, and it burnt up more than Borrowdale and Derwentwater. It came out in the drawing-rooms of Mid-Victorian England, with the pictures of Queen Victoria being welcomed by Louis Napoleon, and the be-whiskered heroes of the Crimean War under the Whig supremacy. In politics, he would be a Tory or a Radical, never a Whig; the coldness, the restraint, the moderation, the respectabilities, goaded him into madness. In religion, he saw the fire dying on the altars, a conventional rule of accepted morality replacing all the high ardors and aspirations. "Dust and ashes," he wrote over it all. Mill's luminous fairnesses and justices drove him into opposition; Emerson's rarified wisdom left him cold. He turned from all this appeal to reason on the heights, in order to sing the praise of those who fought in confusion far below, to those who had stormed through life, huge, shaggy, uncouth, passionate, but at whose advent the solid ground had shook and shifted a little. Mirabeau, in unforgettable picture, stands as the very type of his heroes, and the death of Mirabeau is the passage which one would choose of all others, to reveal the temper of the genius of Carlyle. His Puritan prejudice disapproved of all the spirit and action of this man—his lusts and excesses, his disorder of body and soul, his vanity and extravagance and display. But he is a Titan, fire-flaming, defiant to the last. "The giant Mirabeau walks in darkness; companionless on wild ways." "If I had not lived with him, I never should have known what a man can make of one day." "I carry in my heart the death-dirge of the French monarchy." He dies "a gigantic Heathen, stumbling blindly, undismayed, down to his rest." In future, "when difficult questions are astir, all eyes will turn mechanically to the place where Mirabeau sat: and Mirabeau is absent now."

So he is one of the very few adequate to the painting of Revolutions, to the time when visibly the sun has been turned into darkness and the moon into blood and there has been loosened over earth and sea the thunder of the trumpets of the night. His endeavor was to exhibit this vision of reality, not only in those cataclysms when all men should be afraid, but in the ordinary experiences of every day: the world Phoenix, always consumed in fire; always in fire being born. Men turned reluctant from the glare of it, hoping to find in social amusement and various feeble charities escape from that conspicuous flame. He told them of the futility of such an effort, so often essayed, so often destroyed. He revealed beneath the thin surface on which were built the transitory palaces and banking houses and suburban villas, the untamed, ancient, elemental fires. He knew that all history is a record of combat, that human life only becomes tolerable under the impetus of action. He knew (in a word) that the passage from a fire cradle to a fire consummation is, in plain truth, a passage from God and to God.

THE BIRD-PLAY.

THERE is nothing new even in Paris. Before Rostand there was Aristophanes, and the birds which displayed their plumage at the Porte-Saint-Martin had fluttered and sung two thousand years before under the rock of the Acropolis. With a whirr of wings and a sheen of plumage, mixing Greek words among their twitterings and their cries, they had fled into the Orchestra at a première which Athens must have awaited as eagerly as Paris looked for "Chantecler." There are stray lines in the text of "The Birds," and notes in the scholia, which tell us even now that this antique experiment was thought in its day to be a unique adventure in stagecraft. Genius, even in Greece, did not always shrink from enlisting money on its side, and Aristophanes, like Rostand, belonged to the side which had the money. He had recruited for his troupe a famous woman flute-player, who was to make her first appearance in Athens in his chorus, apparently as the nightingale. Gossip boasted in the baths and the agora of the untold sums which had been lavished on the feathered dresses of the actors, precisely in the strain which the "Matin" and the "Figaro" have made so dismally familiar. The climax, the triumph of the whole amazing show was a realistic use of stage-thunder, heralded with bombast, and acclaimed in choruses, something apparently new and wonderful, an innovation in the mechanics of the theatre. But it would be difficult to push the comparison beyond these externals. Rostand's farmyard, for all its romances and its allegories, is a home of realism. The birds of Aristophanes were engaged in building a cloud-cuckoo-city. The creatures of the French farmyard are depicted as beings with a separate and autonomous life of their own. The Greek birds, on the other hand, to borrow the Looking-Glass phrase, are only things in Aristophanes's dream. Their king is a human prince metamorphosed into a hoopoe, and they are, throughout the graceful and ingenious farce, only a chorus which comments on the doings of actors who are either human or divine. The play is by turns a satire on Athenian institutions and a reckless comedy at the expense of Athenian religion, but a sub-human drama it never for a moment is. The chorus may flutter its wings and mingle bird-cries with its moralisings, but it is, after all, only a commentary on human affairs, a vehicle for literary satire and political suggestion. It never had entered the brain of Aristophanes to treat his birds as creatures interesting in themselves. His human hero does, indeed, propose to lead and organise them for the coercion of the earth and the confounding of the gods. But it is of the essence of the comedy that he interrupts his plot to make a savory bird-stew with that peculiarly appetising sauce which Heracles found so irresistible. His birds are not so much dramatis personæ as items in a menu.

Aristophanes was the very type of the sophisticated literary man who lisped in parodies and sang quotations. But it is a primitive tradition which Rostand has revived. He has done with art what the fabulists did naïvely. The essence of Æsop and his spiritual kinsmen in all ages and nations is that they were really interested in the characterisation of their birds and beasts. These are not men in masks and skins. They are the fellow-creatures whom primitive men observed and considered with a sympathy and an interest not yet distorted by the arrogance of the rational biped. The tradition reappears in all primitive literatures. It revels through some of the French fabliaux. It has its modern classic in "Uncle Remus," where memories of African animism and totemism have translated themselves into the language of the Christian English-speaking negro. The fund of wisdom that made these tales must be older by whole epochs than any literature, older even than any language which has survived. It seems to date from a time when man, himself a hunter, competed with the larger carnivora in the chase. He knew the beasts as formidable enemies, whom he did not affect to despise. He could not match their strength. He recognised in some of them a cunning like his own. He did not disdain to wear their skins, and to rob them for his own adorning. He shared with them the fortune of the weather, and faced with them the malice of the seasons. He had no pride of reason, for he conceived of thought and will as the function of everything which seemed to act and move. So far from despising the "brute" beasts, he did not even despise the inanimate stone. He lived in a democratic community, with no suspicion that any impassable gulf separated him from the creatures of instinct. It was in no vein of symbolism or allegory that he took this beast or the other for the ancestor of his tribe, consecrated it as a totem, and worshipped it as divine. The primeval fables of the beasts grew up while this kindly sense of equality still lingered. The wolf or the bear which spoke in the savage tale was not for the original fabulist an unreasoning beast which he consciously personified by a sort of literary fiction. It was the ancestor of his clan, which he venerated with divine honors. The conviction that the animal is hopelessly inferior to man must have dawned about the time that Artemis evolved from a bear-totem into a huntress-goddess, accompanied by a symbolic bear, while the owl-eyed Athene developed from a bird-totem into the spirit of wisdom associated with a heraldic owl. The memory of the stage through which his savage ancestors had passed vanished utterly from the traditions of civilised man. His mythology was an elaborate theory, formed to explain the symbols and ritual which had become, for him, unintelligible. He even inverted the historic process. The beast totem evolved into the anthropomorphic god. Mythology turned the development upside down, by fairy tales in which the god was metamorphosed into the beast. But in folk-lore and peasant fable the relics of the kindly consanguinity still survived. Nurses told tales of the days when the beasts could talk, little guessing that in sober history there really was a phase when man as yet claimed for himself no supremacy, and affected no aloofness. The wheel of thought in our own day has turned full circle. Man was never further from the beasts than when Descartes based a system on self-consciousness, and taught in bald, literal words that the animals are automata. The doctrine of evolution has bridged the gulf once more, and inscribed the abolitionists' legend, Ab uno sanguine, over all our thinking about the beasts. We do not naïvely conceive of them, as the first fabulists must have done, as our equals, our fellows, if not our ancestors. But they are once more for us the possible persons of a drama whose obscure passions and dim reasonings we can follow with a distant sympathy.

The primitive beast-fable had always its moral, and Rostand's play is true to type. Theirs was the pedestrian wisdom of daily experience. He has taken for his theme a parable which makes of his poem a profound and moving commentary on life. The critics see in his Chantecler the national totem, the Gallic cock. They are proud to recognise and adopt the pathetic megalomania of the bird who imagines that it is his crowing which commands the dawn. The parable has certainly its bearing on French history. The Gallic cock began to indulge in this conviction under the "Roi Soleil." He was more than ever convinced of it when his crowing became a democratic reveillé at the Revolution. Nor was he by any means alone in that conviction. The woodland birds who fluttered to his farmyard were quite of his mind. The birds of darkness and reaction fostered his self-esteem by conspiring against the sun in his person. And did not Karl Marx say in 1848 that it was the crowing of the Gallic cock which would compel the social revolution? It may have been that this and no more than this was what Rostand had in his mind when he traced the grandeur and disillusionment of Chantecler. But the moral has a wider application. Chantecler is magnificently French, but he is also simply human. This cock who conceives that the sun rises at his summons, what is he but the human race which saw in its earth the centre of the universe, made its gods in its own image, and dreamed that all creation was a design for its own perfection and fulfilment? Chantecler was the author of the Ptolemaic system; he wrote the "Essay on Man"; he composed Paley's "Evidences." He is the name of every prophet and thinker, from the great Leibnitz to drunken Christopher Sly, who conceived of himself and his kind as the centre of the solar system. The disillusionment began with the uncomfortable discoveries of one Copernicus; it was completed by Darwin. And the human Chantecler, his world-romance over, convinced at last that he is but an item and a detail in the goings and comings of the sun, has fluttered back to the positive task of being master in his own farmyard. The world is agreed that Voltaire was the most French of Frenchmen. It divides the honor to-day between Rostand and Anatole France. They say that megalomania is the national vice. One is forced to the conclusion that typical Frenchmen come into the world to protest against the national vice. For the moral of "Chantecler" is the moral of "Candide." It is on the disastrous morning when the sun has risen with its usual imperturbable punctuality despite the fact that one has forgotten to crow, that one first resolves to cultivate one's own garden. What is really French is not so much the megalomania as the sanity which follows it.

The Drama.

MR. FROHMAN'S REPERTORY THEATRE.

ON Monday week, the 21st of February, London will again, after nearly fifty years, possess a Repertory Theatre. On that night Mr. Charles Frohman opens, at the Duke of York's, an enterprise which, whatever its success—and its chances are excellent—will always be accounted to him for righteousness. The programme for the first three weeks is already settled and published. Of its individual components I shall speak anon; for the moment it is to their arrangement and sequence that I call attention. In the course of twenty-four performances four different bills will be presented—three whole-evening plays, and one triple bill consisting of three one-act pieces. In the first week two different bills will be presented, and one new bill in each of the succeeding weeks. In no case will a bill be presented more than twice running. If we call the four bills A, B, C, and D, their sequence may be briefly and clearly shown thus: A, A, B, A, A, B, B, A, B, C, A, A, C, B, C, B, C, B, D, B, A, A, D, C. It is in this sequence, or something like it, that the essence of the repertory system lies. The management, indeed, has shown some austerity in denying itself the convenience of three or even four consecutive performances, in which it might have indulged without infringing the principle of the system. For example, the first week might have been arranged thus: A, A, A, A, B, B, B, B; the first play running from the Monday evening to the Thursday matinée, the second from the Thursday to the Saturday evening. There would have been no absolute objection of principle to such an arrangement, which would have meant some economy of labor in the mounting and unmounting of scenery. But since it was found possible to carry out the method of more rapid alternation, it was vastly preferable to do so. Whatever else Mr. Frohman may "present," he here presents a perfect object-lesson in the marshalling of a repertory.

Now, the point to which I would draw special attention is that (opera apart) we have had no such enterprise as this in London for close upon fifty years. The last real Repertory Theatre—the last theatre which made a principle and practice of constant changes of bill—was Sadler's Wells, under Samuel Phelps. Of Phelps's management it has been written:—

"From May 27th, 1844, until March 15th, 1862, Phelps maintained the most gallant battle in English theatrical history, indomitably snatching success out of the very jaws of failure. In these eighteen seasons, he produced thirty-one out of the thirty-seven plays of Shakespeare. . . . Shakespeare's text was, in all cases, freed from eighteenth-century improvements, a purgation which even Macready had left very incomplete. . . . Not only Shakespeare, but Webster, Beaumont and Fletcher, Massinger, Otway, Macklin, Goldsmith, Sheridan, and many other classic playwrights, found a place in the repertory; while of the moderns, Milman, Shiel, Knowles, Talfourd, Leigh Hunt, Bulwer, Browning, Westland Marston, James White and Tom Taylor, all had their turn. 'Louis XI.' was the only adaptation from the French admitted to the Islington stage, unless we refer 'The Fool's Revenge' to Victor Hugo rather than to Tom Taylor. . . . Phelps humanised and educated his suburban audiences, and he earned the respect of all intelligent men."

At the same time Charles Kean, in his spectacular productions at the Princess's, was yielding without a struggle to the economic pressure which begot the long run and has shaped the history of the London stage for half a century. That the long run has been an unmixed evil I am far from maintaining; but, whatever merits we may allow it, we know that "one good custom may corrupt the world." Long-run theatres will always exist in vast centres of population. They are to be found in Paris, Berlin, Vienna, no less than in London. The mischief is that London alone has yielded itself up entirely to this "one custom," whether good or bad. It had none of the theatrical endowments whereby certain theatres, in the other great capitals, were enabled to resist the economic forces that crushed out every form of theatrical art which had not the making of a sensational success or "boom" in it. The lack of endowment has still to be deplored, though measures are being taken to remedy it. Meantime, with the rise of a new generation of playwrights, too delicate in their effects and too subtle in their criticism of life to appeal to what may be called the hundred-night public, it has become more and more apparent, for the past ten years, that some loophole of escape from the long run must be discovered, else the movement would stagnate and come to naught. Various attempts have been made, with varying degrees of success, to provide such a safety-valve; but it has been reserved for that ever enterprising and sportsmanlike manager, Mr. Charles Frohman, to essay the foundation of a true Repertory Theatre.

Previous efforts in this direction have, for the most part, taken the form of "side-show" enterprises, like the Stage Society, very useful and praiseworthy, but exceedingly restricted in their appeal. We have seen, however, one spirited attempt to fight the long run, not by private co-operation, but in the open market, so to speak—I mean, of course, the ever-memorable Vedrenne-Barker management at the Court Theatre. Wherein does Mr. Frohman's enterprise differ from this? Simply in being—what its predecessor was not—a Repertory Theatre. Messrs. Vedrenne and Barker had not the resources to enable them to work on the true repertory system. They had not a large enough stage, a large enough company, or a large enough staff. What they did was, by an immense expenditure of energy and at a great sacrifice of pecuniary profit, to carry on for three seasons a most interesting short-run enterprise. But a short-run system—the policy of mapping out a season into periods of from four to six weeks, and declining to run a play beyond its stated term—is artistically unsatisfactory and financially unsound. It involves two evils: taking off a paying play at the height of its vogue, which can scarcely ever be recaptured on revival; and running an unremunerative production through its stated term, on pain of upsetting arrangements and confessing failure. The true repertory system avoids both these evils. It enables a successful play to be repeated three or four times a week until an indefinite number of performances has been attained; while an unsuccessful play can simply fade out of the bills, when the management has assured itself that it is not going to prove attractive. The system of constant alternation secures elasticity and adaptability. Relying on the interest of novelty, Mr. Frohman has announced his programme for three weeks ahead; but under normal conditions, I imagine, the management would scarcely bind itself for more than a fortnight. Many of the great Continental theatres do not announce their repertory for more than a week in advance.

It would be foolish to deny that Mr. Frohman's undertaking will have serious difficulties to contend with. The first and greatest is the difficulty of running a repertory in a theatre constructed with a view to long runs. That was the rock on which Mr. Herbert Trench's ambition foundered. Having set forth to establish the first English repertory theatre, why did Mr. Trench abandon the effort from the very outset, and content himself with becoming a very intelligent and successful long-run manager? Mainly, if not entirely, because he had not at his command the mechanism for running a repertory as he conceived it. The idea of alternating "King Lear," "Don," and "The Blue Bird" at the Haymarket proved to be wildly impossible; and even if he had chosen to restrict himself to more manageable plays than the first and last of these three, it is doubtful whether he could have secured the technical assistance which would alone have enabled him to deal with so difficult a problem. Mr. Frohman, on the other hand, has at the head of his technical staff the two men of all others most competent to grapple with the difficulties of the situation—Mr. Dion Boucicault and Mr. Granville Barker. They have their work cut out for them, but they will do it. After all, when once a start is fairly made, the work will be no heavier than that which fell on Mr. Barker alone at the Court Theatre.

I shall not enlarge on the advantages which Mr. Frohman possesses in the fact that he has so many other enterprises to feed, and (as is proved by the remarkable company he has recruited) so many actors and actresses at his command. But one has only to look at his opening announcement to realise one great advantage which the Repertory Theatre possesses, as compared with the Vedrenne-Barker management, in the far larger stock of probably remunerative matter that it has to draw upon. At the Court, Mr. Bernard Shaw was the financial pillar of the house. He was not the only author who paid, but the only author who paid largely and steadily. On the Duke of York's list, on the other hand, looking only at the authors announced as having new plays in preparation, we find not only Mr. Shaw but at least four others who are quite as likely to attract the paying public. In Mr. Barrie and Mr. Maugham we have absolutely the most popular playwrights of the day; Mr. Galsworthy, the author of "Strife," holds a very different position in the public eye from that which he held when "The Silver Box" was produced at the Court; and Mr. Granville Barker, practically unknown as a playwright when "The Voysey Inheritance" first saw the light, is now, perhaps, the man of all others to whose work the intelligent public looks forward with the keenest interest. I do not mean that financial success is assured in the case of all these writers. Financial success can never be assured for any writer or at any theatre. What I do mean is that, whereas Vedrenne and Barker had to make the reputation of practically all their authors, Mr. Frohman has at his back a compact body of dramatists, all of whom have already their public, and some of them a very large one. It would not be too much to say that there is no single theatre in Europe which has such a remarkable group of men pledged to work for it.

Certainly there is a striking contrast between the authors on Mr. Frohman's list and the living authors of the 'fifties whose plays were produced or revived at Sadler's Wells. On the other hand, the classical drama, on which Phelps mainly relied, is conspicuously absent from the programme of Mr. Frohman's first season. For this there are probably two reasons: first, the superabundance of modern plays to be compressed into a space of less than six months; second, the restricted scenic appliances of the Duke of York's Theatre. The first obstacle is in its nature temporary; the second will doubtless be removed before long, if the intelligent public does its duty and rallies to the support of the undertaking. It is gravely maintained by some people—it was one of the reasons alleged for Mr. Trench's abandonment of his repertory scheme—that the London public will never be at the pains of acquainting itself with the programme of a repertory theatre, and finding out on what nights a particular play is, or is not, to be acted. This is the veriest nonsense. The public is willing enough to find out what is going on at the Opera, at the Gilbert and Sullivan repertory performances, at His Majesty's during Sir Herbert Tree's Shakespeare week. Make your programmes interesting, and the public will be quick enough to study them. But there is one thing some people, even of the more intelligent sort, do not sufficiently realise—namely, the necessity of giving to such an enterprise as this active and constant, instead of casual and careless, support. The Repertory Theatre will scarcely succeed unless it can recruit a staunch inner public which will go to see everything it does. It should be able to rely on a fair number of good houses—say eight or ten—for even its least attractive productions. Let everyone remember this who appreciates the liberality of Mr. Frohman's effort, and realises how much depends on its success. When Hauptmann's "Thieves' Comedy" was produced—and admirably acted—at the Court, practically no one at all went to see it. Should any production at the Duke of York's be so utterly ignored, it will mean that London is not worthy of a Repertory Theatre.

WILLIAM ARCHER.

Letters from Abroad.

A SHAM REFORM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Prince Bülow's successor has achieved a great feat. He has disappointed those Liberals who expected next to nothing in the way of Liberal reforms from him. His Bill on the Prussian Electoral Law has at last seen the light, and the verdict of Liberals all round is that it deserves any name but that of a measure of political reform. It is a mere shifting of some sections of the enfranchised population into a higher class of voters, calculated to consolidate the class system of voting and deliberately directed against the working-classes and their party.

One cannot expect a foreigner to dive into all the intricacies of the three-class system of voting as it exists at present in Prussia. It is sufficient to know that the possessors of the franchise vote in three separated classes, graduated according to taxes assessed and having between them equal electoral power, so that on the average in the country 3'36 voters of the first class have the same voting power as 12'02 voters of the second class or 84'57 of the third class, and the first and second class together; i.e., 15½ per cent. of the electorate can always outvote the other 84½ per cent. Besides, the vote is open, it must be given in public before the returning officer of the district who registers it, and it is indirect. The voters in each class elect an equal number of members of the electoral college, who afterwards elect the members for the division. The divisions in population and in the amount of taxes paid are as unequal as possible, so that twenty divisions with over a million of voters possessed at the General Election of last year no more voting power than twenty other divisions with only 174,000 voters. The rural divisions have almost double the number of members as the town divisions which pay more than double the amount of direct taxes into the Exchequer, viz., 412 against 187 millions of marks.

Now the Government Bill maintains the open vote, the class vote, and the unequal divisions. It abolishes the indirect mode of voting, and provides for a different classification of the electorate by which the first class may in future embrace 5 or 6 per cent., and the second class about 20 per cent. of the electorate. In other words, one-fourth instead of one-sixth of the electorate may be in a position to outvote the remainder. The change in the classification of the voters is to be attained by not counting taxes exceeding £250 a year and entitling a number of representative people in town and country—provincial districts and town councillors and magistrates, graduates of the universities and other high colleges, members and some ex-members of the Reichstag and the Prussian diet, officers of the army or the navy of ten years' service—to vote one class higher than they would be enabled to vote by their assessments alone, and by constituting as voters of the second class all people with an income of over £90 a year who have either possessed for at least fifteen years the school certificate for the one year's military service or have been for at least five years entitled to an occupation, in the Civil Service on the ground of at least twelve years' military, naval, &c., service.

Now, what does this mean?

A closer examination of the list of the people enumerated reveals that the second class of voters will, or would, be swamped by people who, by an overwhelming majority, will, or must, vote against democratic and social democratic candidates, and that professors and members of the high and middle bureaucracy, who, by the vagaries of the present system of forming the electoral classes, are exposed to the degradation of having to vote in the third class alongside with their domestics and other common people, will in future be spared this horrible disgrace. In short, the whole reform will consist in clearing the monstrous three-class system of some of its more or less ludicrous excrescences and giving an alloy of mandarinism.

That is how Herr von Bethmann Hollweg proposes to redeem the promise made in the speech from the throne in November, 1908, when it was stated to be the royal will that the electoral system should undergo "an organic development, in accordance with economic evolution, the spread of knowledge and political intelligence, and the growth of responsibility towards the State." Readers of THE NATION remember, perhaps, what I wrote when Herr von Bethmann Hollweg took the Chancellorship. I said that in place of Bülow, the diplomatist aiming at modernism, we had a shrewd East-Elbe bureaucrat. The whole measure is calculation, calculation, calculation—with utter barrenness of creative statesmanship.

At the end of last year an official return was published, giving an analysis of the Prussian General Election of 1908. According to it, the principal parties received votes and seats:—

	Votes.	Seats.
Old Conservatives ...	354,786	152
Liberal Conservatives ...	63,612	60
Catholic Centre ...	499,343	104
National Liberals ...	318,589	65
Freisinnige ...	120,593	36
Poles, Danes, Guelfs ...	226,248	19
Social Democrats ...	598,522	7

With far fewer votes than the Social Democrats, the two Conservative parties shared between them almost half the seats of the whole Diet, whilst the Social Democrats got but seven seats, one of which has since been invalidated and lost at the by-election; so that the party which, in spite of open and controlled voting, received more votes than any other party, has only, say, six members in a House of 443. That is how the present system works. One can understand that a Conservative State Minister should shrink from granting democratic, equal, and universal suffrage, or from making a leap in the dark where a Socialistic party of such strength as the Social Democratic party in Prussia fights in implacable opposition to the established institutions of the State. Nobody expected a Radical democratic measure from the present or any other Government of Wilhelm II. But even a Conservative statesman ought to understand that at least some proportionate representation of the ideas and tendencies agitating the people is an absolute necessity in a modern State. Herr von Bethmann Hollweg does not see it, or, if he sees it, he dares not act accordingly, for fear of his Junkers.

It is very doubtful whether the Bill, if it becomes law, will in any degree worth mentioning increase Social Democratic representation in the Diet. It may even annihilate some of the paltry privileges already obtained. The Bill prescribes that in the electoral division the votes of each class shall be calculated in percentages, and that the candidate who has obtained in the average of the three classes more than fifty per cent. of the votes, shall be declared elected. Consequently, a candidate who in the third class of a division has obtained 75 per cent., in the second class 54 per cent. of the votes, will yet be beaten if of the votes given in the first class—the big taxpayers, the high officials, &c.—he does not obtain more than 21 per cent. of the votes, which is all but unthinkable. The shifting of the above-named notables and lower officials into higher classes of voters than their assessments would justify, will only worsen the chances of the Socialist and Labor candidates.

Thus the Bill is a slap in the face of Prussian Social Democracy. As an answer to their great demonstrations for a democratic franchise reform, it offers them stones instead of bread. It is unthinkable that the Prussian workers will let such a measure pass without demonstrations of vigorous protest. On several occasions of late they have shown a much more refractory temper than at any time during the present generation. It is possible that disturbances or commotions of a graver kind may break out in the shape of a political strike, or some similar interruption of the everyday life of the body politic. But nothing of the kind can be predicted for certain, and still less is it possible to predict whether the action of the mass will be powerful and impressive enough to influence the vote of the legislators.

The disposition of the latter is known. The Conservatives want "no change," or a change that changes nothing. The National Liberals want a pluralistic vote in favor of the professional classes, and a redistribution of seats in favor of the towns. The Catholic Centre objects to a redistribution of seats, but has no objection to a more democratic franchise. This opposition of interests will almost to a certainty lead to a good deal of intrigue in the House when the Bill goes into committee, and has afterwards to pass the Herrenhouse, the Prussian House of Lords. A leader of the Liberal Conservatives, Herr von Zedlitz-Neukirch, has already, in "Der Tag," mapped out a plan for the prevention of any effective reform. He was prudent enough to present it in the shape of a conjecture as to how the Catholic Centre may proceed; but it was evident that the wish was father of the thought. This did not hinder the Radical Press from crying "treachery" against the Centre—the most foolish thing they could do at the present juncture. For with the present voting power of parties in the Landtag, a reform of any value can only be forced upon the Government by an understanding of the genuine Liberals with the Centre.

The three things, democratisation of the franchise, the secret ballot, and the redistribution of seats, will not pass through the mill of this Prussian Diet all at once. But for the first two measures the Catholic Centre can be won, and a majority of the Landtag can be got together, if the National Liberals agree. It is they who, much more than the Centre, block the way to a democratic reform. Just as the Conservatives wave the red rag to frighten the tradesmen and the farmers, they swing the black rag to blind the enlightened Liberal Philistine. The effects of their senseless game are the real danger of the hour as far as the question of the Prussian franchise is concerned, and notwithstanding the bragging of that insipid Junker, Herr von Aldenburg-Januschau, it is the Prussian Landtag where the great questions of the policy of the German Empire are decided.—Yours, &c.,

ED. BERNSTEIN.

Berlin, February 6th, 1910.

Letters to the Editor.

THE "MITIGATION" OF THE VETO.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I should like to suggest to Liberal statesmen that they might do well to strive, not for the absolute destruction, but for the mitigation of the Lords' power of veto.

How would such a modification of the Constitution as this work? The Peers have one opportunity of meeting the proposals of the Commons with a simple negative; but if the same measure be presented to them a second time, after a given interval, it may then be rejected only by a majority of a certain size, say, three-fourths or even four-fifths. This is not absolutely to remove the weir which checks the flow of the stream, but greatly to lower it; and, at any rate, as a modus vivendi between an Upper House which, as at present constituted, will always be preponderatingly Conservative, and a Lower House which often will be preponderatingly Liberal, it would seem to offer some hopes of adjustment.

From the point of view of a public-spirited Peer who cares somewhat for the dignity of his order, it would have the advantage of lessening the probability of these wholesale creations of new Peers with which that order is now periodically threatened.—Yours, &c.,
HISTORICUS.

February 9th, 1910.

THE SECRECY OF THE BALLOT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is, I think, clear, as urged in your columns by "Liberal" and Mr. J. R. Tomlinson, that if the voting papers in any small district, such as a village, can be so examined as to see how the village has voted, it becomes possible to put serious collective pressure upon the voters in such village. I was sensible of this danger at the time the Ballot Bill was before Parliament, and wrote to Mr. E. A. Leatham respecting it. To meet the difficulty he drafted a proviso which was accepted and embodied in the Bill to the effect that the whole of the voting papers should be mixed before counting. I cannot here (Mentone) refer to the Ballot Act, but feel sure that it will be found to contain this proviso.—Yours, &c.,
J. R.

February 6th, 1910.

[Our correspondent is quite right. The words of the Act are as follows: "Before the returning officer proceeds to count the votes, he shall, in the presence of the agents of the candidates, open each ballot box, and, taking out the papers therein, shall count and record the number thereof, and then mix together the whole of the ballot papers contained in the ballot boxes."—ED., NATION.]

THE GLADSTONE LEAGUE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The Gladstone League, arising out of the Gladstone Fund and commemorating the centenary of Gladstone's birth, has now been formally constituted, with Mr. Lloyd George as President; and we venture to appeal to the readers of THE NATION to join and support it.

The object of the League is to organise a national movement for the defence of the liberties of the people, to educate the democracy, and to combat the methods of intimidation and social pressure so unscrupulously employed during the recent election. It will devote its main energies to the rural districts, where the need is greatest.

Among its specific tasks will be:—

1. The vindication of the secrecy of the ballot, the collection of evidence of bribery and intimidation, and the provision of legal advice and practical assistance for those who suffer for their political opinions.

2. The promotion of a policy of land reform which shall give the people access to the soil and secure to the public a fair share of the values which are created by the activities of the community.

3. The defence of the food of the people from taxation.

These vital objects can only be secured by the organisation of a great scheme of democratic propaganda in town and village, carried out by a network of agencies throughout the country, and co-ordinated from a central office in London.

Membership of the League is open to all subscribers of one shilling a year. Those who can afford more are urged to contribute more, as the expenses will be heavy. Workers are needed no less than money. The defence of their liberties must be taken up in earnest by the people themselves; and it is to organise the people that the League has been established.

Subscriptions, donations, and promises should be sent to the Treasurer, Gladstone League, St. Stephen's House, Westminster, S.W.—Yours, &c.,

PHILIP MORRELL,

G. P. GOOCH,

Hon. Treasurers.

February 10th, 1910.

THE RECENT ELECTIONS AND THE SMALL HOLDINGS ACT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—When I read the correspondence in the daily, and other, papers on the result of the elections in rural England, I marvel at the complete detachment of many of our politicians from country humanity. They seem to have no conception of what has been happening in the villages to cause so many people to change their minds about the virtues of the Liberal Party.

The matter is very simple. Two years ago a wave of almost passionate enthusiasm passed over the countryside. The men learnt from Liberal speakers that an Act of Parliament had been passed which would give them the chance of a lifetime in a piece of land, and perhaps a cottage. Moreover, they were told, as indeed the Act appears to direct, that if the County Councils did not put the law into force, in six months the Board of Agriculture could do so. Thus the men were at last to be freed from dependence and poverty and to be saved from the necessity of sending their children to the towns and over the seas.

Actual applicants for land were, on the whole, few, averaging about two per parish throughout the country, but for one who dared ask there were a dozen who decided to wait and see what happened. There must have been at least 100,000 men who wanted land. What has been the fate of the applicants? With some exceptions, a tragedy, that few have followed. For, so far, outside some dozen counties in England and Wales, no appreciable attempt has been made to secure the people land. The unfortunate men, alternately despairing and hoping, have meanwhile been subject to every sort of spiteful attack, of insult, and of petty persecution at the hands of County Councillors, farmers, landlords, and officials. Even when the applicant has not actually been made to suffer in pocket, he has been made the butt of everyone's jokes; whilst of the few men who have got land many have been forced to take it on most unfair terms. Appeals to the Board of Agriculture have in almost all cases been quite futile, for the applicants have very generally been ignored and often sharply snubbed. The attitude of the officials has caused grave and widespread distrust. All this greatly discredited the Liberals, for it had been fully explained by Liberal speakers the previous year and was fairly well understood that the Board of Agriculture had the complete control of the working of the Act, and the more intelligent applicants realised that the Government were alone responsible for its administration and for its failure.

So it will be realised that a considerable section of our country electors were in no very good humor at Christmas last.

"The Small Holdings business is the Old Age Pensions business over again," said a keen country working-man politician well known as a Radical; "the Tories promised Old Age Pensions, and the Liberals gave it; now the Liberals have promised the land and perhaps the Tories will give it. Anyway, it's worth trying." He voted Tory, and by now he may have got his land, for a good deal has been doled out this winter, and, unless I am greatly mistaken, much more land will be given out by landlords in the next twelve months than has ever been got by the Liberals' Small Holdings Act. Another man I knew, a splendid fellow and an ardent Liberal, started canvassing—he worked like a slave for a fortnight. "Many men who wanted land and had not got it voted Tory," he told me afterwards; "I know that for a fact. When I went to talk to the men," he continued, "they used to say, 'What about your small holdings?' and then I had to shut up." It was notorious in the district that the County Council had hung up his application for two years, because of a personal objection of a member of their committee, and that an effort was being made to deprive him of his allotment and so drive him out of the village. Similar stories, showing how men voted come to me from many constituencies. But we country people are told by the town politicians that elections turn on other matters, and we were beaten by bribery and intimidation. There was certainly some bribery and a good deal of intimidation. An old friend of mine got at election time an allotment from the squire, two shillings out of a Tariff Reform agent, and two days off from his employer to work on his land—and yet he voted Liberal. Three men, I am told on good evidence, in the neighboring parish were had up together before their employer and given to understand that one would be sacked if the Liberals got in. Consider the cruelty of that way of putting it. But I doubt if there was more intimidation than usual. There was certainly not so much as in 1885; only, people notice it more nowadays.

Why we lost was, partly at any rate, this, when one got outside the political ring one found that the backs of the natural leaders of the men were broken by the action of the Government in refusing to put the Small Holdings Act into force, and their hearts were sore at the personal insults which had been showered upon them. They felt themselves deserted by the party they had so ardently supported; and though many did vote for us, they showed no fight against the campaign of lies carried on against us. The curious can take up the last report of the Board of Agriculture on the administration of the Small Holdings Act, and compare it with the result of the elections. In Norfolk, Lincoln, Gloucestershire, Somerset, and Cambridgeshire, where the Small Holdings Act has been administered in spite of the inertia of the Board, there has not been the serious relapse that occurred in other counties. In East Cambridgeshire a seat was lost to a Tory member of the Small Holdings Committee of the County Council, who made the most at the election of the success of his Committee. In Sussex, Surrey, and Suffolk, where practically nothing is being done, the Liberals have lost everything, and the same is true of Kent, where the administration has been tainted with most serious evils. A return of the actual number of applicants settled on the land, in the various constituencies, would be invaluable to country members and Liberal organisers. I am myself surprised the Liberals did so well. Six months ago they would, I think, have done far worse, but there is no doubt that the Budget helped them, and they have certainly gained ground recently. It is interesting to observe that the Women's Liberal Federation seemed to have grasped the situation some time ago, and issued last year a very instructive circular on the subject. Even now it seems doubtful whether Liberals will proceed to secure the administration of this Act. If they do not there will be further disaster. They would do well to act without a day's delay, and, recognising that the Board of Agriculture, being in essence a Tory body, has scotched the Act, should proceed to appoint an entirely new set of Commissioners to go at once into the villages, confer with the applicants, and give the six months' notices needed to put the Act into force, before the end of the month, and so secure that all applicants get their land this year. Has the party the pluck and energy to do it?—Yours, &c.,

A COUNTRY LIBERAL.

February 9th, 1910.

THE MEANING OF THE SCOTTISH ELECTIONS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Many people will be asking the question why has Scotland remained so true to the Liberal cause when so little has been done for Scotland by the Liberal Party. I have taken a small part in four English elections, and previously I have been amongst the Scottish people in the north. There have been various causes at work in moulding the thought of the people, but I think that I should put in the first place their religion. The Free Church of Scotland has, for nearly a hundred years, been a great educating force in the country. It has taught the people to think, and to think for themselves, and to stand alone in great crises. The difference in intelligence between the standpoint in Birmingham and that of Scotland is a century at least. As an illustration of this I will give two remarks made to myself in the two different districts. One was by a northern laborer, who said, "Yes, we know now the value of the vote, and we mean to hold on to it." A young man who keeps a quite respectable and tidy shop, in reply to a suggestion that his newspaper might have misled him, remarked "If I cannot believe in the (Birmingham) 'Daily Mail' there is nothing left to believe in." The religious life of Scotland is a great factor in the life of the people. It stands behind it, in the place of the daily paper, which is the gospel (and what a poor and sordid gospel!) in Birmingham. Another, and an enormous, influence, in forming the mind of Scotland, has been the rise of the deer forest. The deer forest has broken the loyalty and affection between the classes—the old feudal feeling which lived on so long in the north is gone. It must be remembered, to understand this, how the great value of the deer forest came about. When, through the introduction of steam power, foreign produce was brought to our doors (to the great advantage of the poorer classes), the cultivation of the land at home on the old lines became less productive, and the landlords in Scotland and Ireland had to look about for some way to restore their lessening incomes. In Ireland, the war of the classes began, and the vast emigration of the people, which has really solved the land question by raising the value of labor beyond what the landlords were prepared to pay. This (I am told) decided them to part with the land.

In Scotland, a different solution was found for land difficulties in the rise of the millionaire. The demand for sport and for pleasure places for the nouveaux riches offered to the Scottish landlord an income too tempting to be resisted. The old owner flitted from the home, taking with him all the old ties to his dependents and the sense of responsibility which had grown up with the centuries of contact, and the wealthy tenant, with new ideas, took his place. Thirty years ago I remember that, as I climbed the high stone stairs in the tall houses in Florence, I used to read the names, on visiting cards, nailed on the doors, of the old Highland chiefs. Round Florence, too, the houses were largely inhabited by the old Scottish families. As time went on the demand for the deer forests continued, and it became necessary to take in waste land, and to clear out the people. Financially this was very profitable, and no one saw then that it was effecting a much more important change at the same time. It was breaking for ever the old feudal ties between the classes; it was teaching the people to stand alone and to fight for themselves; it was, eventually, to send back to the Parliament of Great Britain a Government who must break the power of the great landlord, and release the land for the people.

Surely Scotland is not to save cheap bread for the people and to receive no reward? Those of us who know how deeply this question has sunk into the hearts of the Scottish people, and who have heard them say with tears in their eyes, "It cannot be for long, it cannot be for long, that this will go on, that the people of the soil must give place to the deer," think that the election of 1910 is the first step of retribution, the beginning of the end.

Other signs are not lacking of a decay of a system which has always been an unnatural one. "We find," said one of the large landowners, "that our tenants are becoming much more exigent." "They require motor-cars to take them up to their shootings: instead of its being a favor to introduce them to old families, the favor is now considered to be all the other way." The feeling is again becoming strained between landlord and tenant. "These aliens will not take our side if our nations should go to war," said the owner of many shooting lodges. Moreover, motor-cars and flying machines are changing the playing grounds of the very wealthy, and Scottish shootings may cease to command such high rents. But all the while the other side of the story goes on. Thousands of young people are leaving the north and carrying to their new homes the bitter feeling the Irish took to America. Truly there is little hope for the Tariff Reform van which is about to wend its way to the far villages of Scotland.

Scottish people have long memories, and they do not want to "tax the foreigner," for he has nothing to do with their troubles. They only want the use of their own land again. They "know the value of the vote, and they mean to hold on to it."

History can give the Liberal reformer no more splendid lesson than the story that lies behind the Scotland of 1910.—Yours, &c.,

ENGLISH LIBERAL.

February 8th, 1910.

THE COUNTY ELECTIONS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—What Sir F. A. Channing says about our losses in agricultural constituencies receives confirmation from the way in which East Dorset was held, and a majority of 19 turned into one of 426. Here, the sitting member would have had little chance, but a fresh candidate, working as the Hon. Captain Guest did, achieved a splendid success.—Yours, &c.,

H. SHAEN SOLLY.

Parkstone, February 9th, 1910.

A FORECAST.

To the Editor of THE NATION

SIR,—The readers of THE NATION may remember that in your issue of November 6th I predicted:—

- (a) That the Lords would reject the Budget in November.
- (b) That there would be a General Election in January.
- (c) That the Conservatives would win several seats in London.
- (d) That the Conservatives would win several seats in the Home Counties.
- (e) That the political position in Scotland, Wales, and Ireland would remain virtually unchanged.
- (f) That the Government would have a majority of about 140.

I think I may fairly claim that no published prophecy has proved more accurate, which was also the case with a forecast that I published in the "Civil and Military Gazette" of Lahore concerning the elections of 1906.

With reference to the present political position, I think that two courses are open to the Prime Minister; the first being to decline forming a Cabinet unless he receives certain guarantees concerning the use of the royal prerogative, the second being to pass the Budget, and then to pass a Bill to prohibit any future interference on the part of the Lords with finance, reserving the general treatment of legislation by the Upper House for a second session. The first is the more heroic; but the second appears to me the more practicable, and therefore the more practical. Moreover, it would probably prove more simple to reform the constitution of the Upper Chamber than to alter the relations of the two Houses. One useful means of reducing both the influence and the numbers of the peers would be to revive the ancient royal prerogative of restricting the writs of summons, and so arriving at an Upper Chamber that should be at once more dignified and impartial, and less obstructive.—Yours, &c.,

JOSHUA BROOKES.

27, Park Road, Richmond,
February 9th, 1910.

RED RUBBER.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—While a feature in the Stock Exchange at the present time is what is described as "a boom in rubber," and new companies are being continually floated and fortunes made, I do not find that any adequate attention is being paid to the labor conditions under which rubber is produced and these profits are being piled up. I venture, therefore, to ask the hospitality of your columns to invite consideration to the very serious tale of misery and wrong which has been disclosed in the development of this enterprise.

It is needless to do more than refer to the outrageous conditions which have been shown to prevail in the Congo State. But the cruel oppression which is alleged to be inflicted in South America is less well known. Charges of a circumstantial character have been brought forward in regard to the methods by which extortionate quantities of rubber are demanded from the natives by "chiefs" under barbarous penalties, including flogging, mutilation, torture, and death. These alleged misdeeds formed the subject of a question put by Mr. Hart-Davies in the House of Commons on October 21st last, and it is understood that the Foreign Office are inquiring into the matter. More recently, harrowing revelations of cruelty in Mexico have been brought to light in an article in the "American Magazine" of February by Mr. Harman Whitaker, who has just returned from a tour of the rubber plantations in that country, where he was an eye-witness of what he relates. I have only read extracts from that article, which have been reproduced in England. Mr. Whitaker declares that men, women, and children are being worked to death daily in the plantations, and he gives horrible details, too long for quotation here, of what is going on.

So much for labor conditions in foreign countries. I come now to territories under the control of the Colonial Office, and it is to be observed that the present boom relates principally to the Federated Malay States and the Indian Archipelago. There we have little or no information of what is being done. But in answer to a question put by myself in the House of Commons, also on October 21st last, it was stated that the rate of mortality among Indian indentured laborers employed in the Federated Malay States during the year 1908 was 84·8 per thousand. This is the death rate among adults and in the prime of life. It is an appalling figure and reveals an amount of misery and suffering dreadful to contemplate. It is a result that not unusually accompanies the employment of indentured labor, especially in a new enterprise. It is an aspect of the labor problem which calls for the earnest consideration of those who have lately made gigantic profits and whose "hundreds," as we are told, "are now worth thousands." I am thankful to hear that the matter has not escaped the attention of the authorities in India, who have placed themselves in communication with the Colonial Office for the protection of their Indian subjects. I know that Colonel Seely was fully alive to the grave situation involved, but it is no simple or easy task that the Colonial Office are now called on to undertake. The inherent vice of indentured labor is so deep-seated, the circumstances of rubber production are so special, and so many scandalous incidents are associated with the management of rubber plantations in other parts of the world where the credit of humanity has been staked and lost, that it will need more than ordinary vigilance, firmness, and publicity to ensure that the good name of British enterprise in this direction shall be beyond reproach.—Yours, &c.,

HENRY COTTON.

February 6th, 1910.

RELIGION WITHOUT ENTHUSIASM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As one who is personally no ardent admirer of the Anglican communion, I have no quarrel with the strictures of the writer of the article in last week's issue of THE NATION which bears the title "A Decent Church." But may I be suffered to point out that he has fallen into an error in his interpretation of the precise import of the word "enthusiasm," as it stands chiselled on the tombstone in Little Stanmore Church to which he refers? This is one of those cases, so familiar to the student of Alexandrian Greek or Silver Age Latin, where the exact meaning of a word depends on an accurate ascertainment of the date of the document in which we encounter it.

Careful students of English literature will have noted in the course of their reading that "enthusiasm" is one of those words that have advanced in reputation within a comparatively recent period. Until the early part of the nineteenth century it almost always conveyed an unfavorable sense, much as the word fanaticism now does. In the Century Dictionary the reader will find sub voce quotations from Henry More, Locke, and Shaftesbury which agree in describing it as a deluded state of mind except when used for "poetical afflatus"; the examples furnished in the New Oxford Dictionary, in one of which Doddridge speaks of enthusiasm as a thing against which it becomes Christian people to be "on their guard," show this to have been its accepted connotation. Accordingly, Dr. Johnson, with an eye to its etymology, defines it in this connection as a "vain confidence of divine favor or communication." So recently as 1829, when Isaac Taylor published his "Natural History of Enthusiasm," he protests against the use of the word in a good sense, insisting that "where there is no error of imagination, no misjudging of realities, no calculations which reason condemns, there is no enthusiasm." Worshipping "common sense," it was, indeed, but natural that the eighteenth century should rate enthusiasm among the vices; and it is only since then that the norma loquendi has changed.

Enough has been said to show that your contributor is mistaken in assuming that at that date "religion without enthusiasm" meant what it now means—religion without fervor or passion.—Yours, &c.,
E. K. S.

January 31st, 1910.

AT THE DOOR.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In the lines "At the Door," by "R. L. G.," surely the writer ought to have acknowledged his indebtedness to the quaint old French song which begins:—

"Au clair de la lune,
Mon ami, Pierrot!
Prêtez moi ta plume,
Pour écrire un mot—

Ma chandelle est morte,
Je n'ai plus de feu—
Ouvrez moi la porte,
Pour l'amour de Dieu!"

—Yours, &c.,
February 2nd, 1910.

FRANCES F. HOUSMAN.

[The poem was on the face of it an adaptation of the verses which our correspondent quotes.—ED., NATION.]

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In the review of "Religion and the Modern World" in THE NATION of January 29th, is the expression "Historic Religions" in the plural?

Now it appears to me there can be only one religion in the world, and that is the doing of what is thoroughly believed to be the will of God, our Heavenly Father. If we love God with all our heart and mind and strength, and also our neighbor; if we visit the widow and orphan in their affliction, and keep ourselves unspotted from the world; and if we keep the "golden rule" of doing to others as we would wish that they should do unto us in similar circumstances, what more "religion" can any person want? Theology is not necessarily religion.—Yours, &c.,

E.

February 1st, 1910.

GLADSTONE'S SINGING VOICE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I notice that Mr. G. W. E. Russell, the intimate friend of Mr. Gladstone for many years, in an address at Walworth in connection with the Gladstone Centenary Commemoration, stated the interesting fact that a great deal of Mr. Gladstone's recreation was devoted to the contemplation of music. But he would appear to have been a singer, as well as a student, according to the following extract from the Greville Memoirs, bearing date September 30th, 1854:—

"The Gladstones came here on Wednesday. No one can dispute his extraordinary capacity, but I think there may be much difference of opinion as to the charm of his society. He has a melodious voice in speaking, but I was not prepared to hear the Chancellor of the Exchequer warble a sentimental ballad accompanied by his wife."

Another diarist has the following, under date January 14th, 1868:—

"On Saturday we drove to Hawarden, to an amateur concert, chiefly by Mr. Gladstone's children and their cousins, the Lytteltons and Glynnes. Mr. and Mrs. Gladstone joined in the choruses, but the chief treat was to hear him take the solo in two verses of the National Anthem—viz., 'Thy choicest gifts in store,' and 'May she defend our laws.' His voice was soft and extremely pleasant to listen to. Of the multitudes who have listened to his speaking voice, but few have heard him sing."

I fancy these facts will come as a revelation to most people, although those who heard him speak often must have noticed a musical quality in his voice, especially in his earlier years, and indeed we gather from Mr. Russell's remarks that he was admired as a singer when he was member for Newark.—Yours, &c.,

R. W. J.

February 5th, 1910.

SCOTTISH LIBERAL JOURNALISM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Is there no journalist in the whole of the United Kingdom sufficiently enterprising to start a Scotch Liberal penny daily newspaper? It is very painful, especially at such a crisis as a General Election, to have no resource but the "Scotsman" and the "Herald," which spend their time in sneering at Scotland's consistent Liberalism? Scotland shows its hearty disapproval of the House of Lords, and votes solidly for temperance reform and Free Trade, while its leading papers truckle to the Lords, and pour contempt on progressive ideas. Can we not have a paper which would express Scottish opinion, instead of deriding it?—Yours, &c.,

ANTI-MONOPOLIST.

February 7th, 1910.

[The Liberal daily press in Scotland certainly wants strengthening, though such papers as the "Dundee Advertiser" possess all the qualities of able and informed journalism.—ED., NATION.]

Poetry.

THE SUBURB.

ALL wild it lay not long ago,
In billowing curve and dip.
Where houses brood, the sweet hedgerow
Of hawthorn bush was seen,
And the white road was used to slip
Through golden hills and green.

A cottage, pinafores with rose,
Knelt under Balham Hill,
And where the tiresome traffic flows
Were many lilled lanes,
Echoing the throstle's raptured trill
To April's jewelling rains.

And still, though wire and petrol rage,
And many chimneys loom;
And surly smokes their struggles wage,
Over the grey bricks blowing—
Her streets, for me, are all abloom
With flowers of childhood's growing.

THOMAS BURKE.

February 8th, 1910.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE following is our weekly selection of books which we commend to the notice of our readers:—

- "The Life of Lord Kelvin." By Silvanus P. Thompson. (Macmillan. 2 vols. 30s. net.)
 "The Story of the Negro." By Booker T. Washington. (Unwin. 2 vols. 10s. net.)
 "English Poor Law Policy." By Sidney and Beatrice Webb. (Longmans. 7s. 6d. net.)
 "The Works of 'Fiona Macleod.'" Arranged by Mrs. William Sharp. Vol. I. "Pharais" and "The Mountain Lovers." (Heinemann. 5s. net.)
 "Zambezia." By R. C. F. Maugham. (Murray. 15s. net.)
 "Rest and Unrest." By Edward Thomas. (Duckworth. 2s. 6d. net.)
 "The Faith and Modern Thought." By William Temple. (Macmillan. 2s. 6d. net.)
 "A Call: The Tale of Two Passions." By Ford Madox Hueffer. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)
 "L'Echec de la Restauration Monarchique en 1873." Par Arthur Loth. (Paris: Perrin. 7fr. 50.)
 "L'Evolution de la Mémoire." Par Henri Piéron. (Paris: Flammarion. 3fr. 50.)
 "Charlotte Corday." Par Henri d'Alméras. (Paris: Librairie des Annales. 3fr. 50.)

* * *

THE first number of a penny weekly journal, to be called "The Literary Post: A Weekly Newspaper," will appear next month. The venture will be a true newspaper, but it will only record events of literary interest. Reviews will form an important feature, and books of outstanding value are to receive special treatment. We wish "The Literary Post" a prosperous career.

* * *

NAPOLEON as a man of letters is a theme that has the merit of freshness, and in treating of it in the introduction to "Napoleon in his own Defence," Mr. Clement Shorter deals with what is to most people an unknown side of the Emperor's activity. Mr. Shorter's book is a reprint of the 1817 "Letters from the Cape," which were attributed both to O'Meara and Las Cases, but are now known to be by Napoleon. A French critic claims that the two greatest letter writers of the nineteenth century were Napoleon and Paul Louis Courier, and he adds that the "Correspondance" of the former is "the most instructive that can be offered to a serious man to reflect upon." Another interesting fact is that in his early years Napoleon wrote a novel called "The Count of Essex."

* * *

ANOTHER book on Napoleon, to be published almost immediately by Mr. Eveleigh Nash, is Mr. Tighe Hopkins's "The Women Napoleon Loved." Mr. Hopkins claims that, while the French themselves have discussed Napoleon's love affairs with native candor, the subject has not been dealt with before by an English pen.

* * *

MESSRS. METHUEN's spring list contains fewer biographies than usual. Indeed there are but four books classed under the heading "Biography and Memoirs"—"The Fascinating Duc De Richelieu," by Mr. H. Noel Williams; "Famous Blue-Stockings," by Miss Ethel Rolt Wheeler; "Dean Swift," by Miss Sophie Shilleto Smith, and "Edward, the Black Prince," by Mr. R. P. Dunn-Pattison. In the first of these Mr. Noel Williams has chosen a capital subject, for the career of Louis François Armand du Plessis, Maréchal, Duc de Richelieu, offers a combination of heroism and profligacy which an expert biographer can turn to advantage. He was, as Mr. Noel Williams says, the most notorious Lovelace of his age, but he had also a distinguished military career, undertook several diplomatic missions, was the friend of Voltaire and the philosophers, and had a hand in nearly every Court intrigue of his time. He had, moreover, the reputation of a wit, but this Horace Walpole disallowed, for, in a letter to Conway in 1765, he describes him as "an old piece of tawdry, worn out, but endeavoring to brush itself up," and adds, "he put me in mind of Lord Chesterfield, for they laugh before they know what he has said—and are in the right, for I think they would not laugh afterwards."

* * *

THE famous blue-stockings of whom Miss Wheeler writes are the three great blue-stockng hostesses, Mrs. Montagu, Mrs. Thrale, Mrs. Vesey, and a number of their guests, including Hannah More, Elizabeth Carter, Fanny Burney, Mrs. Delany, and Mrs. Chapone. Mrs. Montagu, "the female Mæcenas of Hill Street," as Hannah More called her, was to some extent a rival of Mrs. Thrale for Dr. Johnson's attentions. Johnson praised her conversation, but discountenanced her attempts at authorship. (When Sir Joshua Reynolds remarked that her "Essay on the Writings and Genius of Shakespeare" did its authoress honor, Johnson's reply was: "It does her honor, but it would do honor to nobody else.") Mrs. Thrale has been recently paid court to by Mr. Thomas Seccombe, who has recorded her virtues and qualities in one of his introductions. Mrs. Vesey, Fanny Burney tells us, "united the unguardedness of childhood to a Hibernian bewilderment of ideas which cast her incessantly into some burlesque situation." The burlesque situations were not visible to Miss Carter. "There is nothing of mere vulgar mortality about our Sylph," she wrote. Poor Mrs. Vesey proved the contrary by dying in a literary as well as in a physical sense, but her literary resurrection along with the other "blues" at Miss Wheeler's hands can hardly fail to provide entertainment to a less sentimental generation.

* * *

THE interest caused by the publication of the two volumes of Lord Broughton's "Recollections of a Long Life" has led Lady Dorchester to prepare a further instalment of her father's memoirs for the press. Two fresh volumes will appear this spring through Mr. Murray. They cover the ten years from 1822 to 1832, and will include an account of Byron's last days, as well as a history of the political movements that led up to Roman Catholic Emancipation and the Reform Act. A number of incidents and anecdotes of George IV., William IV., Wellington, Canning, Peel, Lord and Lady Holland, and other leading personages of the period are promised.

* * *

M. ROSTAND's "Chantecler" will be published in volume form towards the end of the month by Messrs. Fasquelle. Advance orders to the number of 30,000 have been already received for the expensive first edition, though an edition at a cheaper price will be issued simultaneously with it. Messrs. Lafitte announce an illustrated edition of M. Rostand's complete works, together with a supplementary volume called "La Vie et l'Œuvre d'Edmond Rostand," by M. Emile Faguet, publication of which will begin on April 1st next.

* * *

AN edition of the Revised New Testament, with fuller references, is to be issued by the Oxford and Cambridge University Presses. The work of drawing up marginal references was entrusted by the New Testament Company of Revisers to Dr. Scrivener and Professor Moulton in 1873, but it had not been completed when the Revised Version was published in 1898, so that only abridged references were then given. Professor Moulton's son, Dr. J. H. Moulton, and Dr. Greenup have since been associated with the work, and the fuller references now promised are certain to be a great help to students of the New Testament.

* * *

JUDGING from the number of anthologies of French verse that have been issued in this country during the past few years, English readers are not so blind to the beauties of French poetry as is commonly supposed. "The Oxford Book of French Verse," and Mr. F. Y. Eccles's "A Century of French Poets" are two good recent collections. Messrs. Chatto & Windus promise us another, to be called "An Anthology of French Verse." The editor, Mr. C. B. Lewis, has paid special attention to the older poets, and has aimed, by notes and other helps, to make them easy for readers who have but a small knowledge of the old language.

* * *

A NEW book on the old question of the immortality of the soul is announced by Messrs. Harpers. It gives the views of a number of representative American thinkers, among them being Mr. Henry James, Mr. W. D. Howells, Mr. H. M. Alden, Mr. John Bigelow, Colonel Thomas W. Higginson, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, and others.

Reviews.

THE IDEA OF A FREE CHURCH.*

THE untheological reader will be misled if he turns away from "The Idea of a Free Church" on account of what may seem to him an unpromising name. Borrow's "Bible in Spain" tells us much of Spain and little of the Bible—hence, perhaps, its popularity as a "Sunday book." We will not say that Mr. Sturt tells us little of his Ideal Free Church, but certainly he tells us much of other and more interesting subjects, and that in a singularly interesting way. The book is an acute and outspoken criticism of current moral and religious ideas, and it possesses, in an exceptional degree, two merits rarely found in literature of the order to which it belongs—style and humor. The former is easy and clear—not a sentence has to be read twice to get at its meaning; the latter is incisive. We shall not soon forget the philosopher whose main interest in a question is "that there are at least two sides to it," and "whose wisdom is of the kind that suits best with a soft Scotch accent"; or "the widespread habit of Mental Indirection"; or the description of the Church of England as "the most ladylike of Churches"; or the contention that a youth spent in ministry is not the best preparation for the ministry, because "after some years of platitudinising the habit becomes difficult to shake off." And could the pseudo-asceticism not unfrequently found among persons the reverse of ascetic be more happily taken off than here?—

"A taste, for it goes with a taste for the finer sorts of bric-à-brac, for a suit of armor to stand in the hall, or an antique prie-dieu for the drawing-room, quaint old things pleasingly incongruous with the civilisation into which they have survived. This sentiment we find most strongly in places where, superficially, we should least expect it. Very worldly and frivolous people, decadents famous for verse and worse, like to think occasionally of nuns whose lives are meekness, vigilance, chastity, and perpetual adoration before the altar.

"Calm, sad, secure, behind high convent walls,
Those watch the sacred lamp; these watch and pray."

Nor is it the vicious only and the perverse in whom this paradox shows itself.

"Deep down in the smuggest souls there lives the elemental delight of imposture, the still silent joy of participating in a common consecrated act of make-belief. Principles of grasping self-assertion all the week; principles of utter self-renunciation in church-time: the more absolute the contrast, the keener the relish of relief. To some natures all this serves as a substitute for romance."

The upshot of Mr. Sturt's criticism of Christianity is that "it is unfree; that is, it does not give proper recognition to the personal will, but rather regards it as a thing to be diminished and depressed." The purpose of his book is "to suggest a religion and a church more satisfactory than the Christian"; and its fundamental proposition is that "the welfare of civilised men lies in the principle of freedom; that is, in the proper development of every essential part of human nature under the guidance of the individual judgment." If, as a safeguard against individualism, we add to this proposition the words, in vital connection with the best judgment of the community, it may be accepted, while the author's confession that these inquiries were suggested to him by "the unreality and futility of the ordinary sermon," will predispose not a few churchgoers in his favor. Our comment would be the suggestion that his sermon-tasting has been done in England, not in Scotland. If, however, his dream of a church whose pulpit shall be open to its members without distinction of office or sex should be realised, the refuge of slumber might become impossible, and the remedy be worse than the disease.

It is not only the dogmas and the institutions of the Churches that need criticism: a religious reconstruction that stops short of ethics will break down, and will deserve to break down. It is its insistence on this that is the distinctive point and merit of Mr. Sturt's book. It overflows with sound and pertinent ethical maxims.

* "The Idea of a Free Church." By Henry Sturt. The Walter Scott Publishing Co., Ltd. 5s. net.

"Freedom is the right to do; it is not the right wholly to abstain from doing.

"Systematic bodily exercise is one of the surest marks of high civilisation, and the best natural antidote to what may be classed together as the servile physical vices, those of sloth, gluttony, dirt, and drinking.

"Teutonic self-assertion was wanting to the ancients.

"It is healthy for every man to have a large circle of people whom he regards as interesting.

"There are sections of the community who want exhorting not to be feeble. The character of our middle class, the class that has been softened by trade and sedentary occupation, is seriously marred by a strain of fat self-indulgence and flabby humanitarianism.

"Early piety is quite a morbid phenomenon.

"Protracted celibacy tends to produce a notable deterioration of character: the man whose soul and body have never thrilled with that magic (love) has not lived to the full, and, as age comes on, can escape moral and intellectual degeneration only by a half miracle.

"Incontinence prevails most where men have least opportunity to use their higher powers. A religion which would stimulate our energy towards great enterprises would do more for clean living than any amount of pietistic exhortation.

"The man who takes no interest in politics should be marked with a stigma, like the man who has no love of children and no zeal for business efficiency.

"The man who wilfully refuses the duty of fatherhood incurs a heavy responsibility, and stands as one who may be called upon peremptorily to justify his position. It should not be easy for him to be regarded as in the fullest sense religious or a good citizen: most emphatically he should not set up as a moral teacher and preacher."

Some of these are truths that emphatically require saying, and they could not be better said.

The criticism that suggests itself on the main contention—i.e., that "the Christian religion is obsolete"—is that Mr. Sturt sees this religion out of perspective. There are other factors in history and experience. Malebranche saw all things in God; but nothing less can serve as the universal mirror. The defects with which we credit religion are often those of human nature, which also contains their correctives; and it is a false abstraction which regards Christianity, not as connected with, but as isolated from and antagonistic to, that larger work of Reason—of which it is not, indeed, the whole, but a part—in the world. (1) Neither asceticism nor flight from the world is peculiar to Christianity. The temper which Mr. Sturt justly reprobates is common to men of a certain type, Christian and non-Christian, and is accentuated under certain conditions of place and time. If it is present in the New Testament and in the Church, it is present lying unmediated alongside of its opposite; and the moralist may be pardoned if he lays stress less on the virtues to which average human nature is inclined than on those from which it is averse. Taking men as they are, there is little danger to society from the excess of the quietistic virtues or from that "hypertrophy of the religious sentiment" which is so prejudicial to sanity and the right ordering of life. Ethics is a progressive science; the religious bias is effectually counterbalanced both by the virtues and the vices of the natural man. Again (2) Christianity, and even religion, is part of a larger whole. That the Gospel passes over and appears to disparage important sides of human experience and activity is true. That this is so is due to the circumstances under which it was originally preached; and the fact is, in any case, a sufficient answer to the pietist who would frame a social polity on the Sermon on the Mount. But to prove Christianity "obsolete," it must be shown not only to be "in part," but to claim to be co-extensive with what the theologian calls the work of the Spirit, the philosopher the self-realisation of Reason, in mankind. Only a fanatic will put forward this claim. And to conceive religion as static is to misconceive it. It is not a thing become, but becoming; the antagonisms between it and general culture, patent as they are, are relative and in process of being overcome. When, therefore, the alternative of secession or intellectual and moral servitude is proposed to us, we demur. The Reformed Churches, at least, have not cut themselves off from life. And, if the highest level of mental and moral excellence is attained even here only by the few, it is because they are Churches, not schools of philosophy, and appeal, as Churches must, not only to the exceptional, but to the average man. He is a sulky player who throws up his cards when the game goes against him. Life is a conflict whose chances vary; "the better and the best men in a community must always expect to be at war with the inert and backward majority, and must strain every muscle to tow the passive, unwieldy barge up stream."

The sketch of the work and organisation of the proposed Free Church with which the book closes is its least convincing part. Much of this work is being taken in hand by the existing Churches; much, while the Churches do well to co-operate in its doing, is likely to be done more easily and efficiently by the community at large. And—the example of Positivism is a striking instance—a Church is a thing to take or to leave. It is the outcome of centuries; its roots lie in a state of society remote from ours, the conditions of which cannot be reproduced under other circumstances. Churches are not made consciously; they grow while men sleep.

Mr. Sturt has not avoided that over-statement which is the pitfall of the reformer. Original thinking, he tells us, is impossible for a modern Christian clergyman: we think of John Caird, of Jowett, of Harnack—and doubt. The Anglican Church, we hear, "was to all appearance the permanent ally of phthisis, anæmia, hysteria, neuralgia, dyspepsia, and all the other diseases incident to a timid, flabby, sit-by-the-fire-and-read-the-Bible mode of life"; we should, perhaps, wonder at what period the description held good, had we not read, on a former page, that this same Church, "with its commonsense and its compromises, its 'muscular Christianity,' and its 'Greek-play bishops'" —we can only, we regret to say, recall one occupant of the present bench to whom the epithet applies—"is at a higher level than other churches; it, at least, is not anxious to drive all thinking men out of its pale." That "the average gentleman, and still more the average lady, has no sympathy with working people, and does not understand their lives, their motives, or their morality," is perhaps less true of the landed gentry than of the class of landless rich, without either local ties or the traditions of race, which stands apart from the people because it has no root in the soil. This class is of recent origin, and it is in its increase and possible preponderance that a serious danger to English social life lies. Nor, even with the classical example of Mesopotamia before us, can we follow without reserve the criticism of "blessed words," pp. 267-269. Such words are centres round which religious feeling and association have clustered. That their original meaning has undergone modification—this holds good of secular as well as of religious terminology—is a good reason for explaining their history, a bad one for ceasing to use them; it is in its language that the record of a people's life lies. When all deductions, however, have been made, Mr. Sturt's book is suggestive and stimulating in the extreme; nor is the bias, which he does not disavow, the most formidable enemy of the system which he estimates. Its danger lies elsewhere.

"Against her foes religion well defends

Her sacred truths, but often fears her friends,"

Crabbe reminds us.

And in the same vein Mabillon:—

"Il n'y a que deux ennemis de la religion—le trop peu, et le trop; et des deux le trop est mille fois le plus dangereux."

LADY WESTMORLAND'S CORRESPONDENCE.*

LADY WESTMORLAND was the Duke of Wellington's niece, and her husband was a fortunate diplomatist. She was a prominent figure both in English and in foreign society, so that her correspondents included people of consequence in various ways. This collection of letters gives a very good idea of the manner in which her life was passed. They are indeed too miscellaneous, and too disconnected, to be of much use for historical or biographical purposes. This very fact, however, makes them all the more agreeable and entertaining to the general reader. They afford an amusing insight into the Tory opinion of the day, with its horror of popular movements, and its extreme dread of reform. There are letters from Metternich, which quite explain why he was unable to keep order at Vienna. The diplomacy of the period was perfectly helpless, and Lord Westmorland showed no more foresight than others. On the subject of the Crimean War, and its causes, Lady Westmorland speaks with more than her usual discernment. She describes it as "a miserable war of personal feelings and wounded vanity, brought about by blunderers on all sides—perfectly unnecessary, and which can by no possibility have any result useful or honorable to England." "The exaggerations and false statements," she adds, "in all our newspapers, and the dexterity with which the Blue-Book has been concocted so as entirely to conceal the real history of the transactions, have created an enthusiasm in England which appears to be general and vehement, but it has no foundation in truth." Lady Westmorland wrote from Vienna, where her husband was Ambassador, and it must be remembered that Lord Westmorland had made Lord Aberdeen's Government believe in the readiness of Austria to take part against Russia, whereas the Austrian Government was never prepared to go beyond a moral and lukewarm support of England and France. On the fall of Lord Aberdeen's Ministry, Lady Westmorland wrote, "I am so pained, so humiliated, so furious, at the part my country is playing; so disgusted to see the nation come down from that elevation which no one formerly contested, to play the part of the obliging assistant to the Emperor Napoleon, that I blush to be English." Considering that this letter was written to a foreign Princess, the language is strong. But it expresses what many people who knew what was going on felt at the time, and it is only partly colored by the writer's indignation at the hostile criticism of her brother-in-law, Lord Raglan.

To read this book for the purpose of obtaining political information would, of course, be a mistake. The value of the work is quite different. It is full of social pictures and incidents, told with great freshness, and vividly described. It is thoroughly miscellaneous, and readers of all kinds may discover entertainment in it. At the same time it has a personal unity which prevents it from becoming merely discursive. It belongs to the small class of books which give at first hand impressions that deserve to be recorded because they are representative and characteristic of the passing hour. The Duke of Wellington's simple and affectionate side is nowhere else exhibited with so much artlessness and truth. Even Metternich shows in these pages a spirit of chastened tolerance, which contrasts agreeably with the arrogant temper of his earlier days. Popular movements of all sorts are regarded by Lady Westmorland and her friends with a comical mixture of indignation and dismay. But, apart from questions of political and social disturbance, they lived placidly enough, and their letters have considerable interest for the observer of traits and manners. Few books could be found to provide a better antidote against pessimism than this. The country is continually represented as being on the verge of destruction, and every institution appears to have suffered irretrievable decadence. Yet it all comes right in the end, and fresh material has to be discovered for a new series of lamentations. As for the Liberal party, sympathy with the Italian revolution completely destroyed what was left of it. Despite, however, all these changes and chances, despite even the catastrophes of 1848, the social life of European capitals pursued its inevitable course.

There are plenty of light and graceful sketches in this volume. But Lady Westmorland excelled chiefly in reporting conversations for her husband, and this art she practised with much assiduity. She is a conscientious narrator, always seizing the points, and never encumbering them with details. From her letters to Lord Westmorland the reader may glean a variety of information about persons and events of the time which he would not find elsewhere. He may be occasionally reminded of the simple comment made by Pepys upon the conversation of Charles the Second and the Duke of York, "Lord, what poor stuff they did talk." But there is an interest in the least distinguished dialogues of persons at the centre of affairs when they speak frankly behind the scenes. Lady Westmorland does not attempt anything like embroidery. She sets down what she heard, with such reflections as occurred to her, and there is a sort of fascination in comparing the ideas of the day with the light cast upon them by subsequent events. Metternich was convinced, in 1852, that Lord John Russell's political career had come to an end. No one seems to have expected anything from Otto von Bismarck, or from the young Prince who afterwards became the first German Emperor. Cavour, the profoundest diplomatist, and the greatest constructive statesman of his age, is a reckless and mischievous firebrand. These random speculations do not detract from the value of the book. On the contrary, the frank disclosure of contemporary opinion is the salt of the correspondence. Lady Westmorland regarded Sir Robert Peel as a man who ought not to be in society, and who gave a great deal of unnecessary trouble to the Duke of Wellington. With the exception of the Duke, great men were not heroes to her, and the part of them she saw was not the part which counted in history. Nevertheless she was a keen observer of what she understood, and much that passed before her eyes has a significance greater than she perceived. Although she did not always write the English language correctly, she looked at everything from an English point of view, and she had penetration enough to foresee that the alliance of the British Government with Napoleon the Third would be extremely embarrassing in its results. John Bright once described the foreign policy of Lord Palmerston as a gigantic system of outdoor relief for the aristocracy of Great Britain. Lady Westmorland was brought up in the faith of a diplomacy which did not tend to the promotion of pure merit. But it compares not unfavorably with the diplomacy of other countries, being, as it was, under some degree of Parliamentary control. One may lay down the volume with a sense of pride in a constitution which has withstood shocks that proved fatal to less enduring structures, and a belief in a race which has solved many apparently insoluble problems. British statesmen, although they have doubtless made many blunders, have never lost faith in their own countrymen. The Continental intrigues of which these letters afford so many passing glimpses belong to a category of which we in England know little or nothing.

* "The Correspondence of Priscilla, Countess of Westmorland, 1813-1870." Murray. 14s. net.

THE LESSER ELIZABETHANS.*

THE fourth volume of the "Cambridge History of English Literature" deals with the poets and prose writers between Sir Thomas North and Drayton, leaving the history of dramatic writing down to the middle of the seventeenth century for volumes five and six, which will, it is hoped, be issued together by Easter. A result of this division is that no great writer except Bacon appears in the present instalment. Even writers of the second rank are not numerous, and most of the names cited are those of lesser authors who, though entitled to a place in a history of literature, are of little interest to readers whose first object is pleasure rather than instruction. The volume is also open to the objection from which none of its predecessors have wholly escaped; it is less a history of the literary movement of the age than a collection of essays, each of which narrates some particular phase of that movement, but which, in combination, fail to give us the spirit and proportions of the whole.

The first, and one of the best, of these essays is that of Mr. Charles Whibley on the translators. Mr. Whibley has already written some fine appreciations of the men who "pursued their craft in the spirit of bold adventure which animated Drake and Hawkins" in the prefaces he contributed to the "Tudor Translation Series," and he returns to the theme with unabated enthusiasm. He rightly claims that the work of these translators was the real renaissance of England, the recovery of the ancient spirit. It matters little that they were inaccurate or ignorant of the niceties of the languages from which they translated. It matters little that in many cases their works were not direct renderings, but translations of translations. They had a sense of style, and the authors they translated, Greek or Latin, French or Italian, came to them with the freshness of a new discovery. They pursued their labors in no spirit of narrow scholarship, but, as Philemon Holland puts it, endeavoring "by all means to triumph now over the Romans in subduing their literature under the dent of an English pen, in requital of the conquest some time over this Island, achieved by the edge of their sword." It is because they wrote in this spirit that their books carry with them "the lively air of brave originals." The qualities of North, whose "Plutarch" was one of the best of these Elizabethan translations, are well summed up by Mr. Whibley:—

"North, though he knew little of the classics, was a master of noble English. He was neither schoolman nor euphuist. As he freed his language from the fetters which immature scholars had cast upon it, so he did not lay upon its bones the awkward chains of a purposed ingenuity. He held a central place in the history of our speech. He played upon English prose as upon an organ whose every stop he controlled with an easy confidence. He had a perfect sense of the weight and colour of words; pathos and gaiety, familiarity and grandeur resound in his magnificently cadenced periods. It was his good fortune to handle a language still fired with the various energies of youth, and he could contrive the effects of sound and sense which had neither been condemned nor worn out by the thoughtful pedant. Above all, his style had a dramatic quality which suggests to the reader a constant movement, and the value of which, no doubt, was candidly recognised by Shakespeare."

By a natural transition, the next chapter is devoted to the greatest of all translations in our tongue, the English Bible. It is a tremendous subject, and we cannot say that Professor Cook, of Yale, does it justice. His comments are either obvious or commonplace, and he reads into the Bible a unity which modern criticism has shown cannot be claimed for it. The Bible has the unity of a national literature, and it is absurd in speaking of a national literature to say that "every sentence, nay, every word must count. The spirit which animates the whole must inform every particle." Does Professor Cook believe that the spirit which animates the Sermon on the Mount informs the Imprecatory Psalms or the Song of Solomon? If he does not, his sentence is meaningless. Professor Cook seems, moreover, to be under the impression that, in order to exalt the Bible, he must depreciate all other literature. Thus he compares the wonderful passage in the eighth Psalm, "When I consider Thy heavens, the work of Thy fingers, &c.," with Hamlet's soliloquy beginning, "This goodly frame the earth," his comment on the latter being, "This, indeed, is fine rhetoric, but how apostrophic it is, and how repetitious!" We are also treated to a number of testimonials awarded to the Bible by distinguished men, a feature that might well have been omitted in a work of this character.

The three poets who are given separate chapters in the volume are Campion, Drayton, and Donne. Mr. Percival Vivian writes well upon Campion. His examination of Campion's metrical devices is a valuable contribution. He recognises that beneath their seemingly artless ease the lyrics conceal a real mastery of syllabic tones and values, and claims that, in a few instances, Campion attains the finality and roundness of expression which betoken close kinship with great poetry. Drayton offers a marked contrast with Campion. We should like to possess more of the latter; we can afford to dispense with a great deal written by the former. It needed diligent toil to make Drayton a poet, but he paid the price, and he has a respectable position in the second rank. His earlier works have nothing of the spontaneity and ease that delight us in Campion. He achieved some measure of it in his later and daintier manner, though Mr. Child seems to us to rate him too high in claiming that there are few more interesting figures in English literature than Drayton in the long period which his work covered.

Professor Grierson's chapter on Donne is a good estimate of the man whom Dryden called "the greatest wit, though not the best poet of our nation." Donne's influence upon the Caroline poets is one of the most remarkable things in the history of our literature, and Professor Grierson helps us to understand it. He challenged and broke the supremacy of the Petrarchian tradition. By joining passion and imagination to reasoning and learning, he opened a new era in the history of the English love lyric. He gave it greater depth of thought and checked its tendency to a facile fluency. "If Donne somewhat lowered the ethical and ideal tone of love poetry, and blighted the delicate bloom of Elizabethan song, he gave it a sincerer and more passionate quality. He made love poetry less of a musical echo of Desportes. In his hands, English poetry became less Italianate, more sincere, more condensed and pregnant in thought and feeling."

* "The Cambridge History of English Literature." Edited by A. W. Ward, Litt.D., and A. R. Waller, M.A. Volume IV. "Prose and Poetry: Sir Thomas North to Michael Drayton." Cambridge University Press. 9s. net.

Other chapters deserving of notice in the volume are "The Literature of the Sea," by Commander Charles Robinson and Mr. John Leyland, "The English Pulpit from Fisher to Donne," by Mr. F. E. Hutchinson, "The Beginnings of English Philosophy," by Professor W. R. Sorley, and "The Book Trade," by Mr. H. G. Aldis. Not the least valuable part of the work are the full and authoritative bibliographies added to each chapter.

THE MEANING OF MUSIC.*

THE quality of the thought in "La Musique, ses Lois, son Evolution" of M. Jules Combarieu, the learned Professor of the History of Music at the Collège de France, amply entitles the work to inclusion in the solid "International Scientific Series." Unfortunately, the translation, though generally fluent and readable, often does the original gross injustice, and sometimes converts it into pure nonsense. The translator, whose name is not given, more than once blunders in his French, while his knowledge of music seems to be small. One of the most irritating of his habits is that of referring to the musical notes of the scale as Do, Re, Mi, Fa, and the rest of it, though in French these notes have not the variable meanings given to them by the English sol-faists, but indicate the fixed notes C, D, E, &c. A Frenchman would say that Elgar's symphony was in La bémol; but for an Englishman to say that it was in La flat would be nonsensical. There is the same ignorance shown in the handling of proper names. M. Combarieu only follows a general French custom when he refers to von Hartmann as M. de Hartmann, or to the old Greek treatise on harmony by Nicomachus of Gerasa as the "Manuel d'Harmonique" of "Nicomaque de Gêrase"; but these Gallicisms should not reappear in an English version. "Mélodique" is persistently rendered "melodious," instead of "melodic." The whole translation, indeed, needs careful revision, as more than once M. Combarieu is made to say things that never entered his head.

The great value of the book comes from the fact that M. Combarieu is, in a rare degree, both musician and scientist. It is only from a type of this kind that a rational and penetrating examination of the nature of music can come. The average musician has too little training in science; the average scientist or philosopher, from Confucius and Pythagoras to Spencer, has never been able to listen to music as a musician hears it. M. Combarieu's great service to aesthetics is to insist upon the prime fact that music is the expression of a "pensée musicale," a musical way of thinking. It matters nothing that the images and the processes of this thought cannot be expressed in the definite terms of ordinary language; it remains true that "music is the art of thinking in sounds." As M. Combarieu points out, "there must not be demanded from psychology definitions more precise than those current in all sciences save mathematics and geometry." We do not know, for example, what electricity is; no scientist can define what a food is; "nevertheless there exists an art or a science of nutrition and living, just as there is a science of electricity." And if "to think without concepts" in music seems a contradiction in terms, what shall we say of Lord Kelvin's definition of the ether as "a solid without density or weight, yet more rigid than steel"? Examining music from every side, historical and aesthetic, M. Combarieu drives home again and again this fundamental fact that the essence of music is to be sought, not in the laws of vibrating bodies or in the constitution of the ear, but in the capacity of the musical mind to seize in its own way upon the universe and reproduce the meaning and movement of it in a language that, though "indefinite" in comparison with words, is perfectly definite to those who can think in it. Now and then M. Combarieu needlessly confuses his thesis with other theories, or separates it too strictly from them. He deals somewhat irresolutely, for example, with the quite wrong-headed speech-theory of Spencer, and with the equally wrong-headed theory of Darwin, that music sprang from the amative sense. The very nature of M. Combarieu's own theory—that music is the musical mind's way of apprehending and expressing the universe—makes it wholly unnecessary for him to trifle with these pseudo-philosophical conjectures. On the other hand, he separates himself far too pointedly from the theories of Helmholtz and Hanslick. They undoubtedly regarded music too much as an affair of the balance of the respective components of it. This leaves out a good deal of the very essence of musical inspiration and musical enjoyment: though there are far more analogies between musical beauty and the beauty of ordered and balanced lines in decorative design than M. Combarieu seems to have considered. He falls into one or two other errors of detail, and occasionally he puts a heavier burden on the "historical method" than it can safely carry, some of his readings of music in the light of other social phenomena being a trifle fantastic. But as a whole the thesis is correct; and the book is one of great power, the thinking, the argumentation, and the historical knowledge all touching a far higher plane than one is used to in musical literature. M. Combarieu's breadth of view is nowhere more admirable than in some of his demonstrations of the connection between the music and the general life of an epoch.

THE POLYGLOT EMPIRE.*

AGE has not impaired the intellectual vigor of Sir Horace Rumbold. In his 81st year he has a perfectly clear view of the strangely varied history of Austria during the nineteenth century, and his treatment of the subject is large and, on the whole, most impartial. In the course of a diplomatic career that wafted him almost literally from China to Peru, Sir Horace spent several years (1896-1900) as Ambassador to the Emperor of Austria, whose friendship and confidence he enjoyed. The social and domestic side of his theme is not neglected in this volume, the main interest of which is, however, political.

At the dawn of the nineteenth century Austria lies stricken and humiliated. Austerlitz is followed by Wagram, and twice the "upstart Corsican" has entered Vienna. The Holy Roman Empire (a realm grown somewhat shadowy, to be sure) dissolves and vanishes; and Francis II. of Hapsburg, Archduke of Austria and King of Hungary and Bohemia, resigning the historic title, withdraws to the government of his hereditary kingdoms and principalities, and is known henceforth as Emperor of Austria. While his kingdom was still reeling under the blows of Austerlitz and Wagram, Francis received Napoleon's proposal for the hand of his daughter, the Archduchess Marie Louise. The affair was speedily arranged. The young princess herself considered that she was "cast in prey to the Minotaur," and Sir Horace Rumbold says: "Of many questionable transactions held to have been justified by reasons of state, this one seems in many ways exceptionally odious." Lord Acton, some readers may remember, described the Austrian match as Napoleon's ruin; and certainly, had it not been for this alliance, it is impossible to believe that he would have entered upon the Russian campaign. What, one wonders, would have been the issue for the French Empire had Napoleon united himself by marriage not with Austria but with Russia? The Russian scheme fell through, the Austrian was successfully brought off—and one of its consequences was the retreat from Moscow!

Sir Horace Rumbold pictures Napoleon as "desperately in love with his young wife," but is not this phrase a little over-colored? Gourgaud has made the great man himself declare that he "never was in love, except perhaps with Josephine—a little"; but not all is gospel that has come to us from St. Helena. If ever in his life Napoleon was "desperately in love," it was with Josephine. That passion, which from the first was very largely physical, cooled with the husband's knowledge of the infidelities of his enchantress; and—the Walewska interlude notwithstanding—it may be questioned whether at any subsequent period his heart was really subdued. Marie Louise made him an excellent wife (her conduct was then above suspicion, and she was not a spendthrift like Josephine), but we know from M. Frédéric Masson that the French hold her memory in detestation. This, for certain, is not altogether fair. The Archduchess came to France a mere schoolgirl, she was married absolutely against her will, and she remained but a few years in the country of her adoption. Probably the chief grudge of the French against her is that she gave Napoleon two of the least distinguished successors who could have been found in Europe—the first of whom wore a patch to hide a disfigured eye. But Marie Louise is neither a great creature, like her great-grandmother, Marie Thérèse, nor a fascinating one, like her aunt, Marie Antoinette; and, were Sir Horace Rumbold not gallantly resolved to make the best of her, he could have reminded us that in her Duchy of Parma she came under the influence of the Jesuits and persecuted right and left.

* "Music: Its Laws and Evolution." By Jules Combarieu. International Scientific Series. Kegan Paul. 5s

* "The Austrian Court in the Nineteenth Century." By the Right Hon. Sir Horace Rumbold, Bart, G.C.B., G.C.M.G. Methuen. 18s. net.

The son whom Marie Louise bore to Napoleon (that longed-for heir whose birth, as Acton said, was "an onerous complication") is, during some years after Waterloo, the most pathetic figure at the Court of Austria—the most pathetic figure in Europe. Among the many lifelike and engaging pen portraits that Sir Horace has here given us, there is none that will appeal more directly to the sympathies of the reader than this of the handsome, brave, dreamy stripling—curiously known to posterity under the three titles of Napoleon II., King of Rome, and Duke of Reichstadt—who said of himself in his closing hours that his birth and death summed up his whole history.

To Francis, that uxorious man, last of the old line of German Emperors and founder of the present Austro-Hungarian monarchy, a sovereign of somewhat lofty conceptions, and profoundly loved by his people, succeeded a son, Ferdinand I., slightly disordered in his wits. Ferdinand's brain never attained complete maturity, and his mental disabilities were the supreme opportunity of Metternich.

From 1835 to 1848 this genius of the diplomatic stage and inveterate foe of Liberalism was, in his character of Chancellor, the chief person in the Empire. Austrian industry and commerce did, indeed, show some considerable power of expansion; but under an absolute and omnipotent bureaucracy, which led swiftly up to the suppression of trial by jury, and something very like suppression of the Press, the mind of the country suffered grievous pains, and Austria was wretchedly celebrated as the China of the West. These years are filled with tumult. Kossuth arises in Hungary, there is a secession agitation, there are flights of the Imperial family, and Metternich (after a forty years' administration which has, at all events, lifted Austria to a commanding position in Europe) succumbs to a street riot.

'Forty-eight brings to the front, as a youth, the sovereign who still maintains his place upon the throne, Francis Joseph. His uncle Ferdinand abdicated, and his father, Archduke Francis Charles, waived his claim to the throne in favor of his boyish son. Francis Joseph was but just eighteen. What a year in Europe and the world is 1848! Month by month it is Annus Mirabilis. California lures the gold-seekers; Louis Philippe, preferring for the moment to be known as "Mr. William Smith," tumbles out of Paris in a hackney cab; the Bavarian King, losing his Lola Montes, loses his hold upon Bavaria; Charles Albert begins to move in northern Italy; Chartism begins to move on Kennington Common; Louis Napoleon, the dreamy adventurer, gets his successive grips on France; Ireland has a notion of rising under O'Brien; George Stephenson, having made his "travelling engine," travels to his rest; Vienna feels panic after panic; a Pope hastens in disguise to Gaeta; a King of Prussia publishes a Constitution, and Thackeray publishes "Vanity Fair."

The marriage, in 1854, of the young Emperor and his girlish cousin Elizabeth, makes a very pretty story, as Sir Horace Rumbold tells it. The girl-Empress charmed, enlivened, and transformed the Court, and was soon of European celebrity. Hunting centres in England and Ireland (where she lavished in presents and charities her touring allowance of £5,000 a month), remember her as the boldest and most accomplished horsewoman of her day: did she not once clear the wall of the College of Maynooth? "But," says Sir Horace,

"it was in the inexhaustible field of mercy and charity that the Empress Elizabeth found throughout life the tasks that were most congenial to her. The first steps taken towards mitigating the old harsh system of military punishments; the reform of prison discipline, and the improvement of the sadly neglected prisons, and of the hospitals for the poor, were all traceable to her initiative, based on the searching inquiries she had herself made. As for her good works and personal charities, they were as boundless as was her sympathy with all sorts of distress and suffering."

At Geneva, in 1898, the year of the Emperor's jubilee, the Empress Elizabeth, a broken-hearted recluse, fell under the dagger of an anarchist. The sudden death, in 1889, of her son, the Crown Prince Rudolf, had in a manner paralysed her. A mystery has hung over Prince Rudolf's untimely end. Very reluctantly the family allowed it to be believed that he had committed suicide, and this solution Sir Horace Rumbold accepts. Not one of the small group of persons who were with the Crown Prince on the fatal day has ever spoken on the subject. Count Hoyos, one of the two friends who accompanied him to the shooting-lodge at Mayerling, volunteered to the Emperor to make a public declaration that he had shot the Prince accidentally in a battue; but this offer his Majesty, of course, rejected. There is an unpublished story—never more than half divulged—in which a gamekeeper is involved; but to this the author makes no allusion.

To the Italian war, in which Napoleon III. joined swords with Victor Emmanuel against Francis Joseph and the Austrians, Sir Horace Rumbold devotes an interesting chapter. But 1859-60 is a long time ago, and he might have made the circumstances of the campaign somewhat clearer to readers of this generation by dwelling in greater detail on the long tyranny of Austria in Italy. The almost abject slavery of the Italians under a crowd of wretched little despots, who, if they were overawed by Austria, were also supported by her, is an episode that fills some of the darkest and most lamentable pages in modern European history.

It was not this war, but the swift decisive onset of 1866, that made of Italy a practically free nation. Sadowa, in which engagement Francis Joseph lost upwards of 44,000 men to Prussia, destroyed for all time the noxious rule of Hapsburg and Bourbon in the best-loved peninsula in the world.

Singular, indeed, among contemporary sovereigns, has been the progress of Francis Joseph. Discussing the Emperor's Diamond Jubilee of two years ago, Sir Horace Rumbold says:—

"Looking back across the space of those sixty years—the lives of two generations—it requires an effort to identify the ruler who only the other day fearlessly bestowed the crowning measure of democratic liberties on the 28,000,000 of his Austrian subjects, with the youth who, after being nurtured in the school of Metternich, found in the stern, unbending Schwarzenberg his first political mentor and adviser. The past has led him by a series of evolutions . . . from unquestioned absolute rule of an almost medieval type—resting solely on the Army and the Church—to the acceptance of a constitutional sovereignty ostensibly narrowed down to its most exiguous limits."

It may possibly be remembered that under the decree of January, 1907, the elections to the Lower House in Austria take place on the basis of "universal, equal, and direct suffrage." At the present moment, the aged Francis Joseph (some of whose autocratic powers, until he himself surrendered them, linked him with the Middle Ages) is perhaps the one indispensable monarch in Europe.

THROUGH A GLASS DARKLY.*

WE are informed on the wrapper of "The Unlucky Mark" that "in the web of the main story is woven a quasi-political tale of disloyalty and anarchy, in which Mrs. Penny shows great insight into the thoughts, opinions, motives, and characters of the natives of Southern India, whom she has made her constant study for so many years." Encouraged by this assurance of the author's "insight," we hoped she might have interpreted for us the feelings of those of our Hindu subjects who have grievances against our rule; we hoped she might have held the balance fairly and shown us what are the real forces of national feeling at work behind the Swadeshi movement. On the contrary, the novel not only displays no penetration into the sources of discontent of the educated Hindu, but treats him with studied contempt. We hold no brief for the Nationalist agitator. It is simply because this novel is so grating in tone, so cocksure in its conclusions, so destitute of the power of putting oneself in another's place, that its picture appears to us inartistic and out of perspective. Books of the type of "The Unlucky Mark" have, of course, always been abundant. They have contributed their share to the English misunderstanding of Irish life and character up to comparatively a short time back. Not infrequently they are the work of clever people of "the garrison" who have made a subject "their constant study for many years," writing with kindly or chilling patronage of "the subject race." But the same naïve and childish feature, artistically, is common to all of them, in their aim of denouncing or casting ridicule on any class or race whose demands, in outlook or feeling, are not in the accepted programme of official policy.

* "The Unlucky Mark." By F. E. Penny. Chatto & Windus. 6s.

The plot of "The Unlucky Mark" is woven of two strands, and of the first, which details the love affairs of the Englishman, Sir David Dereham, and the Mohammedan officer, Major Adam-u-din, with the heroines, Mrs. Breydon and Miss Laurence, we need not speak. It is the second, the part played by the Hindu "gentleman," Dharma Govinda, and his secretary, Chandraswamy, the Swadeshi agitator, that we are concerned with. Dharma Govinda, the son of a rich merchant of Bangalore, is introduced to us as he accosts Sir David Dereham on the platform at Malur, while offering to lend him a syce, to lead his new horse, "the Saint," to the trainer's stables. Govinda's "full lips and large dark eyes bespeak his love of luxury and ease, his vanity and self-concentration," and his manner "in close imitation of the young bloods of Bayswater" naturally offends the high-born baronet. Sir David, however, avails himself of the kindly offer, and in doing so falls into a trap carefully baited in advance. We cannot compliment Mrs. Penny on the credibility of her tale. It seems that the horse-box of the train also carries Govinda's new purchase, "Swadeshi," a horse so like to Sir David's that the two are practically indistinguishable save for a special "lucky" and "unlucky" mark upon their chests. Now Govinda, having schemed to exchange his own horse for Sir David's, has bribed the Englishman's syce to malingering, and has arranged with his own servants, Cassim and Gopal, that "the Saint" shall be lost on the road—ostensibly. In point of fact the baronet's horse is led to Govinda's stables, the number branded on his hind hoof is manipulated, and drugs are administered before he is reported as "found," and his double is led back to Sir David. The scheme works without a hitch. Sir David has no suspicion that the wrong horse has been palmed off on him, and Govinda thus obtains possession of the lucky animal. The "Hindu gentleman's" private roguery having thus been made patent to the English reader, we are now let behind the scenes of his seditious activity. He is, it seems, not only a contemptible upstart, but a coward to boot. He incites smaller men than himself to run risks that he dare not face. While posing as a "Moderate," the influential and wealthy patriot, it seems, is financing "The Flaming Torch of India," for which he writes, in secret, inflammatory articles, which goad the hot-headed Indian youth, such as Chandraswamy, beyond endurance.

"The public hall at Hosur was crowded. The occasion was an afternoon meeting to consider 'The Coming Congress,' and how its aims might be promoted to the best advantage. . . . Chandraswamy, in a state of suppressed excitement, went to the foot of the platform, and begged for a word with the speaker before he commenced. Might Chandraswamy and his friends be allowed to eject two men suspected of being policemen in disguise?"

"Govinda held up his hands in protest at the suggestion of such violence. He assured the company that nothing would be said during the proceedings which could be construed into disloyalty. He hoped all his audience were devotedly loyal to the paramount power."

"Chandraswamy retired with a scowl upon his dark face. It was reflected upon the countenances of a large number of young men, who formed at least three-quarters of the audience. Many of them were mere boys, and not one of them was over the age of twenty-five. They all lacked experience, and were eager with the rashness of youth to enter the difficult field of politics. . . . They mistook the enthusiasm of prejudice for noble self-devotion. Each one professed to be acting for the benefit of his country, whereas he was but inflated, like Govinda, with a desire for notoriety, and was actuated by an insane wish to raise emotion in the multitude, and stir dangerous passions not easy to allay. . . .

"Education had left these raw, rudderless youths without discipline—since the rod had been abolished by a benevolent Government from their schools, without religion—since John Stuart Mill's and Herbert Spencer's books, with those of their successors, had been placed unreservedly in their hand; and without occupation, since they had all sought to improve their condition, and had failed to attain the particular object of their ambition."

The sequel to this tale of seditious activities is that the "Hindu gentleman" takes to flight, when his tool Chandraswamy has been caught in the act of throwing bombs. With every wish to criticise "The Unlucky Mark," from the artistic standpoint, we find it exceedingly difficult. Major Adam-u-din, the Mohammedan gentleman, is, for example, used as a figurehead to express the "racial hatred" that our author states is "always latent" between the Moslems and Hindus. Like the Ulster Loyalist in relation to the Catholic Irish, he is brought forward to foment the disaffection of his ancient antagonists. "Let us hope that the Moslems of India will never be obliged to resort to self-protection," says the Major, "that they will never be brought into conflict with over-confident, aggressive Hindus who are deluded into thinking that the English Government will support them in their aggression. It would be a bad day for Britain if ever such a crisis arose." This is really the accent of the Belfast Orangeman. The same tone is used in speaking of Hindu ritual. Thus we read: "'Never heard of the worship of Kali, the most iniquitous, most pernicious, most insidious of religious movements this earth ever saw? . . . Closely connected with it are the abominable practices of Sakti worship that appeal to the sensuous side of a sensuous people. . . . The whole system should be crushed; their meetings put down by the aid of troops if need be. The thing wouldn't be tolerated in any European country,' said Dereham." The writer's view of the causes of recent Hindu unrest is set forth in a conversation in the penultimate chapter. "It is not the country that requires a lesson, but a small minority of educated men who have spread themselves over the whole of India, preaching in the name of patriotism a new gospel of sedition and disloyalty. The great majority of the people have no political aspirations whatever, I assure you. . . . If only they could be left to follow the bent of their inclinations their continued happiness would be assured. . . . For the present, however, powder and shot are not merited by the masses." It is not merely in the direct political propaganda preached that the author shows the lack of sympathetic understanding. In her descriptions of Hindu domestic life, however true they may be to surface facts, there is no feeling communicated of the atmosphere or the soil. Everything is hard, rigid, metallic, and it is precisely these imported qualities that the reader feels are standing between him and the native life, like a wire gauze veil placed between him and the light.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

DR. JAMES FORD RHODES is one of the leading American historians, and in "Historical Essays" (Macmillan, 9s. net), he has brought together a number of lectures and papers read before the American Historical Association and other bodies. The first four essays deal with history under its general aspects, and are, perhaps, the most interesting in the volume. Dr. Rhodes holds a position midway between the modern scientific school and the older school, which thought that the historian should judge as well as narrate, and that he must be a man of letters as well as an authority upon his period. "History," Dr. Rhodes quotes from von Holm, "in the main ought only to be a record of facts, but now and then the historian may be allowed to display a certain interest in his subject." Dr. Rhodes places Herodotus, Thucydides, and Tacitus above all other historians, but he rates S. R. Gardiner not much below them, and he is not contemptuous of Macaulay. Of the remaining essays in the book, the best is an appreciation of Gibbon, read at Harvard University two years ago. He says that in the famous Fifteenth and Sixteenth Chapters of "The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire" Gibbon ignored some facts, and that his combination of others, his

IMPORTANT NEW BOOKS.

Published by Mr. T. FISHER UNWIN.

Gambetta : Life and Letters.

By P. B. GHEUSI. Translated by V. M. MONTAGUE. With 8 Illustrations in Collootype, demy 8vo, cloth 12s. 6d. net; post free, 12s. 11d.

The Evening Standard says: "This is an admirable, a thrilling book."

The Observer says: "We see the charm, the splendid magnetism of the man, prying into every detail, soldier, administrator, autocrat, friend, and counsellor at once."

The Academy says: "M. Gheusi's work, apart from its great biographical interest, is worthy of universal attention."

The Story of the Negro.

By BOOKER T. WASHINGTON, Author of "Up from Slavery," etc. In 2 volumes, cloth, 10s. net; post free, 10s. 6d.

Mr. Booker Washington, the most distinguished negro in the United States, here gives a comprehensive and admirably written narrative of the history of his race, from the early period in Africa, through the early slave period and the time of the Emancipation, down to the present day. No writer on the negro carries more weight than Mr. Booker Washington, and his book is likely to become the standard authority on the subject.

Sir Walter Scott Studied in Eight Novels.

By the Hon. ALBERT S. G. CANNING, Author of "History in Scott's Novels," "Shakespeare Studied in Three Plays," etc. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net; post free, 7s. 11d.

The Novels discussed are as follows:—"Guy Mannering," "The Antiquary," "The Black Dwarf," "The Heart of Midlothian," "The Bride of Lammermoor," "A Legend of Montrose," "The Pirate," and "The Surgeon's Daughter."

Forty Years Ago and After.

By J. GEORGE TETLEY, D.D., Magdalene College, Oxford, Archdeacon-designate of Bristol, Canon of Bristol Cathedral. With a Frontispiece, large crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net; post free, 6s. 4d.

"A volume of reminiscences that," says the Morning Post, "can be cordially recommended."

The Conquest of Consumption.

By ARTHUR LATHAM, M.D., and C. H. GARLAND. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net; post free, 4s. 10d.

"The book is well worthy of the attention of medical men, economists and others interested in the pecuniary administration of institutions devoted to the public health."—Scotsman.

A Brief History of German Literature.

Translated and Edited from the German of Gotthold Klee, by G. M. PRIEST. Crown 8vo, cloth, 4s. 6d. net; post free, 4s. 10d.

This volume gives a bird's-eye view of the development of German literature, and contains much useful biographical information. It is designed especially as an introduction to the subject for those who know little of it.

Thomas Carlyle, The Man and His Books.

Illustrated by Personal Reminiscences, Table Talk, and Anecdotes of Himself and His Friends. By WILLIAM HOWIE WYLIE. With a Frontispiece and a Memoir of the Author. Fourth Edition. Large Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net; post free, 2s. 11d.

"One of the most masterly biographies—a work, indeed, which it would be hard to surpass for sympathy, delicacy, liberality of view, and wealth of friendly insight."—Contemporary Review.

The Doctrine of Creation.

By C. M. WALSH, Editor of "Shakespeare's Complete Sonnets." Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net; post free, 3s. 10d.

A learned discussion of various philosophical theories and religious doctrines of Creation, the point mainly raised being that of the eternality or non-eternality of matter. Among the writers whose theories are treated are Gassendi, Bacon, Descartes, Spinoza, Tertullian, Gesenius, Augustine, Clement of Alexandria, and Plato.

Ski-ing for Beginners and Mountaineers.

By W. RICKMER RICKMERS. With 120 Illustrations. Cloth, 4s. 6d. net; post free, 4s. 10d.

"A fascinating book on the most delightful of Continental winter sports. Not only is Mr. Rickmers a strenuous and accomplished ski-runner himself, but he has had years of experience as a teacher of the art, and his handy volume embodies everything that it is essential for the novice to know in order to become an efficient ski-runner in as short a time as possible."—T. P.'s Weekly.

NOTABLE 6s. NOVELS.

Garryowen.

By H. DE VERE STACPOOLE, Author of "The Blue Lagoon," etc.

The Prime Minister's Secret.

By W. HOLT WHITE, Author of "The Man Who Stole the Earth," etc.

A Man of the Moors.

By HALLIWELL SUTCLIFFE, Author of "Shameless Wayne," etc.

ON SALE AT ALL BOOKSELLERS.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

"A ROMANCE OF REALITY."

SCIENCE, MATTER AND IMMORTALITY.

By RONALD CAMPBELL MACFIE.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net.

Mr. W. L. COURTNEY, in the Daily Telegraph.

"It goes straight to the heart of things, shirks no difficult problem.....and yet emerges in a hope for the ultimate destiny of man, and for the spiritual survival after death."

NATIONAL IDEALISM AND THE BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER.

By STANTON COIT, Ph.D.

Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

"He that dies for righteousness dies for the faith."—ANSELM.

The teaching of this volume is based on the principle underlying this saying of Anselm's.

NATIONAL IDEALISM AND A STATE CHURCH.

By STANTON COIT, Ph.D. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

"A declaration of faith by the recognised leader of the ethical movement in this country."

A New Point of View.

BLAISE PASCAL. H. R. JORDAN. BLAISE PASCAL.

A PSYCHOLOGICAL STUDY.

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

THE TRUE WAY OF LIFE:

A Reply to Mr. J. ST. LOE STRACHEY,

By EDWARD GRUBB, M.A.

From THE SPECTATOR:—

"The essays in this volume, which appeared originally in the British Friend, are written from the Quaker point of view in reply to a series of articles reprinted from these columns and published under the title 'A New Way of Life.' We do not desire to enter into a discussion upon the merits of the book, for which a preface has been written by the Bishop of Hereford. . . . Our present object is merely to draw attention to the book, and recommend it to those of our readers who desire to see the other side put with ability and sincerity."

From the Foreword, by the BISHOP OF HEREFORD:—

"We welcome the arguments set forth in this volume. We feel that the writer is doing the best national and international service, that he is in the direct line of those great preachers of national righteousness, the Hebrew Prophets; and we believe that his preaching of the true way of national and international relationships, as herein set forth, is destined to prevail."

From PRINCIPAL SELBIE, Mansfield College, Oxford:—

"Thank you very much for sending me your little book. I am very glad you have written it, and quite agree with the position you take. I shall be very pleased to recommend it in any way I can."

From THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN (article by Prof. W. F. Adeney):—

"A little book written with a great purpose. . . . In calm firm language Mr. Grubb points out that the alternative brought before us is nothing less than that of paganism or Christianity. Practically the 'new way of life' ignores the application of Christian principles to international relations, and treats them quite frankly on the plane of paganism."

Price 1s. net.

Headley Brothers, Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.

inferences, his opinions, are not fair and unprejudiced. His treatment of Theodora, the wife of Justinian, is declared to be open to objection. "Without proper sifting and a reasonable scepticism, he has incorporated into his narrative the questionable account, with all its salacious details, which Procopius gives in his 'Secret History,' Gibbon's love of a scandalous tale getting the better of his historical criticism." On the other hand, Gibbon's portrait of Julian the Apostate is pronounced to be in accordance with the best modern standard. Dr. Rhodes's essays are fresh in tone and manner, and illustrated by a wealth of apt quotation.

* * *

UNDER the title of "The Mind of the Artist" (Chatto & Windus, 3s. 6d. net), Mrs. Laurence Binyon has collected two hundred and forty-three sayings of artists on their own craft, grouping them under such headings as "Aims and Ideals," "Study and Training," "Drawing and Design," "Manner," "Color," "Decorative Art," "Portraiture," "Modern Painting," and so forth. The choice of quotations is catholic enough, and since they include Chinese opinions from the fifth century and onwards, as well as plenty from the Middle Ages and modern times, it cannot be urged that their representation is too limited. Mrs. Binyon tells us that she has had recourse less to famous treatises like those of Leonardo and Reynolds, than to the more intimate avowals and working notes contained in letters or memoirs; and that the selection of these has entailed considerable research. We can well believe this, and the difficulty of such a compilation must be further enhanced by the fact that some of the most valuable sayings on Art have come from quite mediocre and little-known artists. Thus it is Northcote's sayings that are his passport to the company of Reynolds and Gainsborough; and Fromentin the writer is far better known than Fromentin the painter. Possibly Miss Binyon's selection of modern opinions could be improved upon; when one considers the mass of available material, the quotations from Burne-Jones, Watts, Rossetti, &c., seem to occur rather too frequently. But the general utility of the book cannot be questioned.

* * *

DR. W. H. GRIFFITH THOMAS'S "Christianity is Christ" (Longmans, 1s. net), is a volume in "The Anglican Church Handbook" series. Its aim, as Dr. Griffith Thomas says in a prefatory note, is "to present, in a short, popular form, the substance of what has been written in recent years on the central subject of Christianity—the Person and Work of Christ." The method adopted has been to examine a number of different aspects of Christ's work and teaching, and to present the doctrinal and apologetic inferences that may be drawn from each. Dr. Thomas's position is moderately conservative, but he has evidently made a close study of "modernist" views and arguments. Throughout the book stress is laid upon the witness of history, though the argument from experience is not neglected, and the handling of this in the last two chapters is, in our view, the weightiest section of the work. A very full bibliography adds to the value of a useful little volume.

* * *

THE average public school man's super-loyalty to his own school is one of those human weaknesses that we readily condone; indeed, the loveliness of the weakness might almost be said to be in proportion to its irrationality. So, when we find a book like Mr. Christopher Stone's "Eton" (Black, 7s. 6d. net), brimming over with enthusiasm for the place and everything connected with it, we accept his estimate of its virtues as pleasing and praiseworthy, even if a little extravagant. It is still more gratifying to discover that this loyal Etonian who attaches such importance to the "Eton touch," and so lightly extols the modern athleticism that "has given the death blow to work" here as in many another school, is yet capable of dealing sensibly with the vexed question of what ought to be the relations between boys and masters, and soberly with some of the less noble vanities of the Eton education. Moreover, the book is very agreeably written. The historical retrospect is neither long nor labored. Living old Etonians, who have achieved notoriety in the House of Lords or elsewhere, are hardly mentioned. The author's intention, he tells us, is to illustrate "the spirit of Eton," and his facts of history, taken mainly from R. A. Austen Leigh's "Guide to Eton College," and "Etoniana," and from Malim's quaint treatise, have been selected with that aim in view. Similarly, he discusses Collegers and Oppidans, Eton customs, obsolete or surviving, famous masters of the establishment, the college precincts, and many other topics, not according to any ordered scheme, but as they link themselves, one with another, in his mind, and suggest themselves as persuasive touches of "atmosphere." Thus the book is largely a book of digressions. But the picture left by the whole of it does not lack clearness; and beneath its loyal extravagances there lurks a sense of moderation—a suspicion, perhaps, that against such glories as those of the Eton Hunt, there must be placed such disgraces as that of the carted deer. Miss E. D. Brinton's illustrations are vigorous and pleasant, and they possess a quite exceptional unity.

* * *

DECIDEDLY there is a touch of Wild West journalism about Mr. Hugh C. Weir's "The Conquest of the Isthmus" (Putnam's Sons, 5s. net) of Panama. "Panama," observes the author genially on p. 117, "has been the cesspool into which the human refuse of the globe has been dumped in shiploads. . . . Thousands of them—the vomitings of a score of nations—were driven cattle-like into the hopper of the Panama Canal. And in the smoke of the greatest engineering battle of history, the contagion of the scowling stream of Europe's cast-off citizens was not appreciated until it had found festering lodgment." With these undesirable aliens on the one hand, and the jungle, with its alligators, its deadly black scorpions, its poisonous mosquitos, on the other, the makers of the canal, whom Mr. Weir sets out to describe, have had a more than ordinarily sensational time, and the author of this volume cannot be accused of not making the most of the material to hand. The way in which the perils of Panama have been overcome by American bravery, American medical science, American engineering, American policing—in short, by the well-known American superiority that every American recognises—is a not less thrilling part of the narrative. A pæan on Mr. Roosevelt as the inspiring force behind the men on the spot does not lack whole-hearted hero-worship, and the account of an alligator hunt takes us back to the days when boys' books were really generous with their thrills. The book, which is illustrated by photographs, contains a non-technical description of the canal and its machinery, and an excellent study of the civilisation implanted in this part of the world during the last five years.

* * *

"THE GROWTH OF THE ENGLISH HOUSE" (Batsford, 7s. 6d. net), by Mr. J. Alfred Gotch, deserves the warm appreciation of all who are interested in our domestic architecture. It is a masterly study of the development of the house from the middle of the twelfth century, when stone definitely took the place of wood as a building material, to modern times; from the Norman castle and keep to the private residence of to-day. It shows how the castle gradually gave way to the fortified manor house, and how, as the need for defensive construction disappeared, the fortification went also; how the expansion was always in the direction of greater comfort and privacy and more pleasing architectural effect; and how the various internal features of the house as we know it were evolved by slow degrees from their primitive predecessors. The staircase, perhaps, is the only feature whose development was not continuous; the circular stone staircase prevailed with but little variation until the Elizabethan age, when it was suddenly, and without any transitional stage, supplanted by the straight wooden one with wide steps that is familiar to observers of Elizabethan mansions. Undoubtedly this period was the most notable of any in regard to domestic architecture. House builders were beginning to realise that beauty in construction and decoration was not incompatible with utility and comfort. The reforming influence of the Renaissance had made itself felt in ornament, and had not yet disturbed the actual plan of the house, which, with all its piquant variations, remained essentially English. The triumph of classic ideals in plan, as well as in ornament, came with Wren and Inigo Jones in the next century; and the decadence that succeeded when the light of their genius was withdrawn became emphasised during Hanoverian times, until the last remnant of a style dissolved in the negation

NEW BOOK BY MR. AND MRS. SIDNEY WEBB ENGLISH POOR LAW POLICY

By SIDNEY and BEATRICE WEBB

8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Inland Postage, 5d.

This work consists of a detailed analysis of the policy of Parliament and the Local Government Board from 1834 down to the present day, with four supplementary chapters analysing the Majority and Minority Reports.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., 39, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

THE IDEA OF A FREE CHURCH

By HENRY STURT,

Editor of "Personal Idealism," author of "Idola Theatri."

An outline of a new Religious System on the basis of Pragmatism. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

"Its candour and the strength of its reasoning will give it value in the estimation of readers who wish for philosophic light, uncoloured by any sort of clerical prepossession, on the religious problems of this day."—Scotsman.

"Mr. Sturt's refreshingly original and brilliant exposition ought to be in the hands of everyone interested in the greater problems of to-day."—Westminster Review.

"Its vigour and stimulating clearness are remarkable."—Morning Leader.

WALTER SCOTT PUBLISHING CO., LONDON,
Felling-on-Tyne, and New York.

Labour in Portuguese West Africa.

By WILLIAM A. CADBURY.

Crown 8vo, with a Coloured Map, 2s. 6d. net.

Under the advice of counsel the publication of this book was postponed pending the libel action recently heard in the Courts. It is now issued with an additional chapter. It contains a full account of the author's personal experiences in S. Thomé and Principe, and on the Angola coast, and also reprints Mr. Burt's report of his previous visit and long journey to the Hinterland of Angola.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS, Ltd., 68-74, Carter Lane, London

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE.

6/- 2,800 "VICTORIAN" EDITION OF
BARRY'S TEACHERS' PRAYER BOOK.
2/- Being the Book of Common Prayer, with Introductions, Analysis, Notes and a Commentary upon the Psalter. By the Right Rev. ALFRED BARRY, D.D., D.C.L., and a Glossary by the Rev. A. L. MAYHEW, M.A. 16mo. Bourgeois, Large Type Edition. Cloth boards, red edges, 6s. for 2s. Abroad 2s. 2d.; Pastegrain, limp, gilt edges, 7s. 6d. for 3s. 9d.; Abroad 3s. 11d.; post free. 53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

GLAISHER'S REMAINDER BOOK CATALOGUE

For FEBRUARY (No. 369),

NOW READY, and will be forwarded on application.

It comprises a Specially Attractive Selection of Publisher's Reminders, including many Good Bargains.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., Booksellers, 265, High Holborn, London.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

THE INDEX TO VOLUMES I.—V. OF THE NATION

may be had free on application to the Manager.

BANKING.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSORFT, Secretary.

THE LONDON JOINT STOCK BANK, LIMITED.

Notice is hereby given that the Rate of Interest allowed at the Head Office and London Branches of this Bank, on Deposits subject to seven days' notice of withdrawal, is this day reduced to 1½ per cent. per annum.

CHARLES GOW, General Manager,

5, Princes Street, Mansion House. 10th February, 1910.

PARR'S BANK, LIMITED.

Notice is hereby given that the Rate of Interest allowed by this Bank at the Head Office and Metropolitan Branches, on Deposit at seven days' call, is 1½ per cent. per annum, until further notice.

R. W. WHALLEY, General Manager.

Bartholomew Lane, E.C. 10th February, 1910.

MUTUAL REGISTRATION OF ASSISTANCE.

The Charity Organisation Society is in need of VOLUNTEERS to act as HONOURARY REGISTRARS in connection with District Committees in London, and to carry out the Society's plans for REGISTRATION OF ASSISTANCE. The work affords opportunity for studying the co-ordination of Charitable Agencies, and for preventing "overlapping" and waste in charitable effort.

Those interested are invited to communicate with:—

C. S. LOCH, Secy.,

CHARITY ORGANISATION SOCIETY,

DENISON HOUSE,

VAUXHALL BRIDGE ROAD, S.W.

HIGHEST QUALITY TURKISH TOWELS AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY

BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;

And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME V. OF THE NATION

Is now ready, and can be obtained free on application to the Manager.

of all styles by the builders of the nineteenth century. Domestic architecture has revived somewhat in the last few years, and our one regret concerning Mr. Gotch's book is that it has little or nothing to say of this revival. Mr. Gotch shows so complete a grasp of facts and such powers of clear-headed deduction in his treatment of the house up to the end of the eighteenth century, that we cannot doubt but that, in the light of this knowledge, his handling of latter-day enormities, such as unscrupulous building and reckless land speculation, and the brave fight that is being waged against them, would have been informative and interesting. Perhaps he will devote a sequel to the building of the nineteenth century. For the moment, his book is a particularly sound piece of work, whose usefulness is enhanced by the profuse and finely got-up photographic and other illustrations that accompany the text.

The Week in the City.

	Price Friday morning, Feb. 4.	Price Friday morning, Feb. 11.
Consols	81 $\frac{1}{2}$	82 $\frac{1}{8}$
Midland Def.	58 $\frac{3}{8}$	58 $\frac{1}{2}$
Union Pacific	187 $\frac{3}{8}$	187 $\frac{1}{2}$
Buenos Ayres Pacific	89	88 $\frac{1}{2}$
U.S. Steel	81 $\frac{1}{4}$	80 $\frac{1}{8}$

THE reduction of the bank rate from 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 per cent., which occurred on Thursday, had been expected for several days, and the bank directors really had no choice, so far as the market rate below the official minimum. At practically the same hour on the same day the authorities of the Reichsbank at Berlin reduced their rate from 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ to 4 per cent. This general tendency to ease is satisfactory, and will give another fillip to trade which has been making remarkable strides in the last few weeks. The collapse in Americans has attracted buyers, and a sharp rally occurred on Wednesday in New York and yesterday in London. The Brazil Loan stands at a small premium, and the Stock Exchange is quite busy and cheerful. Paris, however, has had another fright, as the waters of the Seine have been rising again. The rubber market still provides the most sensational activity. A great many people will burn their fingers in rubber before the sound estates are separated from the swindles and failures.

THE BOOM IN TRADE.

If only the election could have been postponed another month, the Tariff Reformers would have done even worse than they did in our industrial districts. The Board of Trade Returns for January, in spite of the dislocation incident to a General Election, are quite sensational. Imports are 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ millions up, exports 6 millions, and re-exports 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ millions. The figure for exports is only just below the record of 1907. Here is a table giving the figures for the month of January for the last ten years. These are the values in million pounds sterling. The figure following the decimal represents hundred thousands:—

	Imports.	Exports.	Re-exports.
1900	44.5	23.6	5.4
1901	46.0	24.7	5.0
1902	50.1	24.3	5.3
1903	46.2	24.9	6.1
1904	46.1	24.1	5.7
1905	47.7	25.0	6.1
1906	53.5	30.8	7.4
1907	60.5	35.1	8.8
1908	56.4	34.4	6.6
1909	53.5	28.8	6.7
1910	55.9	34.8	8.1

To do them justice, the Tariff Reform League foresaw this boom of trade, and wanted to clap on a tariff before it had got well under way. This explains the desperate action of the House of Lords. Even manufacturers who have been bitten by the virus of protection would not go in for a tariff during a trade boom. This fact may save us from another election. Another election would be highly distasteful to City and business men.

A BIG BANK.

The report of the London City and Midland Bank, which appeared in our columns last week, is interesting as the report of one of our greatest institutions. A contemporary has been inquiring which is the biggest bank. If we look at deposits, the London City and Midland, with 69 millions, comes third, closely behind the newly amalgamated London County and Westminster; in "Advances and Loans" it comes second, two millions behind Lloyds; in paid-up capital and reserve it is second to the London County and Westminster. Sir Edward Holden, the bank's able chairman, predicted at the annual meeting that a good year is before us. The world, he said, "is on the threshold of a new prosperity," but he advised those interested in American securities to be exceedingly wary. Excellent advice; for, as he remarked, the American market is troubled by a vast quantity of undigested and indigestible railway debentures, though prices are now again beginning to look attractive.

THE COATS' MILLS AT PAWTUCKET.

A Scottish correspondent asks me for more details about the closing down of Messrs. Coats' mills at Pawtucket. He says that statements made by Messrs. Coats were used in Scotland against Free Trade. The truth is, I believe, that Messrs. Coats have different prices for their thread according to the tariff. Their prices at home are pretty stiff, in virtue of a practical monopoly, but nothing to their prices abroad. And yet if they would disclose their wages and hours of labor, their prices and profits at home and in their various protected factories, I have no doubt at all that it would result in a splendid vindication of Free Trade. If my correspondent will refer to the New York papers he will find that the lock-out at Pawtucket began at five thread mills on January 24th. It seems to have followed on a small strike by some of the boys, and a demand for more wages from the men. The wages, it is stated, were reduced one shilling in ten two years ago. The latest papers say there is some prospect of a settlement.

THE BRAZIL CONVERSION LOAN.

Although the price of this loan (4 per cent. bonds at 87 $\frac{1}{2}$) is, as I said last week, not very attractive, investors in Brazil are probably wise in preferring Federal to State issues, as the reputation of the House of Rothschild is bound up with the credit of the Central Government of Brazil. The prospects of the country are improving with the maintenance of the high price of rubber and with the partial removal of the coffee embarrassments which threatened the finances of the important State of Sao Paulo. The most interesting part of the loan is that which is to be devoted to railway construction in the northern rubber States of Ceara and Piahy. The new lines should open up new, and possibly rich, territory. One is glad to hear that the political dangers of trouble between Brazil and Argentina are diminishing. But a good deal will depend upon the approaching Presidential election.

LUCELLUM.

EVANS' ANTISEPTIC THROAT PASTILLES

are THE remedy for Loss of Voice, Huskiness or Soreness of the Throat, Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, &c. These Pastilles have an unrivalled reputation for their wonderfully soothing qualities for all Throat troubles. Made to a formula of the Liverpool Throat Hospital.

1/- and 4/6 per box

of all Chemists, Stores, &c.

Write for Sample enclosing 1d. stamp to cover postage to

EVANS SONS LESCHER & WEBB, Ltd.,

Hanover Street, Liverpool.

Ask for EVANS' Pastilles and refuse all imitations.

UNITED STATES OF BRAZIL.

Issue of £10,000,000 4 per cent. United States of Brazil Government Bonds.

This Loan will be applied for the conversion and redemption of the Western of Minas Railroad Company 5 per cent. Guaranteed Loan of 1893 as well as the United States of Brazil Government 5 per cent. Loan of 1907, and also for the extension and construction of railways in the States of Ceara and Piahy.

The President of the United States of Brazil having, in conformity with the authority contained in Article 68, Number 8 of Law No. 2,221 of the 30th December 1909, and in execution of Decree No. 7,669, of the 18th November, 1909, issued by virtue of the authorisation contained in Nos. 9 and 24, letter d, of Article 16 of the Law No. 2,050 of the 31st December, 1908, and also in conformity with Decree No. 7,853, dated the 3rd February, 1910, authorised the negotiation of the above Loan, MESSRS. N. M. ROTHSCHILD & SONS have to announce that they are ready to receive subscriptions at their office.

Subscriptions may be made either in cash, or in Bonds of the above-mentioned Loans.

Applications for the new Bonds, in exchange for Bonds of the above-mentioned Loans, will be received on Monday, the 7th instant, and on the five following days, viz., until Monday, the 14th instant, at 4 p.m., when the lists will be finally closed. No subscriptions will be received on Saturday.

The conversion will be effected as follows:—

Subscribers in Bonds will receive allotment in full.

The 4 per cent. Bonds are issued at the price of 87½. In the conversion every £100 of 5 per cent. Stock will be reckoned at par and a bonus of 10s. will be given on every £100 converted, the holders of the 5 per cent. Western of Minas Railway Bonds receiving in addition accrued interests from 1st September, 1909. Thus, every holder of a £100 5 per cent. Western of Minas Bond will, on converting, receive in exchange a £100 4 per cent. Bond and £13 in cash, plus £2 5s. (less income tax) in adjustment of accrued interest, and every holder of a £100 5 per cent. Bond of the Loan of 1907 will, on converting receive in exchange a £100 4 per cent. Bond and £13 in cash; but for cash differences on large amounts of Bonds, subscribers may elect to have new Bonds, the fractional surplus only being regulated by a cash payment; this option must be exercised when subscribing.

The repayment at par, but without the bonus of 10s. per cent., of all the Bonds not presented for conversion will be officially notified at the earliest possible date.

The 5 per cent. Bonds to be converted must be listed on forms, which can be obtained on application, and must be furnished with all the coupons not yet due.

Application must be made on the form provided herewith, and accompanied by a deposit of £5 per cent. in money or an approximate amount in convertible Bonds, unless subscribers prefer to deposit the whole of their Bonds when making application. The failure to deliver the Bonds converted, when the scrip is ready to be given in exchange, will render the deposit on application liable to forfeiture.

The list for cash subscriptions will be opened on Monday, the 7th instant, and closed on or before Monday, the 14th instant. No subscriptions will be received on Saturday.

Subscriptions are payable as follows:—

For every £100 stock, £5	0	0	on application.
	15	0	0 on allotment.
	15	0	0 on the 4th April, 1910.
	15	0	0 on the 9th May, 1910.
	15	0	0 on the 9th June, 1910.
	22	10	0 on the 18th July, 1910.

£87 10 0

Payment in full may be made under discount at the rate of £3 per cent. per annum on any Monday or Thursday after the scrip has been issued.

Interest will commence from the 1st February, 1910.

Allotments will be made as far as the Bond subscription will permit. In case the allotment should not require the whole deposit, the surplus will be returned; and if the deposit be insufficient for the first instalment on the amount allotted, the balance required must be paid forthwith. In case of no allotment being made, the deposit of the applicant will be returned.

The failure to pay any of the instalments will render all previous payments liable to forfeiture.

The Bonds will be issued to Bearer in sums of £100, £500, and £1,000 each, bearing interest at 4 per cent. per annum, with coupons payable half-yearly on the 1st February and 1st August in London in pounds sterling, and in Paris, Amsterdam, Hamburg, and Brussels at the exchange of the day, the first half-yearly coupon being due on the 1st August, 1910.

The redemption of the Loan will be effected by an accumulative Sinking Fund of ½ per cent. per annum, commencing in 1911, to be applied by purchase of Bonds when the price is under par, and when at or above par by drawings by lot.

Forms of application under both conditions are provided herewith, and it is expressly stipulated that any applicant having elected to pay, either in cash or in Bonds, cannot alter his engagement.

NEW COURT, 7th February, 1910.

No.....A

APPLICATION FOR CONVERSION OF BRAZILIAN 5 PER CENT. BONDS.

To MESSRS. N. M. ROTHSCHILD & SONS, GENTLEMEN,

.....request that you will convert for.....

£.....Nominal Capital of the Western of Minas Railroad 5 per cent. Loan of 1893.

£.....Nominal Capital of the Brazilian 5 per cent. Loan of 1907.

Total £.....into Brazilian 4 per cent Bonds on which I enclose the required deposit.

viz.: { £.....in Cash, } and.....agree to deliver to you

 { £.....in Bonds, }

In exchange for the allotment of 4 per cent. Bonds, the necessary 5 per cent. Bonds according to the conditions of your Prospectus of the 7th February, 1910.

.....remain, GENTLEMEN.

 Your obedient Servant ,

Name at length.....

Address.....

February, 1910.

I request you to allot me as many additional 4 per cent. Bonds as the amount of the cash difference due to me on the above application will permit.

No.....B

FORM OF APPLICATION.

(Cash Subscription.)

UNITED STATES OF BRAZIL GOVERNMENT 4 PER CENT. CONVERSION LOAN OF 1910.

To MESSRS. N. M. ROTHSCHILD & SONS, GENTLEMEN,

.....request that you will allot to £.....

say.....

nominal Capital of the above Stock, on which.....enclose the required deposit of five per cent., or £.....and

.....agree to accept that amount or any less sum that may be allotted to.....and to pay the balance of such allotment according to the conditions of your Prospectus of the 7th February, 1910.

.....remain, GENTLEMEN,

Your obedient Servant ,

Name (at length).....

Address.....

February, 1910.

THE

FIRST PRINCIPLES

OF INVESTMENT

(A Sequel to the Wheel of Wealth)

By Dr. J. Beattie Crozier

The well-known economist and author of "History of Intellectual Development," "My Inner Life," "Civilization and Progress," &c.

The Spectator says:—

"Mr. Crozier is known to English readers as one of the most versatile and original thinkers of the day."

The first chapter of this important work appears in the February number of the Financial

Review of

Reviews.

COUPON FOR APPROVAL COPY.

To the Financial Review of Reviews, 2, Waterloo-place, London, S.W.

Please send me (free of any charge), on approval for 10 days a copy of "Financial Review of Reviews" current issue, with option of having 12 shilling monthly parts sent post free for 10s.

NAME

ADDRESS.....

18 PF/S.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. By Post, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2 COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER. Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Scholarship Examinations in March, July and December.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.

BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.

(Neumham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

BOOTHAM SCHOOL.

HEAD MASTER:—ARTHUR ROWNTREE, B.A. (Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History and Practice of Education Cantab.)

Preparation for Universities.

Citizenship Course. Leisure Hour Work.

Sixty Boys passed University Entrance Examinations in the years 1905-9.

For prospectus, etc., apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

LEIGHTON PARK SCHOOL (Near Reading).

Under the Management of the Society of Friends.

Boys from this PUBLIC SCHOOL have done well at the Universities and in business careers.

The School stands in its own grounds of about 45 acres, high above the town and the Thames Valley.

For Honours List, Prospectus, particulars of Scholarships, and other information, apply to the Head Master, JOHN RIDGES, M.A., at the School.

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey, Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK.
K. M. ELLIS.

STRAMONGATE BOYS' SCHOOL, KENDAL.

A Boarding School for Boys.

Founded by the Society of Friends in Kendal.

A strong staff—leisure-time pursuits—school journeys—good games—gymnastics—a magnificent country district.

The school has doubled itself in the last five years.

Prospectus, School Magazine, etc., from WILFRED SESSIONS, B.Sc. Headmaster.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD, HASLEMERE, SURREY.

COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Sandy Soil. 600 feet above sea level.

Healthy out-door life, combined with thorough education on modern lines. Usual curriculum, including citizenship course, extension lectures, &c. Preparation when required for University and other careers.

Handicrafts, gardening, riding, nature study, archaeology, &c.

Principal: Miss AMY KEMP.

EDUCATIONAL.

SESAME HOUSE

for Home-life Training and for Training of Children, Lady Nurses and Kindergartners.—For full particulars apply,

The Principal, Miss EMILY LAST, 43A, Acacia Road, London, N.W.

TANGYE'S

TYPE "AA" OIL ENGINE

For Farm or Estate Work,
Country-House Lighting, &c.

TANGYES LTD., BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED
WHITE
& BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

TOURS.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."

£12 12s. OPORTO, GIBRALTAR, TANGIER, ALGIERS,
PALERMO, February 15th.

£26 5s. PALESTINE, EGYPT, CONSTANTINOPLE, GREECE,
March 3rd.

Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED).

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it

WILL BE REPLACED.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Bathrooms on every Floor,
Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading,
Billiard and Smoking Rooms.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) Single from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc.,
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN. Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) Hotel. Close Pier; 1st Class; moderate.SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week.BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.*BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.BRIGHTON.*THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.*THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara.DEAL.*BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.EASTBOURNE.*CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House. Sussex Gdns. 5/- day.HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.EDINBURGH.*ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel.GREAT YARMOUTH.*MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day.GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.*THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.ILFRACOMBE.*COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 rooms. Facing Sea.KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCs.*CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments.LANCASTER.*BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh.LEEDS.*HOTEL METROPOLE. 2 minutes' walk from either station.LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANDUDNO.The WHITE HORSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prem., facing sea.LLANELLY.*CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LYNTON (Devon).ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres.MALVERN.*HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson.MATLOCK.*SMEDLEY'S HYDRO. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand.ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes).NELSON.*RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station.OXFORD (near).*SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boar's Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c., Lecture.PENTRE.*PENTRE HOTEL, Rhendda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.SOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment.

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas. Tel. 647

ROCKLEY HYDRO. Electric and other baths; Excellent cuisine.
Lift. Near Golf Links From 7s. per day. Tel. 422.

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclist's Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop.WHITBY.*WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

Your Week End Is Not Complete

WITHOUT

The Saturday Westminster

(The Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette.")

It is the only Weekly Magazine Review of the kind.

"F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week.
An Unique page of "Problems and Prizes,"
Book Reviews and Special Literary
Articles by the best known Writers.

ONE PENNY. Post 6/6 per annum (home), 8/8 (abroad).

Offices: Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for
copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION
Office, 14 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION
PUBLISHING Co. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-
sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions
are received.

FICTION

- SAILORS' KNOTS. By W. W. JACOBS, Author of "Many Cargoes." Illustrated by WILL OWEN. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.
 "There is not a page without a good healthy, hearty laugh."—Morning Post.
 "They are works of art; they are real short stories."—Morning Leader. [Fourth Edition.]
- THE GOLDEN CENTPEDE. By LOUISE GERARD. Crown 8vo, 6s.
 "This is a fine story of adventure, and certainly a notable achievement for a new author."—Daily Mirror.
- WHY DID HE DO IT? By BERNARD CAPES, Author of "A Jay of Italy." Crown 8vo, 6s.
- COUSIN HUGH. By THEO DOUGLAS. (Mrs. H. D. Everett). Crown 8vo, 6s.

GENERAL LITERATURE

- "THE AUTOCAR" ROAD-BOOK. By CHARLES G. HARPER. In four volumes. With Route Maps Vol. 1. (South of the Thames.) Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
- THE HYGIENE OF SCHOOL LIFE. By RALPH H. CROWLEY, M.D., M.R.C.P. With 17 Diagrams and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.
- MONEY'S FISCAL DICTIONARY (1910). By L. G. CHIOZZA MONEY, Author of "Riches and Poverty." Demy 8vo, 5s. net.
- THE HOUSE OF LORDS AND THE CONSTITUTION. By J. H. MORGAN, M.A. With an Introduction by the Right Hon. the Lord Loreburn, G.C.M.G. Crown 8vo, 1s. net.
- THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND IN THE 18th CENTURY. By ALFRED PLUMMER, D.D. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. [Handbooks of English Church History.]
- THE SURVIVAL OF MAN: a Study of Unrecognised Human Faculty. By SIR OLIVER LODGE, F.R.S. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [Third Edition.]
 "It sums up the existing evidence of man's survival after death."—Daily Mail.
 "Strange things in heaven and earth are here set down."—Daily News.
 "One of the most remarkable volumes upon psychical research."—Dundee Advertiser.
 "Admirable at once scientifically and as a piece of literary exposition."—Manchester Guardian.
- THE YOUNG CARPENTER. By CYRIL HALL. With many Illustrations, crown 8vo, 5s. This delightful gift-book will afford pleasure to every boy.
- TREMENDOUS TRIFLES. By G. K. CHESTERTON. Fcap. 8vo, 5s. [Third Edition.]
 "There is bubbling humour; there is ripe philosophy."—Onlooker.
- ONE DAY AND ANOTHER. By E. V. LUCAS. Fcap. 8vo, 5s. [Third Edition.]
 "An elysium of humour and humanity."—Pall Mall Gazette.
- A WANDERER IN PARIS. By E. V. LUCAS. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by WALTER DEXTER, and 32 from Photographs after Old Masters. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Fourth Edition.]
 "The soul of Paris is caught and reflected in these pages."—Standard.
- GOOD COMPANY: A Rally of Men. By E. V. LUCAS. Fcap. 8vo, 5s. This is uniform with "The Open Road." "The title is just; the characters are pleasant companions, the anthology very agreeable."—Morning Leader.
- ON EVERYTHING. By HILAIRE BELLOC, M.P., Author of "On Nothing." Fcap. 8vo, 5s. [Second Edition.]
 "In this delightful book Mr. Belloc has caught the secret of the short essay."—Liverpool Post.
- MARIE ANTOINETTE. By HILAIRE BELLOC, M.P. With 35 Portraits and Illustrations, demy 8vo, 15s. net. [Second Edition.]
 "The story is told with a full appeal to contemporary evidence and with dramatic skill."—Standard.
- REMINISCENCES OF A K.C. By T. E. CRISPE, K.C. With 2 Portraits, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Second Edition.]
 "The book is an excellent one, and makes light and amusing reading."—Vanity Fair.
 "Much gossip, plenty of fun, many stories."—Observer.
- A BOOK OF THE ZOO. By ERIC PARKER. With 24 Illustrations from Photographs by HENRY IRVING Crown 8vo, 6s. The Author has tried in this book to make a round of the Zoological Gardens, and to show the Animals to a visitor as they appear to one who has spent many hours watching their individual characters and habits in captivity.
- THE WORKS OF OSCAR WILDE. A New Edition, reset in 12 vols. fcap. 8vo, 5s. net each.
 1. LORD ARTHUR SAVILE'S CRIME. 2. THE DUCHESS OF PADUA. 3. POEMS (including "The Ballad of Reading Gaol" and "The Sphinx"). 4. LADY WINDERMERE'S FAN. 5. A WOMAN OF NO IMPORTANCE. 6. AN IDEAL HUSBAND. 7. THE IMPORTANCE OF BEING EARNEST. 8. A HOUSE OF POMEGRANATES. 9. INTENTIONS. 10. DE PROFUNDIS AND PRISON LETTERS. (This is the Fourteenth Edition, and contains new matter.) 11. ESSAYS. 12. SALOME.
- SHELLEY: The Man and the Poet. By A. CLUTTON BROCK. With 12 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [Second Edition.]
 "A fine combination of penetration, accuracy, and charm."—Morning Leader.
- THE MAXIMS OF MARMADUKE. By C. E. JERNINGHAM. Fcap. 8vo, 5s. [Second Edition.]
 "The vivacity of the author never flags."—Daily Mail.
- ONE HUNDRED MASTERPIECES OF SCULPTURE. With an Introduction and Descriptive Notes by G. F. HILL. With 101 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. A splendid book. "Well chosen and well reproduced photographs of characteristic masterpieces."—Scotsman.
- THE DECLINE AND FALL OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE. By EDWARD GIBBON. Edited by J. B. BURY, Litt.D. In 7 vols. Vols. I., II., and III., demy 8vo, each 10s. 6d. net. This is a Completely New Edition, newly set in large type, with many Illustrations and new Maps.
- THE SHAKESPEARE FOLIOS AND QUARTOS. By ALFRED W. POLLARD. With numerous Facsimiles, Folio, 21s. net.
- BY THE WATERS OF EGYPT. By NORMA LORIMER. With 16 Illustrations in Colour and 32 other Illustrations, demy 8vo, 16s. net.
- THE AUSTRIAN COURT IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. By Sir HORACE RUMBOLD, late Ambassador at Vienna. With 16 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 13s. net. "Its survey is wide; it abounds in personal touches and is never lacking in human interest."—Daily Telegraph.
- RAPHAEL. By A. P. OPPE. With 200 Plates, wide royal 8vo, gilt top, 12s. 6d. net. [Classics of Art.]
 "A clear, exhaustive, and well-arranged biography."—Glasgow Herald.
- JESUS ACCORDING TO S. MARK. By the REV. J. M. THOMPSON. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.
- BROWNING'S PARACELSUS. Being the Text of Browning's Poem. With Introduction and Notes by MARGARET L. LEE and KATHARINE B. LOCOCK. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.
- THE CLERK OF OXFORD IN FICTION. By SAMUEL F. HULTON. With 12 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
- THE NINE DAYS' QUEEN. By RICHARD DAVEY, Author of "The Pageant of London." With a Preface by MARTIN HUME, M.A. With 12 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Romantic History.]
- MATILDA OF TUSCANY. By NORA DUFF. With many Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
- THE PILGRIM FATHERS: Their Church and Colony. By WINNIFRED COCKSHOT. With 12 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
- ST. TERESA OF SPAIN. By HELEN H. COLVILL. With 20 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
- THE INCOMPARABLE SIDDONS. By MRS. CLEMENT PARSONS. With 20 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
- THE COURT OF A SAINT. By WINIFRED F. KNOX. With 16 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

METHUEN & CO., 36, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

The Nation

VOL. VI., No. 21.]
Registered as a Newspaper.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1910.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., 4d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE		PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK ...	793	How Votes Were Won. By M. ...	812
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—		The Essence of Religion. By A.
The Crown and the Constitu-		I. Tillyard ...	812
tion ...	796	The Secrecy of the Ballot. By
"Veto First!" ...	797	J. Sowerbutts ...	812
"Reforming" the Lords ...	798	The Repertory Theatre. By
The Battle of the Prussian		William Poel ...	812
Bureaucracy ...	799	The Need for Liberal Propa-
A Party of Property ...	800	ganda. By A. de Natortp ...	812
LIFE AND LETTERS:—		POETRY:—
The Problem of the Village ...	801	The Combatants. By G. M.
Bread and Games ...	803	Hort ...	812
The Compensations		WORLD OF BOOKS ...	813
of Stupidity ...	804	REVIEWS:—
Confessions of a Juror ...	805	A Poet's Spring ...	814
COMMUNICATIONS:—		Lord Kelvin ...	815
The Merits of the Fisher		San Thomé Slavery. By Henry
Régime. By Arnold White ...	806	W. Nevinston ...	816
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—		A New Life of Thackeray ...	817
The Joke of the Election. By		A Bantu Nation ...	818
Yorick ...		From the Right Wing ...	818
Some Lessons of the Election.		A Clever American Novel ...	819
By an Old Hand. ...	808	BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
The Elections and the Small		The Rhythm of Modern Music	820
Holdings Act. By Marjory		Susan Warner ...	820
Pease, D. M. Stevenson and		Louis XVIII. ...	820
"Villager" ...	809	The Dunes in Lancashire ...	822
The Meaning of the		Tales from Tasso ...	822
Scottish Elections. By John		The Old Egyptian Faith ...	822
McCulloch ...	809	The Life and Times of Martin
The Next Step in Women's		Blake, B.D. ...	822
Suffrage. By Rosalind Traver-		An Introduction to the Study
ers and H. M. Swanwick ...	810	of Philosophy ...	822
Gladstone's Singing Voice. By		Stories of the French Artists	824
Sir Edward Russell and the		Lay Sermons from the
Right Hon. G. W. E. Russell		"Spectator" ...	824
The Liberal Press in Scotland.		THE WEEK IN THE CITY. By
By D. M. Wilson and William		Lucellum ...	824
Harvie ...	811

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

A POLITICAL situation of great seriousness has arisen, and must be dealt with sensibly and firmly. The new Chairman of the Labor Party in Parliament, Mr. Barnes, has made the following statement to the Press:—

"I learn that, in spite of the Albert Hall speech, Mr. Asquith is to hold office without assurances from the King in regard to the Veto, and that, moreover, the veto is to be dealt with only after the Budget. I know that that course will not be acceptable to the Labor Party. It means that the Powers that be think the recent General Election not sufficiently decisive in regard to the Veto. It involves, therefore, another General Election before the question of the Lords is settled, and it seems to me perfectly clear that if a General Election is to take place we should have it as soon as possible. Of course, the reply to all this is, or may be, that the finance of the country must be straightened out. All I have to say is that, if there is confusion, let the responsibility be put upon those who caused it. But no doubt the difficulties could be got over by loans or otherwise."

It is remarkable that neither this declaration nor Mr. Redmond's speech has been received with any sign of irritation by the Liberal Party, which largely sympathises with the policy it sets forth. Two courses lie open to the Government, and two only, for we leave out as mere folly the suggestion that it should fall back on Unionist support—a support which, in the first place, would not be given, and, in the second place, could not be accepted with honor. The first is to satisfy the party as to the prospects of the Veto Bill and the policy founded on it should the Lords throw it out. If this is more than the Prime Minister can at the moment guarantee, the obvious course is the immediate production of the measure to which he and his party are equally committed as the first-fruits of the election.

WHAT insuperable obstacle exists to the tactic of "Veto First"? We see none. The Budget may have to wait a week or so. We shall have to borrow money to carry on in the interim, until the confusion created by the action of the Lords can be set right. Is that a great matter? When a man's house is on fire he looks after his most precious possessions first, and a Minister resting on a composite majority naturally presses the point on which he finds the clearest evidence of harmony.

THE next question is—Can the Veto Bill be tabled without delay? We have always understood that a brief and simple measure was in existence, based on the Campbell-Bannerman resolution. Is there any reason against its introduction now? Or another form of procedure is available, which has the special merit of bringing to a still speedier test the power of this House to act in the direction in which its most powerful mandate lies. That is the introduction of a simultaneous resolution in the House of Lords and the House of Commons. If the one is carried by our full majority, and the other defeated by an equally overwhelming voice, and if a final resort to the King then fails, the Government is functus officio, and a fresh resort to the force which created the majority can be made with every prospect of success. But, in any case, we see no reason why the different parts of the majority should not come together on the issue which all declare to be paramount, and all, so far as we know, wish to compass in the same way.

A SERIES of Cabinet meetings, more or less prolonged, have been held during the week, and grave questions both of policy and tactics have been before them. The King has also seen the Prime Minister for an hour at Brighton, and for a shorter period on Thursday. These events have been accompanied by informal meetings between Mr. Lloyd George, on the one hand, and Mr. Redmond, Mr. Dillon, and Mr. O'Connor, on the other hand, a proceeding which we cannot but think might have been initiated at an earlier stage of the situation. We are not aware that Wellington was ashamed to consult the allies who helped him to win Waterloo.

So far as the matter of these consultations is concerned, the governing part of Mr. Redmond's policy is, no doubt, his anxiety on the question of guarantees. He is anxious for a determined prosecution of the policy of attack on the Veto, and, secondly, for a successful issue to it. The exact facts lie between the King and the Prime Minister, but it may be assumed that the relation between the Sovereign and the Ministry represents something more than the general state of confidence that the Monarch extends to his advisers. The Crown could not have looked with satisfaction upon the great constitutional breach committed last November, involving, as it did, a serious diminution of its own powers. It could not but welcome a return to the normal balance, and, finally, it could not but watch with friendly eyes an effort to start the machine of party government on its ordinary lines. Whether this amounts to a promise on the part of the King to see an Act of Veto through is more than we can say, but it seems incredible that general guarantees on the constitutional question have not been or cannot be sought.

* * *

On the whole, Mr. Redmond's speech, as we have said, is by no means unwelcome to the Liberal Party, the great majority of whom are undoubtedly inclined to the policy of Veto first. They will, of course, assent to the passing of the great Budget, on which so much of the popular battle has been fought, but they make it clear that in Scotland and the North the subject of the Lords holds the field, and that there should be:—

1. No diversion to the so-called policy of "reform";
2. The earliest possible production of the Veto Bill, and
3. An assurance that all the constitutional powers should be used to give effect to the popular verdict.

* * *

For the rest, we hope that our leaders will get the notion out of their heads—if they have ever entertained it—that there is anything undignified or unusual in the conduct of "group" politics. If they think so, they have only to ring up M. Clemenceau, M. Briand, M. Combes, or Herr von Bethmann Hollweg on the telephone, and ask them their experience. Anyone who has attended the sittings, say, of the French Chamber in a period of crisis, has seen the Prime Minister openly consulting the leader of a supporting group, or withdrawing with him, in the sight of the House, for a private conference. In what respect is Mr. Redmond or Mr. Barnes different from M. Sarrien or M. Jaurès? In one respect only, that both these gentlemen are under an obligation to serve their country without looking to the average rewards of political life. As for the Irish leaders, who does not realise that Mr. Redmond, and Mr. Dillon, and Mr. T. P. O'Connor all belong to the Cabinet class, and have served as thorough an apprenticeship as any English or Scottish or Welsh gentleman now in the King's confidence?

* * *

A NUMBER of changes have been made in the Government as a consequence of Mr. Gladstone's appointment as Governor-General of South Africa. Mr. Churchill goes to the Home Office, and his place at the Board of Trade has been taken by Mr. Sydney Buxton. The Post Office is placed in charge of Mr. Herbert Samuel, and Mr. Pease, in spite of his defeat in Saffron Walden, is promoted to Mr. Samuel's place at the Duchy of Lancaster, and to a seat in the Cabinet. Finally, a new Chief Whip is found in the Master of Elibank. All but one of these changes should add both to the strength and the popularity of the Government. Mr. Churchill's brilliant services at the elections and his great qualities of administration and exposition fully entitle him to the vacant Secretaryship of State, and Mr. Buxton's special knowledge of industrial questions consoles us for the loss of so good a Postmaster-General. Both Mr. Samuel and Mr. Murray have the qualities which earn promotion. But we confess we do not like the appointment of an unsuccessful candidate and a not too successful Whip to a seat in the Cabinet, which cannot be too strong in counsel and experience. Frankly, we did not like Mr. Pease's attitude to the Irish question, or his conduct of the Liberal-Labor problem, contrasting as it did with his predecessor's careful and skilled solution of it.

* * *

THE new Parliament enters on its serious work on Monday, last week being entirely given up to the election of Mr. Lowther as Speaker, and the swearing-in of members. Mr. Lowther's re-election was never in doubt. If possible the feeling for him is warmer in the Liberal and Labor Parties than with the Conservatives. The truth, we suppose, is that the Speaker's temperament exactly suits a modern House of Commons which, profoundly respectful as it is to its Chairman, likes to be ruled with a light, if a firm, hand. None of our politicians radiate so much humor and tact as Mr. Lowther, and if, as we expect, the atmosphere of this House will be far more highly strung than that of the last, we shall look with perfect confidence to his governance of it. Mr. Burt, who moved him into the chair, properly laid stress on these qualities of management, and added, significantly, that he was sure that Mr. Lowther would protect the privileges of the House from external encroachments. A sad feature of the swearing in was the appearance of Mr. Chamberlain for the first time since his seizure in the summer of 1906. We suppose it was thought necessary for him to take the oath in order to complete his membership of the House, which cannot hope to know him as the great gladiator of other days. The roll was signed for him by his son, but Mr. Chamberlain was able to exchange greetings with the Speaker. We think, however, that so painful a scene might well have been avoided.

* * *

LORD ROSEBERY took the chair at a dinner on Tuesday night given to Mr. Harold Cox by the British Constitution Association. Both Lord Rosebery's and Mr. Cox's speeches were devoted to attacks on the party system, which Lord Rosebery declared to be crushing all independence in Parliament, so much so that only one refuge for freedom remained, and that was the House of Lords. Under our political system a man who was not prepared to "pool his conscience" became anathema, and was expelled as "grit" in the machine. Yet he represented the great mass of silent voters, who stood for freedom against bureaucracy and Socialism. Mr. Cox, in a similar but more philosophical vein, declared that the party system represented a dead idea, because it divided the country between two organisations, each of which set out the falsehood that it was always right and its opponent always wrong. He insisted that, under this system, the control of legislation by the Commons was utterly unreal, and that the country was governed by alternating tyrannies becoming more and more rigid in character. The growth of new parties was something of a relief, but, unfortunately, they tended to Socialism, which was not an aid, but an obstacle, to progress. The only body of which Mr. Cox appeared to entertain any hope was the Middle-Class Defence League, and even that had a class limitation.

* * *

THE prolonged tariff war between Canada and Germany has come to an end on terms which demonstrate the need for a relatively free exchange which links even the most Protectionist countries. Canada had denounced her treaties with Germany and Belgium. Germany replied by imposing her maximum tariff, to which Canada retorted by a prohibitive duty of one-third ad valorem on German imports. In the end, both have returned to the status quo, neither better nor worse for the wanton stoppage of trade. From March 1st, by a provisional arrangement, Canada will take off this surtax on German imports, while Germany will admit all the staple goods of Canada at the conventional rates. A permanent Commercial Treaty will be negotiated later. This arrangement means the failure of the German protest against the preferential treatment which Canada has accorded to British goods. The chief factor in hastening the German capitulation seems to have been the spectacle of the mutually advantageous treaty concluded between Canada and France. In the benefits of this she naturally desires to share. The whole episode serves to show the futility of the special bargaining which is achieved by the use of the big revolver. In the end the advantages are always shared out pretty equally all round, and the war has left behind it nothing but its losses. We, who benefit automatically under the most favored nation clause by every special arrangement concluded between other nations, avoid the losses of war and reap all the fruits of victory.

* * *

WE discuss elsewhere the brutally frank speech in which Herr von Bethmann Hollweg defied Prussian opinion, by refusing any real reform of the plutocratic franchise. On Sunday the Socialists organised an impressive series of demonstrations in all the towns of the kingdom. They were confined, however, by the police, to closed halls; "the streets," as the laconic notice issued in Berlin put it, "are for traffic." Police armed with sabres were everywhere, and the trams circulated with locked doors past the palaces and public buildings. In Berlin, however, and in several provincial towns, street-demonstrations none the less took place, especially at Halle. The police behaved with their customary brutality, and many of the demonstrators were wounded, and more arrested. It is significant of the temper of the Prussian workmen, that wherever the behaviour of the police was worst, renewed demonstrations of protest took place on the following days. At Halle a man's hand was severed by a sabre-cut. Herr von Bethmann Hollweg's declaration that Prussia must remain bureaucratic, lest the Empire as a whole should be democratised, has been deeply resented by the more liberal public opinion of Southern Germany, where the Press as a whole has protested with some heat. At Munich the Socialists even contrived to hold a mass meeting of indignation outside the Prussian Legation. The Socialists are seriously considering the advisability of resorting suddenly to a general strike.

* * *

THE British and Russian Ministers in Teheran have notified the Persian Government of the acceptance of the Persian proposal for a loan of £400,000. Onerous conditions, however, are attached to this service. There is apparently no general stipulation for a financial control. But, according to the "Novoe Vremya," each Power demands that its officers shall "instruct" the Persian forces within their respective spheres. There is also a claim for certain trading monopolies, e.g., that Russia shall alone have the right to steam navigation on Lake Urmiah on the Turco-Persian frontier. If these terms are accurately reported the partition of Persia has been carried a stage further. What one small force of Persian Cossacks under Russian officers could effect under the late Shah's rule we know. The subjection of all the Persian forces to foreign officers would be the end of any real independence. It is believed that the Mejliss will reject these terms, and, indeed, it has just formally demanded the withdrawal of the three thousand Russian troops from Persian soil.

* * *

BUT its situation, while Sir Edward Grey acquiesces in this Russian occupation, is hopeless. It can refuse Russian officers, but it cannot expel Russian regiments. And for want of money it is unable to repress the brigandage, whose continuance will doubtless be the pretext for fresh encroachments. If Persia were free to borrow elsewhere, e.g., in Berlin, this pressure would be less tyrannical. But any Power which helped the Mejliss would be held by its two "Protectors" to have done an unfriendly act. British policy has apparently consented to the destruction of a promising experiment in self-government, and means have been found to render the victory of the Nationalists abortive. Persia has, indeed, a Parliament, but it has become a foreign dependency.

* * *

OFFICIAL opinion in this country has assumed much too soon that the battle of reform in the Congo has been won. It is quite a mistake to pretend that the Belgian critics of Congo misrule are satisfied with the present prospect. In the debate on the Budget M. Georges Lorand declared that he had confidence in the new King, but none at all in M. Renkin, his Minister. M. Vandervelde described the reforms as a "blind," and declared that rubber collecting has been only partially stopped in the larger concession areas. But the discovery of fresh scandals, which has followed on King Leopold's death, is a new factor, tending to discredit the old régime even in Belgium. Mr. Morel believes that the late King secretly appropriated no less than £2,000,000 from the Royal Domain (in addition to the "compensations" which were sanctioned) when the nation bought him out. If this can be recovered and used for the good of the natives, much good may result, and, incidentally, the scandal may prove fatal to M. Renkin. But the real difficulty is that the old system can be reformed and the concessionaires ejected only at a great loss to the public treasury, and the Government is not likely to face the unpopularity which this would involve. There is as yet, outside the Socialist Party, and always excepting a few individuals, no general awakening of the Belgian conscience.

* * *

THOUGH it has promised shortly to dissolve, the Military League continues to rule Greece by sheer terrorism. There is no doubt that its plan of calling a National Assembly is thoroughly unpopular alike with deputies and the general public. It this week suppressed all the newspapers which criticised it, and placed troops in their offices; they have since reappeared, but keep silence on this subject. It has, however, given a pledge that the National Assembly, when it meets in December next, will not interfere with the dynasty—a naive admission that though nominally dissolved it reckons on controlling the Assembly. The officers of the Fleet, who appear to regard the Military League with a commendable mistrust, drew up a declaration of loyalty to the dynasty and the Constitution on February 5th, and were later suspected of entertaining a plan to seize or overawe the capital. The League has replied by beginning to disarm the ships, and the torpedo flotilla has already been compelled to land its ammunition. The larger vessels, if they are in the same condition in which the Græco-Turkish war found them, probably carry no shells. More troops are being concentrated on Athens. Money meanwhile is urgently needed, and it is certain that Europe will lend none while this folly lasts.

Politics and Affairs.

THE CROWN AND THE CONSTITUTION.

"I have to report to the House that in the House of Peers . . . I have in your name and on your behalf laid claim by humble petition to his Majesty to all your undoubted rights and privileges. All these, his Majesty, by his Commissioners, has been pleased to confirm in as ample a manner as they have ever been granted or confirmed by himself or by any of his predecessors."—The Speaker to the House of Commons.

THE Parliament which virtually opens on Monday will, we hope, proceed straight to the object for which those who control it were elected, namely, the restoration of representative government. No better instrument exists for that purpose than a newly chosen House of Commons. We all agree that this country is governed in the last resort in accordance with the will of the people, and that the effective representative of that will exists in the shape of the majority of the elective House. If this is true, things are very wrong in our State. Four years ago that will was expressed more clearly than in any Parliament since the first Reform Bill. But within a year of the creation of that force, it was held up by another power in the Constitution, and within two years of the time for its normal dissolution it was violently broken up by a breach of the fundamental liberties of the Commons. That defiance the present House must repel; that breach it must repair. We believe that it possesses sufficient authority to achieve a great part of its task, and that so far as the usurpation of the Lords is concerned, whether financial or legislative, no man who calls himself a democrat, be he Irish or English, will side with the unrepresentative against the representative assembly.

But it remains true that in itself the House of Commons is powerless to reconquer in full a position which was only lost because a wide field of historic custom was ruthlessly laid waste. For a rehabilitation of the representative power, and a return to the normal balance of parties, the nation, in face of the revolutionary attitude of the peers, can only look to the Crown. Such a recourse is its undoubted right, and either to deny or to disparage such a reference is to exhibit ignorance of the spirit and the forms of the Constitution, or lamentable weakness in applying them to our present needs. As things stand, we possess two rational, pliable, essentially modern parts of the Constitution. The King is a model of the form of monarchy willingly resigned to the loss of direct executive power, and looking for the exercise of that power to Ministers responsible to the Commons. In their turn, the Commons and their governing heads answer readily to signs that the nation is thinking of a change of governors. But a third party exists, immovable and inveterate in its partisanship, and pushing arrogance to the point, not merely of asserting literal rights against the spirit of representative rule, but directly invading its habitual sphere. This body is not subject to any form of popular influence, which could avenge its direct assault on the Constitution. But by its very nature it is subject to pressure from the Crown, acting on the advice of its Ministers. It is liable to additions, made with a purpose. Its composition can be gradually changed by the creation of small batches of new peers. Had it contained a spark of the modern spirit, it might, half a century ago, have admitted a reform which would have greatly strengthened its intellectual character, though not its permanent bias against democracy. But in times of serious conflict, it has been made amenable by a more dramatic intervention of the Crown in the shape of a threat of wholesale creations. Is that power denied to-day? If it is, then not only is the Monarchy reduced to a cipher, but only one form of government presents itself in the near future. Conservatism must come back to power, with Liberalism in permanent opposition, and a revolutionary propaganda will be preached by the advanced parties in our politics. In other words, the Crown and one of the two great political parties are equally to suffer for the madness of the Lords. Those who desire such an issue are neither Liberals nor Conservatives in the true sense of the word. They are either reckless reactionaries of the Milner type, or they desire a forcible change in the system of government. This is the real issue; and Mr. Redmond has shown himself a sound constitutionalist when he pointed, in his Dublin speech, to the quarter from which alone a way out can be found. They are no true friends of the Crown who would belittle its power for good at a moment when it is specially available for the service of the country; and they are no friends of the people who would have them give away one inch of their right to the restoration of the full power of self-government. The House of Lords has no claim to the absolute status which is now asserted for it. Neither its members nor its constitution are sacred, and to deny the Royal power of drastic dealing with it to-day, to-morrow, and the next day, is, in face of its purely non-elective basis, to place both the Crown and the House of Commons under its feet.

When these facts are recognised, the path of the Government begins to clear. Everything must be done to destroy the new claim of equi-pollency between the Lords and the Commons; nothing must be done to advance it. The cardinal error of the Government would therefore be to set up any scheme of reform, elective or partially elective, nominated or partially nominated; its obvious and only duty and act of faithfulness to its supporters are to take the House of Lords as it is, and to shear it of the absolute Veto. We have nothing to do with pulling an estate of the realm to pieces, or with jerry-building a new Constitution. We have to make the old fabric water-tight. Whatever may be the ultimate form of the Second Chamber, it would be an act of plain treachery to British democracy to suggest an equality of power between it and the great central authority in our State, round which every battle of liberty has been fought. No other remedy but the destruction of the Veto has been canvassed at the election; no other could be presented to the King with the assurance that it represented a formidable mass of serious and determined opinion, on which he would feel justified in acting; no other would pass this House of Commons; for no other work upon the House of Lords is the Liberal Party equipped by tradition and habit of thought.

Nor need we even discuss the proposition that any part of this work can be achieved by concert between the two parties. Such a suggestion is a mere trick of the Conservative partisan, who knows that the Lords are in the wrong, and that after last year's action the situation has become intolerable. Therefore, the ranks of the Liberals must be divided into reformers and anti-Vetoists. But why should they be divided? The present crisis was caused by the act of Mr. Balfour in calling on the House of Lords to defeat the action of the House of Commons. The precedents he set in 1906, 1907, and 1908 led to the final usurpation of 1909, when the full challenge to self-government took place. The passing of the Budget would not relieve this situation, nor the carrying of a Bill restoring the Commons' control over finance. The Liberal Party would still be condemned to complete sterility. Unless the Veto goes, it must go, and if Mr. Asquith thinks that he does not see his way to achieve such a purpose with the forces at his disposal, the sooner he resigns the better. The power which sustained him last month will, as we show elsewhere, spring again, Antæus-like, from the ground, as often as he appeals to it with the right weapons in his hand. Our adversaries possess no such power of recuperation. Moneyed and aced to the lips as it is, the Tory Party cannot stand defeat after defeat, knowing all the while that it is defending a bad cause and that the more closely the battle is concentrated on the Lords' issue the greater will be the disintegration in its natural fighting strength. Boldness, therefore, is clearly our line. But reliance on the forces which can really help us, and which really want our assistance, is equally necessary. For our part we should not hesitate to draw closer the lines of unity with the Irish Party. Till the constitutional battle is over, neither their politics nor ours can move a step forward, and so long as the one common object of the Progressive parties is pursued, substantial diversity ought to be impossible.

"VETO FIRST!"

UNDER any ordinary circumstances the first work of the new Government would be to relieve the country from the financial embarrassments caused by the action of the House of Lords. The action of that House, if it has done nothing else, has demonstrated the impossibility of two-chamber finance, and justified the old principle of our Constitution which united the executive and financial branches of government in the same hands, and made them responsible to a single chamber representing the people as a whole. Whatever constitutional reconstruction may ultimately rise out of the débris left over from the revolution of last November, the sole and undivided control of finance, and through finance of the executive, will remain assured to the House of Commons alone.

But the question thus raised cuts deeper than any immediate financial exigency. There are resources known to financiers by which the King's Government can be carried on for yet another month or two without the regular legalisation of the taxes. It is an inconvenience. It involves loss. The responsibility for the inconvenience and the loss lies, not with the Government, but with the Lords. For the Government the one supreme duty is to vindicate the constitutional rights of the people. Everything, including the immediate exigencies of finance, must be sacrificed to the fundamental object.

The point has been emphasised by the public declarations of the Irish and now of the Labor Party. But it is felt every whit as strongly by Liberals themselves. In dealing with a complicated entanglement, the simplest and most straightforward course is best. Mr. Asquith made a very clear statement of policy before and during the elections. He narrowed the issue, so far as he was able to define it, to a single point. He made the removal of those obstacles to legislation which the Lords have been able to oppose during the last Parliament the condition precedent to any further legislative effort, and he declared in terms which received only one interpretation from his followers that no Liberal Government would resume or hold office without guarantees that those obstacles would be overcome. All that is immediately necessary to him is to follow rigidly on the lines of this declaration. We do not say that his followers want any proof of his intentions. They take his word. That he continues to hold office is for them under the circumstances sufficient proof that he has good hope of finding a solution for the constitutional difficulty. The case of the Irish and the Labor Party is, of course, not quite the same as that of Mr. Asquith's own followers. We cannot expect Mr. Redmond to take everything for granted, and when a Budget, for some portions of which the Irish have no particular attachment, is being debated, it is quite natural to expect that Mr. Redmond should want to be assured of reasons, of which his followers will approve, for making the path straight for English Liberals. Nor can the Labor Party, jealous of its independence, and rightly determined on putting the Veto question before everything, be content to leave the handling of the situation entirely to the discretion of the leader who, however friendly, is not personally responsible to them. But neither the Labor nor the Irish Parties have, in fact, laid down as a condition of support anything beyond what Liberals have themselves assumed as indispensable. They have assumed, that is to say, that Mr. Asquith would only continue in office if he saw reasonable prospect of being able to give effect to the united will of his party and its two allies, by passing in this Parliament a Bill dealing alike with the financial and legislative Veto. They have assumed that the moment that the prospect of passing such a Bill is closed, Mr. Asquith would lay down office, leaving the responsibility for the government of the country, and, therefore, of supply, to those who have created the present situation. What is now needed, then, is that Mr. Asquith should take the public into his confidence, table his plan for assuring the ultimate supremacy of the Commons in legislation as well as in finance, and indicate the procedure by means of which he expects to carry this plan into law. Provided that the lines of his proposal are before the public and that some assurance can be given that it will not fall fruitless to the ground, there will be no want of harmony within the ranks of the majority, and no disposition to cavil on minor points of tactics.

The fight will be a hard one. For here the controversy between plutocracy and democracy comes at last to a head. It is not one social reform that is in question, but the key to them all. In such a fight it may conceivably be that we shall lose the first round. A risk must be taken, but as long as the aim of the Government is clear—as long as it suffers no one to entice it away from the policy already set before the public, as long as it stands before the eye of the world clearly prepared to sacrifice place and power for this single end, so long it will command the adhesion of an unbroken party. For the strongest and most stable of the national forces are on its side. The unbroken phalanx of the North, the great labor organisations of Lancashire and the West Riding, the unquenched ardor of Scotland and Wales, the industrial portions of London, and even those parts of the Midlands where the fear of the foreigner does not obscure the issue—all these forces, representing just what is most alive in the nation to-day, are eager for the word of command, and ready to repeat the victory of last month. On the other hand, let there be the slightest symptom of hesitation, the slightest suggestion that the freely-banded charges of insincerity in this matter were grounded in fact, and a process of dissolution would be set up which would end in something far graver than an ordinary Parliamentary or electoral defeat. The question of the Veto is the turning point in our political and social development. It is the node at which conflicting waves impinge on one another. It is also, and for the same reason, the decisive point in the history of the Liberal Party. Any paltering with such an issue is, we are sure, out of the question. The Government will, no doubt, indicate to the public its plan without another week's delay. This plan will, we cannot doubt, run on the broad lines of that which it has already put before the public in the last Parliament. It will be that which has already been in substance before the people, and for which the constituencies, by a majority of 124, have given their adhesion. This is Mr. Asquith's authority, and it is authority enough. He needs no second appeal on the same issue. He has his mandate. It is the mandate that he asked for. It remains for him only to devise the means of carrying it into effect, and all his followers have to say is that the stronger and more prompt his action, the greater the store of their enthusiasm that he will call forth.

"REFORMING" THE LORDS.

THERE is something humorous and very human in the eagerness with which defenders of the Peers, seeking to avoid the wrath to come, are tumbling over one another with schemes of reformation. Regarded as signs of grace, such proposals are not displeasing. They even furnish a quite interesting practice in political aerostatics. Indeed, we see no reason why, by next Christmas, "Reforming the Lords" should not have become a favorite parlor game. Its elasticity affords infinite scope for ingenuity: its permutations and combinations are virtually inexhaustible. The number of players in a team, the ways of selecting them, the length of innings, the rules on "getting out," methods of scoring and of counting points, to say nothing of the purely material conditions of the game, the size of the ground, the height of the goal-posts, the size, weight, &c., of the ball; each of those matters admits endless discussion and amendment, with no possible finality of settlement. The real title of this game, however, is not "Reforming the Lords" but "Procrastination." If there were one quite obvious and inevitable way of reform, to which all reformers must eventually tend, Reform of the Lords might be treated as practical politics. But there is no such common ground or basis of agreement. The field of discussion is already crowded with an almost inextricable tangle of contending and overlapping proposals. Take any material factor into the issue—for instance, the question how far the hereditary element shall be retained, or how far direct popular election shall be adopted as a method of appointment. The "Spectator" would "prefer the establishment of a Second Chamber on a purely democratic and representative basis, differing from the House of Commons in the smallness of its numbers, and in the fact that it was chosen at a different time, and under different conditions as to the representative areas, but not differing in its electoral basis." But, assuming that the House of Commons would not consent to establishing what must either be a rival or a replica, the "Spectator" falls back upon a mixed House of 350 members, of whom 150 shall be elected by the peers out of their own numbers, 150 by City and County Councils, the other 50 consisting of law lords, bishops, with representative divines from other churches, colonial high commissioners, and ex-cabinet ministers. A tremendous fall, indeed, from the representative electoral character of the "Spectator's" best to its second best! Not dissimilar, though rather less elective, is the project of the "Observer," which would like to see a House of about 350 members, not more than 200 being peers of the realm, sitting by right of their order, the others being life peers, or other lords, nominated or elected for a term of office. The "Observer's" House would in effect be constituted thus: "(1) Hereditary Peers, entitled to sit by high public services, or selected by the whole body of their order at the beginning of a Parliament, (2) Life Peers, (3) temporary Peers, nominated or elected for a tolerably long term, and (4) Lords Spiritual representing not only the Established Church, but all the great religious denominations of the United Kingdom—perhaps also of the chief self-governing Colonies."

The scheme of Lord Rosebery's own Committee of 1908 still retained, it will be remembered, the hereditary principle as the staple, only admitting a small alloy of outsiders appointed and not elected either directly or indirectly. The "Spectator" and "Observer" schemes thus represent concessions to the elective method and the representative idea. The "World" makes a further advance in the attack upon the hereditary principle, insisting that, "apart from the Royal dukes, not a single peer should hold his seat by virtue of hereditary right." On the other hand, with equal vehemence it declares against popular election. "Power must come through merit, not through birth." How this House of meritorious persons is to be constituted in the first place, it fails to explain, only urging that vacancies should be filled up by life peers appointed by the Prime Minister for the time being.

These samples will serve to indicate how hopeless it would be to expect any agreement upon the nature of reform among Conservative reformers. If Liberals were called upon, as at present they are not, to participate in the game, its difficulty would become far more complicated, and its goal more remote. Among defenders of the Lords, or enemies of popular self-government, there is only one common purpose, viz., to present a vision of a Second Chamber in appearance more conformable to modern thought, but retaining the predominant political proclivities of the present House of Lords. If they can so reconstruct and redecorate the Second Chamber as to be able to advertise it in the capacity of a commodious modern residence provided with electric lighting and all the latest improvements, they reckon that another long lease may be obtained from the gullible British public. To clear out the "rotters" and the backwoodsmen, to admit some persons from outside, of eminence and specious merit, entering as ex-officio or appointed members, to concede just so much to the elective principle as to qualify heredity and personal eminence by a minimum of indirectly elected members, chosen out of county councillors, or other persons with a motor-car qualification, to such a reformation are they driven by the spirit of the times. If by such means they can obtain, or represent themselves as obtaining, a Senate which shall satisfy Lord Rosebery's conditions of "a strong, a real, and an efficient Second Chamber," all will not be lost. Nay, much may be gained. For this Second Chamber, on the ground of its efficiency and its demi-semi-representative character, is to retain those "rights" of rejecting the legislative proposals of the Commons and the people, and of interfering with finance, which represent the encroachments of recent years.

It is not efficiency that these politicians are after. Until its vital power was seriously threatened, they lifted no finger in favor of improved efficiency. It is "strength" they are after. History, indeed, may teach these "reformers" that they can safely and advantageously take several further steps in the direction of an elective Second Chamber. If they could get rid of their antiquated hereditary principle, they might invite the nation to assist them in setting up an indirectly elected Second Chamber like the American or the French Senate, endowing it with an infinite power of check-mating the popular will in the interests of the possessing classes. A Senate like that of France, the members chosen for nine years from an electoral body composed of delegates of municipal councils and of officials of the departments, supplemented by life Senators, elected by the two Chambers, would really meet the requirements of our Conservatives excellently well, if they could shed altogether hereditary qualification.

Such a body, endowed with an adequate veto, stands in the two great Republics of the world as a more efficient champion of the rights of property than the House of Lords even during the recent period of its arrogance. Such an "elected" Second Chamber would not have to tread so delicately in discriminating between Trade Dispute Bills and Plural Voting or Temperance Bills, in selecting "favorable ground," or in pretending to recognise the "mandate" of the people when they dare not fight. Self-respecting members of the Upper House must have deeply resented the indignity of this Agag attitude, and sighed for the superior independence of the American Senate, which can stay with impunity any popular law designed to damage their trusts or railroads, and can vote millions of dollars to themselves and their friends by tampering with tariffs. If the Liberal and Labor parties were idiotic enough to abandon their plain present duty of destroying the Lords' Veto, in order to take a hand in such a game, they would, in the end, find themselves "left" with a new House of Lords, reformed according to scriptural analogy, swept, garnished, and tenanted by—American trust-makers and Paris financiers.

THE BATTLE OF THE PRUSSIAN BUREAUCRACY.

THE reactionary who is also doctrinaire has become a rarity in English politics. Hobbes left no tradition behind him. Hegel was liberalised when Green and Caird acclimatised him at Oxford. One must go to the Russian Pobedondstseff for a modern persecutor who was intolerant on theory, and repressed in obedience not to a regrettable and temporary necessity, but to an eternal principle boldly avowed. The late Lord Salisbury could not fairly be called either reactionary or doctrinaire without some qualification. He was rather an individualist, who concealed in epigrams and taunts a species of sceptical anarchism. He doubted about all government, and chose a strong government which governed as little as possible. He was not a lath which posed as iron; he was rather an interrogation which stiffened at moments into an imperative. The typical English reactionary has rarely dared to avow the theory which underlies his acts. It is his pose to be the practical man, who leaves to Socialists or Radicals the unpopular wisdom of theorising. When he calls in the Lords to reject a Budget, it is because he "trusts the people," and claims that they should be consulted. When he signals to them to reject a Bill for the abolition of plural voting, it is because he pretends that the other anomaly of unequal constituencies should be redressed by the same Act. It is refreshing to turn from the unrealities and insincerities of our own reaction to the frankness and boldness of the Prussian variety. The speech in which Herr von Bethmann Hollweg declared in set terms that governments are above public opinion, and have a duty to over-ride it, had at least the merit of honesty. It gave a reason why two days later the police of Prussia drew their sabres on the unarmed crowds which demanded a Reform Bill. No other reason is sincere, and no other reason is worth examination. Herr von Bethmann Hollweg is still something of an enigma. He is not a talking Chancellor. A bureaucrat has succeeded a diplomatist. His career will be the test of the measure of success which may in an awakened and educated industrial State attend the reactionary doctrinaire.

Of the Bill which the new Chancellor has introduced in his capacity of Minister-President of Prussia, we need not speak at length. It leaves the old three-class system of voting essentially untouched. The ballot is still public; elections are still indirect; constituencies are still grotesquely unequal. Above all, the 15 per cent. of propertied voters will still outvote by two to one the 85 per cent. of the proletariat massed in the third class. Some 598,000 Socialist voters return six deputies; some 418,000 Conservatives return 212 deputies. Under the new scheme it is doubtful whether even the six rebels can be elected. For this system Herr von Bethmann Hollweg gave the only defence which is possible—a denial of the sovereignty of the people. Government, he roundly declared, "refused to be influenced by public opinion," and rejected every measure which would subject it to parties, or establish a Parliamentary system. He had to meet the objection that even in Prussia, where the Diet does, after all, control taxation and legislation, a Ministry, which must somehow manage a sort of Parliament, inevitably obeys the will of the propertied class and defends its interests alone. He turned for his justification to facts. In spite of its constitution, the Prussian system of taxation levies direct imposts on property which cannot be paralleled in democratic France. It has long practised methods of social reform and organisation for the benefit of the working classes, which England is only beginning to imitate. Its municipal institutions are in many respects a model which Liberals elsewhere might copy. And, finally, he might have added (if we may complete his argument for him) it is the German Reichstag, elected by universal suffrage, and not the Prussian Diet, which has given, by its food taxes and its Agrarian Tariff, the supreme example of class selfishness. Whatever criticisms one may lavish on the work of the Prussian Diet, it does not always show the crude spirit of class egoism which one would expect from its composition. The claim that the Bureaucracy is in some sense above party and class is not so wholly preposterous as one might suppose. It is a system of defence for a class ascendancy, but at least it is an intelligent and benevolent system. It educates the voters whom it fears. It saves them from the worst phases of dependence and want. It cultivates in their minds, most dangerous boldness of all, a habit of expecting much from a State machinery which they desire to capture in the hope of obtaining more. The French or English workman, armed with the power of the ballot, has but a faint conception of the boons which he might win by using it. The Prussian workman is tantalised by realising to the full the possibilities of State action which he aspires in vain to guide. A bureaucracy which has done these things may claim to be at once bold and, within limits, disinterested. And for a reason which Herr von Bethmann Hollweg carefully refrained from stating, it is possible for a Bureaucracy, inspired by the ideal of the philosopher-official, to count on its supremacy over a Diet which would in any other country speak only for the manufacturer and the squire. The feat of managing it is rendered possible by the simple fact that of the deputies, and of the voters in the two higher classes, an immense proportion are themselves officials. A rigid discipline controls, within certain limits, their public votes, alike in the Diet and at the polls. The bureaucracy must, indeed, make terms with the plutocracy. But it is never its mere servant. It controls, from the deputies in the Diet anxious for promotion and patronage, to the postmen and teachers in the constituencies, a regimented phalanx which makes it, in its own right, a power.

The struggle for equal and secret voting in Prussia raises an almost insoluble problem in political mechanics. If it is to be conceded of free will it presupposes not merely the voluntary abdication of a class, but an act of abnegation by parties. When the franchise was gradually extended in our own country, not even a Labor Party existed. But in Prussia, Social Democracy is in numbers, in discipline, and in unity, incomparably the strongest popular force in the country. Liberals and Tories among ourselves hoped by turns to profit politically from reform. But not even the so-called "Radicals" can have anything to gain by it in Prussia. The Clericals desire a secret ballot; the National Liberals and the Radicals have much to gain from a redistribution of seats. But only the Socialists effectively and sincerely want to abolish the ascendancy of property. A successful recourse to force is not thinkable; the Bristol riots could not be imitated in Berlin. There remains only the supreme weapon whose edge the Socialists have been fingering doubtfully for years—the general strike. It will be tried sooner or later, not so much because it is a hopeful method, as because it is so clearly the only method of intimidating a bureaucracy which seems to occupy an impregnable position. The end will not come easily, and that chiefly for the reason that there is more at stake than the internal government of Prussia. The democratisation of Prussia, as Herr von Bethmann Hollweg avowed in this singular piece of thinking-aloud, would involve the democratisation of the Empire. The fall of bureaucracy there would mean the adoption of responsible Parliamentary government in the Empire itself. The tariff would be in the melting-pot; the Navy Act would cease to be sacrosanct; the policy of the world's greatest military State would be exposed to the dictation of a party which is frankly anti-militarist. A bureaucracy which is at once intelligent, benevolent, and firm, dies hard. But it has made any half-way house untenable. The change will come, and with it a new Germany and a new Europe.

A PARTY OF PROPERTY.

FOXES who lose their tails (or even cut them off) are apt to expand on the attractions of tail-lessness, and, though we agree with some of Lord Rosebery's and Mr. Harold Cox's criticisms of the party system, we doubt whether their own case illustrates its more serious defects. Lord Rosebery, for example, talked at the dinner to Mr. Cox of the "pooling" of men's consciences which allegiance to party involves. But it was the objection to "pooling" his intelligence, to acting in concert with his fellows, which drove Lord Rosebery out of party affairs, and forbids him to re-enter them. The co-operative instinct is a social factor as well as the love of independence. Lincoln and John Bright were men of a singularly virile and self-sufficing type. But they adhered in the main to one school of political workmanship. Must we say, because a politician of entirely opposite and much less masculine nature easily breaks away from an early allegiance, that the bond which held was a degrading one, and that the man who disowned a public tie was necessarily in the line of public duty? The question is one of temperament as well as of intellectual build. In Lord Rosebery's case an extreme fastidiousness of character, joined to a growing disbelief in democracy, pointed to his failure in the rude life of party. The case of Mr. Harold Cox is of a different character. In an entirely honorable sense, Mr. Cox belongs to the type of literary condottieri. Beginning as an outlaw from conventional politics, he has worked through all the schools of revolt, until he finds himself finally identified with the most conservative of all our parties—that which seeks merely the conservation of privilege. This is a recurring phenomenon in politics. The Bourbons could never have planted themselves afresh on French soil without drawing on the brains of Napoleon's marshals and diplomatists. Similarly, it has been a godsend to Lord Wemyss and the "Spectator" to find in an ex-Socialist a fresh, up-to-date critic of a policy that they could only meet with the short-range weapons of the old individualism. But Mr. Cox deceives himself if he thinks that he remains the detached force which he represented when he entered Parliament. In the process of always criticising Liberalism he has become a Tory, able to range himself on almost every point of mundane politics with thinkers like Lord Hugh Cecil. As it happens, the Tory machine, obeying the original impulse which the Birmingham caucus gave to the stricter organisation of British parties, has taken a sharp turn in favor of the form of State Socialism which calls itself Protection. In the act it has crushed out Mr. Cox and the abler members of the Cecil family. But for that accident there is not a Tory seat in the House of Commons (or the House of Lords) which would not be acceptably filled by the late member for Preston.

While, therefore, we agree with some of Mr. Cox's criticism of party politics—its exclusive culture of the fighting spirit, its assumption that all wisdom and goodness lie with one side or another, and its forcing of men's minds and feelings into this crude mould—we should prefer the most brawling faction to the particular eddy in which Lord Rosebery is content to dwell. Lord Hugh Cecil quaintly called the dinner at the Freemasons' Hall a "feast of liberty"; a celebration of the spirit which, driven from the caucus-ridden Commons, finds, according to Lord Rosebery, its last and favorite seat in the House of Lords. In fact, the celebration at the Freemasons' Hall was a feast, not of liberty, but of property, which is a very different thing. The defence of property is a lawful and rational pursuit, but it takes its devotees out of the party system for reasons which reflect credit rather than discredit on our politics. Let the disqualifications and drawbacks of party government be what they may, the followers of the system, be they Tory or Liberal, possess other bonds of union than self-interest. For this reason the timidities of rich and highly privileged men never did form the basis of any political association, and never can. Least of all can they group themselves under the banner of freedom. Lord Rosebery may honestly regard the House of Lords as a Cave of Liberty, but Mr. Cox knows that Lord Rosebery's estates and rents, his hereditary title to legislate for us, the processes that enter most closely into the building up of this brilliant figure, with its various facets of aristocrat, millionaire, leader of fashionable thought, and literary model to Mayfair, did not arise in anything that can be called a state of freedom, and would all be swept away if we returned to it. What Mr. Cox might see, were he a little more emancipated from a set of dogmas that a clever man can only propound with his eyes shut, is that no really coercive form of politics is in itself repugnant to the society which he now frequents. It all depends on whom it coerces. The old-fashioned individualists were at least consistent, and modern thought drew away from them for motives widely different from those which produced Lord Rosebery's breach with Liberalism. They treated Protection and Conscription as forms of the same heresy. But Lord Wemyss and the "Spectator" find no difficulty in rejecting the one and accepting the other, and thus turning a serious philosophy of life into a crude, illogical defence of things as they are. Lord Rosebery is the chosen prophet of this type of thoughtlessness; but it does not reveal a true line of moderation, and its aloofness from party represents neither an intellectual nor a moral advantage.

Life and Letters.

THE PROBLEM OF THE VILLAGE.

WE are constructing, slowly and with difficulty, a picture for posterity of the life of the people of England. Underneath the outward appearance of the hurried, good-tempered crowd, we have penetrated to the homes and habits of each one of them. Mr. Booth has given, on a large scale and with infinite toil, the life and labor of the people of London. Mr. Rowntree has done the same for York. Special investigations have dealt with West Ham, Manchester, Cambridge, Dundee. The English village has hitherto been neglected. But to-day, in Miss Davies's "Life in an English Village" (Fisher Unwin), we can enjoy the result of the sociological scalpel, dissecting the economic life of a rural parish. Corsley, in Wiltshire, an area of nearly five square miles, is the district selected: a district which includes no village at all, in the accepted sense of the word, but scattered hamlets, tiny aggregations of cottages, and solitary houses. It cannot be recorded as "typical," but no village in England can be regarded as typical. Rural life in this country, with its extraordinary variations to-day of growth, equilibrium, and decay, exhibits quite different characteristics in a score of counties. For any complete picture we should require a colliery village of the Midlands, an East Anglian village, landless and forlorn, a "model" village in the new South Country parasitic England, where farming is irrelevant and all the money spent flows in channels from the great house of the new rich—perhaps, also, at the other end of the scale, one of the few independent villages which still remain, in the small holding districts of South-East Lincolnshire or West Norfolk. But here is at least a beginning in an examination hitherto confined to the towns; and a beginning of very great interest and value.

This "Corsley" is untypical in many ways. First there is no definite "village" as a centre of rural life; no little huddled group of houses, along straight street or around village green, with Church and public houses and village institute, which is the backbone of what still abides in the life of rural England. Second, there is no big house or "squire," and hence none of that particular group of hall servants, gardeners, gamekeepers, and general "hangers on" who are normally associated with their presence. Perhaps it is for this reason, amongst others, that pauperism is so scarce, that almost every family belongs to a sick benefit club, and that the reputation for prompt payment of debt stands universally so high. Third, there appears no difficulty here in obtaining land, as cottage garden or allotment, at reasonable rent: and immediately family budgets and family incomes commence to be analysed, it is found that the produce of this land forms an all-important factor in the life of the people. It is by this means that a number of the households, the actual income of whose breadwinner falls substantially below the poverty "line," are able to preserve themselves permanently above it. It is this extra source of revenue and of food which gives these poorly fed country dwellers advantage over the unskilled laborers of the city, or of villages where land is difficult or impossible to obtain. Some are skilled market gardeners, in adequate, if not affluent, circumstances. Some fell back on the land when injured in industry, when crippled by disease, or when growing old. "If a man loses an arm, becomes rheumatic, or in any way is so disabled as to have difficulty in finding an employer as an agricultural laborer, he cultivates his garden, perhaps manages to obtain a horse and cart, builds himself a rough stable of corrugated iron, and some pig-styes, and working with his wife, manages to make a hard living." A hard living: but his fellow worker, in similar circumstances, in the town is either spirited away to some Institution, charitable or friendly, or else tramping the street amid a mob of the ineffectual unemployed. The country way is the better way. Again, there are those families where the husband is fully occupied in work, and the wife cultivates the garden, often with surprising results. In one, the woman, out of a garden of 50 poles, is able to sell eight guineas' worth of fruit and vegetables, besides supplying eggs, poultry, and vegetables for home consumption. Yet how many villages, in the Eastern counties, for example, with land stretching up to the doors of their houses, have no cottage gardens at all!

In such a condition, and with other lesser trades supplementing the agriculture, whose service employs nearly three-fifths of the male breadwinners, it is a little disappointing to find so high a percentage of poverty. The population (824 at the last census, probably less to-day), is distributed amongst 220 households. Of those households only 28 are in primary poverty—poverty, that is to say, in which the total income received is less than the amount required for efficient physical nourishment. In this minimum "nothing is allowed for clubs, insurance, and provision against old age and sickness generally, though it is the practice, even of the poorest laborers of Corsley, to make such provision. Nor is anything allowed for waste, owing to ignorance, of the most nourishing and economical food, or accident of any kind." In secondary poverty—those whose income gives a margin of something up to 1s. per head for such insurances, as well as those who are obviously living in want, owing to drink, mismanagement, or extravagance—37 families are included. Here is a total in families of 65 out of 220: no excessive proportion. The disquieting symptom is found in the fact that the poverty families have far more than the normal proportion of children; that, in fact (as Mr. Rowntree found in York), the chief cause of poverty is not drink or accident, but child-bearing. It is the laborer, in the prime of life, who finds his condition depressed below the poverty line, just because, at this period, he has so many young mouths to feed. It is just at the period of life when food and decent conditions are most urgently required that these growing children are compelled to experience a scarcity of both. Only 16 out of 70 households in which the head of the family is a laborer are in primary poverty; but these 16 include 76 out of 121 children being reared in such households. "Only in households where adults outnumber children," is the somewhat mournful conclusion, "can these be brought up under conditions which give scope to full development of their faculties." The "poverty line" has been fiercely attacked by Mrs. Bosanquet and others as providing an altogether excessive standard of expenditure. And, indeed, the tales of the "hungry 'forties," with incomes which necessitated permanent semi-starvation, through which the rural poor struggled with endless courage and patience, show that some kind of endurance and propagation is possible, far below that limit. On the other hand, Miss Davies brings corroborative detail from the village school, establishing something more than a fanciful relationship between poverty and mental dulness and deficiency. Analysis of reports upon the children of 162 households show that lethargy, strangeness, nervousness, steadily increase with the lowering income of each group. Of 18 families with children of school age in primary poverty, no less than ten have deficient children, and six of these come from homes which defy criticism. It has been largely held hitherto that bad housing, insanitation, lack of fresh air, and similar discouraging environments are mainly responsible for the breeding of the inefficient. This investigation strengthens the contention of Dr. Eicholtz and the Edinburgh inquiry that the dominant factor is the food question. "The dulness and deficiency of the children," is Miss Davies's summary, "even in a rural district where every advantage of good air and healthy surroundings is obtained, is mainly due to malnutrition; for, though a certain proportion of dulness is found in all or most classes, whether well fed or otherwise, the greatly larger percentage amongst the children of the very poor, even when the parents are in every respect satisfactory, can hardly be due to any other cause."

"Blessed is he who has his quiver full of them," declared the Psalmist, who found "young children" like the arrows in the hand of a giant. The modern world is coming to apprehend an implacable conflict between the demands of one generation and of the next—the warfare between the present and the future. One result of that warfare is this depression into poverty of the child-bearing laborers of Corsley. In the towns, a birth-rate falling with alarming collapse reveals the fact that the clerks and artisans are deliberately deciding that the needs of the Present shall prevail over the demands of the Future, and that children shall be forbidden, or strictly limited in number. In the village, the largest family still tends to accompany the lowest wage; and only another accompaniment—a high infantile death-rate—prevents still more glaring inequality between needs and wages.

But this is the cross section of a process—continuous, without haste or rest, while men wake or sleep. This particular plot of English ground, so fair to look upon, is the scene of a transformation, not local, but national. Seventy years ago, it supported 1,621 persons. To-day, but a few more than half occupy the same territory. They wander out, into the neighboring towns, into the capital, into all the world. But few of them ever return. Of 456 children over school age and still living, born to 198 of the householders, 200 are now living in the parish, 256 living elsewhere. This migration is less than in the villages of Suffolk or Surrey. It is probably limited by the comparative prosperity of the people, and the ease with which land in small quantities can be obtained. It is greater amongst the women than the men; of 237 females 158 are resident elsewhere, only 79 remain. At the age of adolescence the most energetic and enterprising of both sexes flee away from the fields and houses which have been the homes of their fathers.

Cottages are allowed to fall into ruin; accommodation decreases; social life is present, in various sports and pastimes and religious gatherings; and the general impression is of an atmosphere tranquil and not unsatisfied. But if the villages are to become breeding places of children, sucked into the cities to provide there a healthy and virile life, it would seem that some provision were needed against the permanent handicap that life receives owing to it being mainly raised in childhood through a condition of poverty. And if the rural area is again in the future, as once in the past, to develop a civilisation of its own, to harvest traditions of song and architecture and rude comfort such as once undoubtedly dignified these pleasant lands, an essential preliminary would appear to be that economic stability which comes from increasing enlargement of opportunities of security, in independent cultivation of the land.

BREAD AND GAMES.

WHEN the Athenian poet observed that, though many things are strange, nothing is so wonderful as man, he flung into his list of human marvels just the most marvellous faculties of all as though they were not of greater account than the rest. Man ventures out upon the wintry seas, he said, and furrows with his team the inexhaustible breast of earth from year to year; with gin and mesh he catches fowls, beasts, and fish; he tames the forest monster, and lays his yoke upon the horse and mountain bull; he has taught himself speech, and thought winged like the wind, and the rules of city life; he has learnt an escape from the shafts of frost and storm; he has discovered cures for hopeless diseases, and invented contrivances to avoid every evil, except death. Such is the list of human marvels. The poet then goes on to say that, in spite of all these astonishing accomplishments, man's fortune is sometimes bad as well as good, and that only by observing human law and divine justice can he remain a worthy citizen—a conclusion true almost to satiety.

So, then, man is conspicuous among the other beings of earth as a sailor, a ploughman, a hunter, a horse-breaker, a speaker, a philosopher, a statesman, a tailor, a builder, and a doctor. The order seems a little peculiar, a little disconcerting, perhaps, to our professors and politicians, who find themselves thus jumbled up between horsebreakers and tailors. But let them take comfort; the poet's irony is entirely unconscious, and, at all events, he has got them on his list, whereas some men would have left them out altogether, either in forgetfulness or on the excuse that they never would be missed. For who are the really important people in this world? Obviously they are the ploughman, who gives us bread, the hunter (including the butcher, poulterer, and fishmonger) who gives us meat, the tailor and builder, who keep us dry and warm, the horsebreaker (including the engine-driver and chauffeur) who transports us to the City and back every day, and the sailor who transports our relations to the Antipodes. Those are the men who count in human life; those are the men whose loss we should really feel; and if the poet had gone on to remark that without them a man could not remain a worthy citizen, he would have been right. Without them a man would be outcast—"apolis," to use the poet's word—helpless, destitute, afflicted, pinched with raw hunger, crumpled with the cold, a prey to nephews and wild beasts, a forked radish, a shrieking mandrake envious of the gallows-tree.

If our men of eloquence, of thought, and affairs—if our writers, philosophers, and politicians accuse us of cynicism for thus exalting people of low estate, and bringing the mighty down to the level of those who purvey material necessities, creature comforts, or whatever other contemptuous phrase may be used, we would only invite them to walk alone at midnight where the repeated flare of lightning reveals the forest, and the sheets of the tornado's rain keep leopards in their caves, though hungry for intellectual bones. Or let them be cast, like the survivor of last week's wreck, among the rocks of an untenanted shore and devour live winkles without a pin. There they will gain new insight into the relative values of human occupations. Or, if it is too much to ask them thus to expose their sensitive forms to experimental vivisection for which we reserve lower animals even than they, in their next railway journey, instead of reading poetry or the political Year-books, let them listen to what their fellow-travellers converse upon. They will find that the basis of conversation still is food, clothing, transport, and health—the ploughman, the tailor, the horsebreaker, and the doctor, as that old poet said. About these their companions will exchange a recurrent series of pleasurable and interesting facts—the speed or leisure of certain trains, the advantages of certain materials for covering the skin, the condition of their internal organs at the minute, or the steak that lingers in the memory.

Food supplies a universal thrill. All stomachs vibrate to that dulcet string. We have heard a warrior discourse on deeds of heroism to a fidgety and listless audience, but when he told of horseflesh rations and whisky at £5 a bottle, all sat breathless with admiration. Where food was eaten last week and will be eaten next, is a conversational theme of inexhaustible excitement. The other day we heard the question discussed with concentrated gusto like the distilled essence of innumerable plates. It was a man and woman from the brightest and best of our Imperial breed. Both had enjoyed the highest intellectual education that money can buy. The youth of both had been guided by men or women of choice refinement in places where true religion and useful learning do flourish and abound. They were passing through scenes of great natural beauty, quickened by memories of warlike splendor. But firmly rooted in the essential necessities of humanity, they took no thought of the superfluities of refinement, religion, learning or noble minds. They clutched the bedrock of reality, and, letting all else go hang in windy air, they discussed the pleasurable sensations of solid satisfaction they had received, or were about to receive, in various restaurants at various times of day and night. One thought alone disturbed the composure of their prospect, looking before and after. In about a fortnight's time the young man would be compelled in the pursuit of his pleasure to undertake a journey that would necessitate starting at half-past six in the evening, and arriving very little before nine. Where, then, was dinner? It was excluded. He had tea and bread and butter before getting up in the morning, breakfast with courses of fish, meat, and eggs, at half-past nine, a little something to support his constitution at eleven, lunch with courses of fish, meat, fowls, puddings, and coffee at two, tea and cakes at half-past four or five, and he was to travel through a country where he could buy buns every half-hour. But if he had to wait for dinner till half-past nine, heaven help him! The outlook was black. It cast a prophetic gloom over the fourteen satiated days to come. He felt like the criminal whose execution looms with nearer shade on every sunrise. The untutored savage sharpening his teeth with a file, as he squats beside the cauldron wherein the cow's head bubbles, is blest compared with him.

Who will not admire so provident a devotion to the primal cravings of our kind? When so much happiness is at stake, caution rises to its apotheosis. The working people, who eat bread by the sweat of their brows, may live from hand to mouth, as they expressively say; but the educated classes, eating by the sweat of other people's brows, require a spoon at least a fortnight long. "I always must, and always do, have a substantial luncheon every day," exclaimed a passer-by lately in our hearing, and a glance at his bulging eyes and jelly cheeks proved that his boast summarised the achievements of a lifetime. Such are the real interests and attractions of humanity, and what rivalry can poets, thinkers, or statesmen hope to put up against them? It is rightly said that the poor dare not move to avenge their misery, because they keep their eyes always fixed on the next chance of a meal, and cannot risk the importunate uncertainty. But if the rich are similarly occupied, only with vision indefinitely extended over the eating-houses of the world, for what attention can the fastidious children of intelligence look? Is it such a wonder that the poet jammed them in between horsebreakers and tailors? The wonder is that he gave them standing-room at all in this procession of human life, which a nursery pessimist, mindful of soap in the eyes, and tangles in the hair, and spills upon the tablecloth, lately defined as "one damn thing after another."

If it be said that food and raiment are indeed the essential interests of life, but not its only pleasure and occupation, we would ask to what objects man's attention is turned next after them. In different countries the secondary objects differ, but listen again to the conversation of the educated classes. In Germany it turns on beer, in France on women, in Spain on bulls, in England on leathern or india-rubber balls. Those are the things that really interest mankind, and if among ourselves the necessities of life have any rival besides the ball, it is the horse, which absorbs the intellect of a small and diminishing circle. Ten years ago, when disaster after disaster befell our armies in the field, and our national fortunes had touched their lowest grade, the broadside of a popular evening paper announced, "England in Danger," referring to the possible defeat of our country by Australians in a game of ball. That editor knew his people. Similarly, the Paris theatres were open during the September massacres, and while the guns were clearing the barricades in the streets of Moscow, the well-to-do enjoyed the pastime of tobogganing in their back gardens. In our own case, if the grisly monsters crossed the North Sea unimpeded, and vomited their battalions upon our holy shores, if the invaders swept our country with a broom, and celebrated their triumphs in our cathedrals, if they decimated our manhood, confiscated our Empire, but sustained defeat from a picked eleven at Lord's, it is confidently anticipated that we should console ourselves with the reflection that all was lost but honor.

Bread and games!—it is the old complaint of the satirist that the population's heart is set on them. And, indeed, if that were all, it would seem in vain for our politicians to get up early and go to bed late, and eat the bread of five thousand a year. For why fluster about the precedence of veto or Budget, when a horse can give either two laps in common esteem and win by a length? Or why be perturbed about Home Rule, when Ireland has already avenged her wrongs upon the oppressor between the goal posts? But it is the satirist who has been wrong all the time. The marvel about man is, not that he seeks after bread and games, but that he ever seeks after anything else; just as the wonder of a prison is, not that anyone is there, but that anyone is outside. Thought, speculation, learning, justice, and heroic toil—those are a perpetual astonishment. That a man should live to eat, or should pursue amusement with assiduous pleasure, is nothing in the least wonderful. That he should rhyme two lines of verse, or discover the first proposition of Euclid, or hurt his little finger for the love of freedom, is a miracle that extinguishes the Milky Way. In the midst of the daily need for food and the daily longing for delight, man is out upon the search for other things besides the bread and games, and that is where the incalculable peculiarity of his nature comes in. Something rather terrible, the poet thought it, when among all the strange things of the world he chose out man as the strangest, and, rather casually, among the other achievements of sailing, building, and medicine, he threw in those queer inventions of speech and winged thought, and the rules of city life.

THE COMPENSATIONS OF STUPIDITY.

CICERO and other sophists have sought consolation for old age in the reflection that with growing age the claims and passions of the body weaken, and the intellect, working more freely upon its fuller store of knowledge, yields an even larger and more abiding fund of satisfaction. A vainer proposition has seldom been adduced. The experience of all times is against it. The interests of old people do not become more intellectual, but generally less. Though sensuous pleasures grow absolutely feebler with the dwindling of the vital forces, the needs and interests of the body come to play a larger part than ever in the conscious life. Nor does this apply merely to the case of those who either have never cultivated much their mind, or else have occupied it mainly in some sphere of business or professional activity from which they have retired. The test is rather to be found in men of definitely intellectual tastes and habits, whose early and middle life has been predominantly occupied with "things of the mind." With very rare exceptions, such men, as age advances, instead of becoming more and more absorbed in the pursuits of science, literature, or philosophy, fall back upon the simpler human relations and the primary material interests of life. We do not here refer to the period of senility or dotage when brain-decay has set in, but to a long antecedent period when the intellect, to all appearance, retains its powers, but gets less satisfaction from their use. After middle age there comes, with most people, a really instinctive reaction against intellectualism. It is hardly too much to say that they have "found out" the intellectual life; the pride and pretensions of its earlier appeals are reduced by experience to moderate dimensions. For the intellect is the greatest of pretenders, though its exposure is one of the great tasks to which the masterpieces of tragedy and comedy in world-literature from Ecclesiastes to Faust have always set themselves, it ever re-imposes its sway upon the credulity of youth. The "Age of Reason" seems to be at hand, ambitious men with far-searching minds will set in order their own inner life and the outside world; short cuts to happiness, prosperity, and progress are promised to those who still ignore the passions which actually move life, and shall hand over the conduct of affairs to men of efficient intellect. The notion of what constitutes efficiency may shift. A century ago deductive reasoning could perform the trick, and men of intellect rallied round the standard of Robert Owen, whose monumental claim is thus recorded by himself in the Preface to his Autobiography: "These writings are intended to effect an entire Revolution in the spirit, mind, manners, habits, and conduct of the Human Race; a Rational, Practical Revolution to be introduced gradually, in peace, with wise foresight, and to be highly beneficial for all through futurity—a Revolution to supersede a system of individual ignorant selfishness, based on the origin of falsehood and evil, and which can be supported only by force, fear, fraud, and falsehood, superseded by a system based on the origin of truth and good, which can alone produce the spirit, knowledge, and wisdom by which to govern society perpetually on social principles."

Nowadays, intellectual efficiency is sought through minute investigation of detailed facts, plotted curves of statistical import, and rigidly inductive reasoning. But, though methods change, it is the same great bluff, the pretence that intellect can assume the direction of human affairs, can control or move the actual motive forces. Now, returning to our standing-point, the chief reason why older people tend to become less intellectual, is that they have slowly learned to knock off about ninety per cent. from the claims of intellect. If they have travelled far in any special study, they have learned that its foundations are the most shaky part of the edifice, that insoluble problems lurk under even the exactest sciences, and that the most vitally important questions are precisely those to which the most unsatisfying answers must be given.

Or, if they are not philosophers or scientists, and do not arrive at any such clear convictions, they have learned to suspect the truth. Pronounced rationalists (we use the term in its broader sense) seldom win personal popularity even among intellectual people; clever persons we like most when they relax and stoop to folly. Most intellectual men and women find their dearest friends, not among fellow intellectuals, but among good, kindly, rather stupid persons, with whom they can unbend and enjoy themselves. This does not merely signify the desire for relief from the strains of a tense intellectualism. It implies a certain repudiation of the claims of the intellect as guide in life. Your rationalist, who constantly presses for the why and wherefore of our judgments and our valuations and opinions, is felt not merely as troublesome but as irrelevant. For experience of life teaches that the maxim "de gustibus non est disputandum" has earned its triteness by the infinitude of practical wisdom it enshrines. Elaborate argumentation is always seen to run to earth in some personal valuation that defies all logic. In all attempts of reasoning to shift these valuations, there exists a pathetic imbecility. Indeed, the futile persistency of the endeavors of a rationalist to dislodge an enemy he cannot see from a position he cannot approach, seems to involve some radical illusion of intellectualism. Perhaps, however, it is only the necessary inability of any faculty to recognise its limitations.

The upshot of the business is that the keen play of the intellect is seen to have something "unnatural" in it. We rightly recognise that a man may be a slave to his intellect much as he may be a slave to his passions, and, if a man is endowed with good passions, the latter servitude seems safer. For there is something in the over-cultivation of the reasoning powers which atrophies the common affections of humanity, and so leads men into worse fallacies of conduct than are attributable to mere illogic. "Mathematics," it has been said, "breeds a despotic way of thinking," and the annals of ecclesiastical and political government are full of terrible testimony to the havoc wrought by logical doctrine and administration upon the course of human history. Hence it is that, as we grow older, we come to "suffer fools gladly," provided their folly is not too pronounced, and even to recognise that they are "God's fools" in that God or Nature sanctions and inspires their folly. Upon the whole, rather stupid persons, who let themselves be guided by their feelings, tend to go more straightly, more safely, and more comfortably through life than their highly-cerebrating neighbors. For, after all, the whole detailed experience of countless generations of human and prehuman life has been boiled down and deposited in the half-instinctive feelings, individual or social, by which stupid, unintellectual persons are guided; natural selection has expelled the worst aberrations, and left a set of instincts and desires which make upon the whole not only for safety but for progress. This is the wisdom of the little child, the fool, the drunkard, and the people. The real question is how to feed and supplement it by conscious rationalism, so as not to impair or displace it—one of those practical problems of compromise or adjustment which confront us everywhere in life. For the art of politics it has supreme importance. For those who trust entirely or mainly to intellectual training for the future of democracy must be driven almost to despair, when they contemplate the small amount of intellectual curiosity which exists, and the facility with which it can be led astray by interested politicians. Fortunately, we are not dependent for political progress upon a fully enlightened popular policy. The evolution of democracy will continue to be mainly the politics of comparatively stupid people, driven by sound but ill-conceived motives of groping collective advantage, capable of choosing leaders and policies less from a clear intellectual apprehension of their meaning and worth than by a sort of "feel" which enables them to sift the better from the worse, a power more akin to art than to science. Education should improve this art, but it cannot displace it, neither can it furnish the power with which it works for the building of better social institutions.

CONFESSIONS OF A JUROR.

LIKE most useless anachronisms the Grand Jury contrives to survive behind a name of signal dignity. Collectively we had these qualifications for intervening in the fate of our fellow-creatures; that we had all paid our rates, that our names all began with the initial X, and that we all of us live in a distant suburb which seems to contribute no criminals of its own to the calendar. One by one in a long file the fifty cases came before us in outline, an unmeaning record of perversity. It was crime through a fog, crime from behind a veil, mechanical, inhuman, incredible. The accused we never saw. The defence we never heard. It was our duty, because our names began with X, to declare that the impossible was probable, that the thing we could not understand had certainly taken place. No. 18 A—I have forgotten his insignificant name—had flung a stone through a £40 plate glass window in broad daylight. Why, we could not guess. We only knew that he had done the same thing before and served "time" for it. We framed our own definition of him—the unknown accused, lying somewhere beneath us, silent and invisible in his cell. No. 18 A is clearly the sort of man who does this sort of thing. "True Bill," said the foreman, and the other X's muttered "presumably mad." Number something else had lain in wait for his neighbor on the common stair and stabbed him in the dark. "He must have had some provocation," said a younger X. "We can't go into that," replied the older and the wiser letters. Witnesses in rags stammered out their timid stories, and four of them confessed that they could not read. A resplendent personage from Belgravia entertained us with a facetious account of a burglary. There was the usual pathetic slum wife, who implored us not to find against the drunken husband who had stabbed her. We hesitated over a long list of young lads found with "jemmies," in the neighborhood of safes, until the official tempter, in a black gown, who managed the "calendar" for us, consoled us with the assurance that it would only mean Borstal. This great shop in Regent Street had a thieving clerk, and the other a porter with an appetite for articles of luxury. We asked what wages they received, uneasily aware that if we were to do our duty, we might have to find a true bill against the employer. But most of our cases were simple affairs of burglary, and usually the victim was himself a poor man. The unseen fellow-citizen whose rights we were defending had been caught red-handed, in a mean and trivial crime, his tools in one pocket, his loot in the other. Even the proud consciousness that our names began with X could not spur us to the mental feat of doubting that his was a suitable case to try.

So it filed before us, this procession of unfortunate names. We did our duty, which is the word that civilised men commonly apply to their more public violations of instinct. Whence they came, these unhonored names, we knew not, and whither we sent them, we tried to forget. There rang all the while in my ears that grisly sentence from the Gospel which used to haunt my childhood, about the officer, the judge, and the tormentors. We did our part, and it is the essence of the system that each shall do his part and nothing but his part. We had taken our oath and donned our blinkers in the name of Almighty God. The "petty" jury will do its part, and the Judge move within his well-worn groove. Never in all the process will the criminal encounter a plain man unfettered by oaths. Never will his fellow-citizens pause to ask why they send him from officer to judge, and from judge to gaoler. Nor may we ask whether he will emerge a better man from the hard labor and the solitary confinement. To each wheel in the machine, the law has allotted a routine function. That drunken husband, when he has fed his empty mind on the unaided reflections that will brood amid ignorance and wrath in a lonely cell, will he come out to love and cherish the little, defenceless, straw-colored mother into whose ribs he thrust his knife? Will he learn chivalry from stone walls, imbibe manhood from skilly, or school his heart to tenderness as he marches round the exercise-yard under the eyes of his warders? We plain men, whose names begin with X, we move, in our suburb, in a world of commonplaces where effects follow upon causes. But in court we are, of all mystics, the most extravagant. It is on a miracle that we reckoned when we shoved our fellow-citizen a stage further on the journey from the officer to the tormentors. We think, if we think at all, that the loss of liberty, of comfort, of society, of changing impressions, of the pageant of light and weather, can somehow achieve a reformation. The petty jury will be inspired by the same great faith, and the Judge himself will wear a wig and robe in token of the august part which he, too, plays in this mystery of punishment. The system has us all in its toils. It questions us and we answer meekly, never daring in our turn to take it by the throat. "Is there a case for trial," it asks us, and dutifully we have rendered the answer. But is there a use in punishment?

The case against punishment has commonly been argued by the romantics on sentimental grounds. They have taught us to think of the typical criminal as a Jean Valjean, brave, capable, and strong, who wanted from society, not so much the chance to grow and to reform himself, as the invitation to step up higher and to play the superman as mayor and employer. It is quite a different type of criminal who confronts the modern juror amid the realities of a London Sessions. One is under no temptation to idealise the brute who stabbed his pathetically faithful wife, or to glorify the seaman who broke on a winter night into a workman's dwelling, and stole the clothes and the savings of an old age pensioner. The philosophic anarchist has no practical solution for such cases as these. Tolstoy, had he been called among the T's to a London Grand Jury, would simply have evaded the difficulty by pleading the commandment "swear not at all," when the oath was tendered to him. It is easy to run away from actualities, and to confound one's adversary by declaring that in the anarchist millennium the emancipated mother would not give birth to criminal sons. But to us one problem at least presented itself. We have somehow to protect the little straw-colored wife and the white-haired tenant of the workman's flat. We took our share in protecting them in the well-worn traditional way. It is a way which all experience has shown to be faulty. We know that the brutal husband, if ever again he is sufficiently drunk and sufficiently angry, will not stop to reflect on the consequences of drawing his knife. We suspect that the rascally seaman will profit by his experience to perform his next burglary in some slightly more efficient way, or to choose for its scene a port where he is not known to the police. There are two ways of avoiding punishment. The normal man avoids it by prudently refraining from crime, a course to which other instincts move him even more powerfully. The defective man seeks to avoid it by taking care that he shall not be caught. The deterrent effect is a poor argument for a prison system whose chief problem is furnished by the presence of the habitual offender.

There came to the mind of one of the younger X's, as he left the court with his fellows, embarrassed by official thanks, the vision of a Grand Jury which resolved to go on strike. One by one it heard its cases, and one by one it dismissed them all. The cells opened their doors and automatically the released prisoners sorted themselves out, the hopelessly bad to sin again (which in any case they would have done), the accidentally bad to turn over a new leaf, and the innocent to marvel at their fortune. Before it separated, the Grand Jury put its signature to a grand remonstrance. "Make your prisons," it wrote, "places in which the defective mind will encounter a stream of new ideas. Pour into the narrow brain as much as it can receive of cheerful and educative knowledge. Train it to see and hear, and lure it to think of its fellowmen as comrades. Take the stunted body and try, by all the devices which a skilled doctor would use with the children of the rich, to mould and exercise it into health and vigor. Let the indolent and the unlearned, who grew up without a trade at the tail of a carter's van, acquire the pleasure of skill and the delight of productive handicraft. Remodel your prisons on this system, and then we will return you all the true bills which you demand. But, until these things are done, we will not perform even the humblest office of routine in your futile system of punishment." That dream floated in the juror's mind, until by chance he turned idly to his daily paper, to find there Lord Rosebery's lament on the "pooling of consciences" and the tyranny of parties. The moral stared legible. Perhaps, after all, the philosophers were right when they talked of "my station and its duties," and told us that society is an organism. The groom who daily straps on his horse the bearing-rein, knowing it to be cruel, because his master has bid him, the foreman who takes his share in extracting the last drooping hour of toil from a sweated blouse-maker, the soldier who marches out to slay in a war which his rulers have approved, the juror who reluctantly performs under oath his share in the round of punishment—are they not all filling quietly, as good men should, their station and its duties? This it is to be a detail in a social organism.

Communications.

THE MERITS OF THE FISHER RÉGIME.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—On October 21st, 1904, when the late First Sea Lord took office, the Navy was substantially what it had been since the close of the Crimean War. Tinkering at reform was useless. Nothing short of a complete revolution in the matériel and the conversion of an obsolete to a scientific service was of any avail. Enormous changes were necessary. Enormous changes have been made. The reforms were assailed with a bitterness without parallel since the close of the wars with Napoleon. Some of the reforms are still hotly assailed, but the chief among them are already tacitly accepted, since they have proved their value in the general scheme of development started by Lord Fisher in 1904. No matter what Government is in power; no matter what school of naval thought is in the ascendant, no sane mind desires to revert to the old conditions.

Whatever the differences that still divide the old school from the new, four of Lord Fisher's most important and far-reaching reforms are universally accepted:—

1. The introduction of the nucleus crew system.
2. The redistribution of the fleets in accordance with modern requirements.
3. The elimination of inefficient fighting vessels from the Active List of the Navy.
4. The introduction of the all big gun type of battleship and battleship-cruiser.

NUCLEUS CREWS.

Before the nucleus crew system emerged from the late First Sea Lord's mind, Britain wasted the money spent on naval reserves. They were reserves only in name. I went to sea in the last voyage of the old "Sultan." Exercises executed by the Flagship "Majestic" in three minutes were left unfinished by the "Sultan" after half an hour's fumbling. The officers of the mobilised reserve ships were strangers to each other and to their men. Officers and men alike were strangers to their ship. Months were required before the reserve ships, ante-1904, were war-worthy. All is now changed. Gunnery in the nucleus ships last year proved to excel ships of the Channel Fleet. The Reserve is now a real Reserve.

REDISTRIBUTION.

In 1904 the disposition of the British Navy was substantially the same as it was at the close of the American War. Young ladies resident in British Vice-Consulates and elsewhere all over the world were satisfied with a system that gave them the society of the most charming men alive. Millions of money and thousands of expensively trained officers and men were wasted through the obsolete disposition of the Fleet. The North American Squadron, the Pacific Squadron, the East India Squadron were examples of wasted men and wasted money. So long as war is war, the manœuvring ground of ships should be the scene of probable action. As we are not going to fight the United States, to station a costly, weak squadron on the Atlantic seaboard was no advantage to the nation. Useless squadrons were recalled. Officers and crews were stationed where they will possibly be wanted.

The Mediterranean Fleet was cut down. White trousers and calm blue water were replaced by sea boots and North Sea gales. The best Navy men never grumbled; they knew the change was necessary. Nobody divided either House of Parliament on the question of the new disposition of the Fleet.

USELESS SHIPS.

The number of alleged fighting ships in the Navy that could neither fight nor run away absorbed a big slice of the annual naval estimates. In the Russo-Japanese War Russia lost the use of every ship that was too weak to fight and too slow to escape. Lord Fisher brought home and "scrapped" one hundred and fifty-three British ships that could neither fight nor fly. He has been attacked by the numerous interests affected by the concentration of force in home waters, but no Board of Admiralty is likely again to dribble out money and men on ships of the kind that were put out of commission during the Fisher régime. An immense cost in upkeep and repairs has been saved. The men and officers have all been drafted into fighting ships that can fight. Parliament was not invited to divide on the question.

ALL BIG-GUN SHIPS.

Whatever may be said against the "Dreadnought," it was inevitable. Colonel Cuniberti had already foreshadowed such a ship, ignorant of the fact that Lord Fisher had anticipated him. The chief feature about the "Dreadnought" was not that she was strong or heavily gunned, but that she was a new type. A naval officer's ship is not a constructors' ship—the men who had to fight her planned her. This was a departure new to all navies. When the "Dreadnought" was born, Europe was numbed into inaction for the better part of two years. Not the sound of a hammer was heard on a battleship from Brest to Odessa; from Kiel to Pola. Further, the Germans were compelled either to abandon the Kiel Canal or to spend ten millions in money and eight years in time to deepen the waterway between the Baltic and the Elbe.

Seeing that England for a hundred years had been behind the Continent in naval science, it was something to acquire at one stroke such a start in the acquisition of naval strength that nothing but negligence could lose.

The introduction of the All-Big-Gun type of battleship and battleship cruiser was an act that no Government and no section in any naval school of thought intends or wishes to revoke. No Parliamentary division took place on the "Dreadnought."

The four chief reforms above-mentioned were accompanied by twenty-one other reforms as follows:—

- (1) Complete re-organisation of the dockyards.
- (2) Improved system of refits of ships, and limitation of number of vessels absent at one time from any Fleet for repair.
- (3) Introduction of the Royal Fleet Reserve, composed only of ratings who have served for a period of years in the active service.
- (4) Improvement of Royal Naval Reserve, by enforcing periodical training on board modern commissioned ships in place of obsolete hulks or shore batteries.
- (5) Establishment and extension of Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve.
- (6) The establishment of a service of offensive mines and mine-laying vessels.
- (7) The introduction of vessels for defensive mine-sweeping in harbors and on the open sea.
- (8) A complete organisation of the service of auxiliary vessels for the Fleets in war.
- (9) The development of submarines, and the equipment of submarine bases and all the necessary auxiliaries.
- (10) The proper organisation of the destroyer flotillas, with their essential auxiliaries.
- (11) The enormous development of wireless telegraphy afloat, the equipment of powerful shore stations round the coast and at the Admiralty, and the introduction of a special corps of operators.
- (12) The experimental stage of aerial navigation entered upon.
- (13) The foundation of the Royal Naval College and its development.
- (14) The establishment of signal schools at each port.
- (15) The establishment of a navigation school.
- (16) Enormous advances in the gunnery training and efficiency of the Fleet. The average of the Navy is now better than the shooting of the best ships in 1900.

(17) Great improvements in torpedoes, and in the torpedo training.

(18) The introduction of a naval education and training for engine-room artificers.

(19) The introduction of the new rating of mechanician for the stoker class, for engine-driving duties.

(20) Complete re-organisation of the arrangements for mobilisation whereby every officer and man is always detailed by name for his ship on mobilisation, and the mobilisation of the whole Fleet can be effected in a few hours.

(21) The introduction of a complete system of intelligence of trade movements throughout the world.

Great improvements have been made in the conditions of service to officers and men, such as to married men the introduction of two years' commission in place of three years and often four. Ship's bands and a school of music were introduced, and the employment of foreign musicians in ships of war was abolished. The grievances of the men in regard to victualling were removed.

The cookery has been improved; and white bread served out to all the larger ships from bakeries on board in place of hard tack.

The canteen system was recognised and taken under Admiralty control, and the old abuses abolished.

The clothing system has been reformed, and much expense saved to the men.

Great improvements have been effected in the position of petty officers.

Other reforms have been:—

An educational test instituted for advancement to petty officers.

Increase of pension granted to chief petty officers.

Allotment stoppages abolished.

Allowances paid to men in lieu of victuals when on leave.

Promotions from the ranks to commissioned officers introduced.

Warrant rank introduced for the telegraphist, stoker, ship's steward, writer, ship's police, and ship's cook classes.

A comparison of naval strength in home waters of ships in commission at the end of 1904 and in 1910 is given in the following table:—

	1904.	End of 1905.	Beginning of 1907.	1910.
Battleships	16	26	38	44
First-class cruisers	13	25	32	37
Smaller cruisers and gunboats...	30	34	47	58
Destroyers	24	93	120	121
Torpedo-boats	16	50	62	88
Submarines	—	16	40	59

It has been said that since these great changes have been made the British flag has not been shown in distant parts. This is not the fact. The flag has been shown by powerful fighting squadrons more than ever before. Great Britain has sixteen battleships and armored cruisers in foreign waters against one of Germany.

Naval efficiency is the sum of three factors: material, intellectual, and spiritual. The last-named is to all the other factors important in the proportion of three to one. The spiritual factor in war is willingness to die, to obey, to suffer, to be forgotten, to be obscure, or to live in the blaze of publicity. When the spiritual element inspires every one in the Fleet, from the admiral with three broad bands on his coat sleeve to the half-nude stoker perspiring before the furnaces when "highest possible speed" is signalled from the bridge, a small Fleet will beat a great Fleet that is either dead to patriotism, undisciplined, or commanded by bickering and intriguing admirals.

Lord Fisher has done what no other man or combination of men could do: he has converted the Navy into an intellectual service, and, while destroying the obsolete traditions of marlinspikes and mast-and-sails, he has left uninjured that collective pride in the service, which has always distinguished the naval officer.

Institutions are nothing; man is everything. The British seaman, whether officer or bluejacket, take him all round, is admitted by Germans, Americans, and Japanese to be the best afloat.

Though much remains to be done, these are ample reasons to justify supporting the Fisher régime since Trafalgar Day, 1904, and there is no reason to doubt that every journalist of character and standing who has supported the Admiralty would give the same reasons as I have done for his action.—Yours, &c.,

ARNOLD WHITE.

February 16th, 1910.

Letters to the Editor.

THE JOKE OF THE ELECTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I hope your columns are open to the joke of the election. An old Radical farmer was asked how he intended to vote. "I've allers voted Radical," he replied; "but I'm told the Blues are going in for Traffic Reform, and so I shall vote for them. I can't abear them motors."—Yours, &c.,

YORICK.

SOME LESSONS OF THE ELECTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondents complain of the tricks and dodges resorted to by Tory candidates, canvassers, and agents, and equally authentic and disgusting stories can no doubt be told by the other side. We are none of us saints, and we all want our own side to win. For myself, I find nothing but perfervid enthusiasm in the local preacher who gave out as a hymn

"Take my vote, and let it be Consecrated, Lord, to Thee.
Take my hand, and let it trace
Crosses in the proper place."

Though to some persons this is almost horrible and undoubtedly blasphemous.

I hope the verse was only sung in two-membered constituencies, as elsewhere the result certainly was the rejection of the voting paper for uncertainty!

What seems to me important is to amend our electoral machinery where it is faulty.

First, the ballot is not secret, except where the number of voters is large. Lord James had to face the difficulty on the one hand of securing secrecy, and, on the other, of securing a scrutiny, and the rejection of votes improperly obtained. The Act itself therefore lays down minutely what is to be done. The voting paper is numbered, and on the counterfoil (exactly like a cheque) is the same number. On this counterfoil the presiding officer puts the number of the voter on the register as he hands over the ballot paper. On legal inquiry after the election, if a vote is successfully attacked, the judge looks for the voter's number on the counterfoil, then searches for the corresponding ballot paper, and then cancels the vote.

After the poll is closed, the presiding officer sends the ballot box and all his papers to the returning officer at the counting room. His return shows how many ballot papers have been issued, because he sends back his counterfoils and the balance of unissued papers. The first business, when all the boxes have come in, is to open the ballot box and count the papers inside. The clerks who do this are required by the Act to lay the papers face upwards on the table. While they are counting these papers, the agents, who stand by to check them, can count the votes. One clever election agent, who first explained "how it was done" to me, was so quick that he counted all the votes. In the elections in which I have been concerned I have contented myself with training my counting agents to add up the votes for my candidate, while I myself checked the papers of the presiding officers with the returning officer. In consequence, I have always known the result of the election within a few minutes after the beginning of the count, and before the actual count of the votes had started more than a few minutes.

In one of my elections, the Tory at one time led by 600, and his foolish agent privately signalled to his friends outside (in breach of the promise he had given to the returning officer that he would do nothing of the kind) by waving a red handkerchief that they had won. Like the marriage service, that little episode ended in amazement!

In country districts where there is a polling station for each big village, the result can, of course, be compared with promises and the canvass, and checked most effectively.

The remedy for this is simple. At present the returning officer is the sheriff, who, of course, is a figure-head, and the actual worker is his deputy, who is not only almost invariably a strong partisan, but is also, by the absolutely absurd provision of the Act, not paid for his services, and so has to make discreditable profits out of his charges for ballot boxes, &c., &c. He also makes his deputies' appointments a little bit of patronage. At one election I had to pay three guineas for the services of a parson (a rector, too) who was so ignorant and careless about his work that he let a starred man vote, although on the face of the page of the register was a statement that the voter could not vote at that polling station.* At another a man was brought 31 miles to act as presiding officer when the schoolmaster on the spot had often so acted. Result—three guineas for the work, and a shilling a mile travelling expenses, the gentleman riding the distance comfortably on his bicycle. My remedy is to make the town clerk in boroughs, and the clerk to the County Council elsewhere, the returning officer at a proper fee, and to make the local authority purchase and stock all the equipment necessary for fitting up the school (now almost invariably used) as the polling station. As the schools must be closed for the polling, let the teachers have the first claim as clerks, and pay them 10s. for their day's work, which, though long, is not arduous, and another 10s. and their actual out-of-pocket expenses if they also act as county clerks.

To such officials, accustomed to honorable dealing and to silence on matters of importance, could safely be entrusted the verification of the poll boxes. Then the ballot would be secret.

For myself, I agree with some sturdy old Radicals of my boyhood, and think the ballot only weakens character and encourages all sorts of trickery. At one election, where we were fighting what we all thought was an absolutely hopeless fight, our latest canvass returns showed—on any method of computation—a certain win. I learnt afterwards from the agent on the other side that he advised all his people to escape from the attentions of my canvassers by giving them plump promises; and they did.

Next, it is suggested that canvassing should be made illegal. Very pretty. But how? Until some method is devised by which the talking of two men, or two women, or one man and a woman together, can be (1) discovered, (2) proved, and (3) effectively punished, canvassing will go on. To my mind, nothing is more interesting than to sit silent in a railway carriage, or a country inn, or, better still, at a farmers' ordinary, and hear the propositions which are not only solemnly put forward, but which convince the listeners. What was it Stevenson said about talking not on your own plane, but on that of an intelligent Fijian chief?

If I may be pardoned the apparent arrogance of the opinion, the only really useful letter on this subject in THE NATION that I have seen was that from "A West Country Liberal," who advises us to get the young people together and let them argue, supplying them with facts and teaching them the enormous, the amazing virtue of flat denial. "Why should the foreigner tax us?" Reply: He don't. Assertion: He do. Reply: Prove it! In a clever little political shilling shocker, written in 1885 by the Radical candidate for Eye (dead long ago, whose name I have forgotten), the village schoolmaster converts the young daughter at the Hall, and a Ruling Dame of the Primrose League, by that simple process. The defeat of Tariff Reform in London industrial districts I attribute mainly to the efforts of a sturdy band of volunteer street orators, who (to quote their own words) argued the Tariff Reformers off their own dunghills at Hyde Park, the Arches, Victoria Park, and elsewhere.

My own suggestion is to use to the fullest the provisions of the Corrupt Practices Act. Most people, and, indeed, many candidates think that the only remedy for improper practices is the very costly one of a petition. Not at all. Most of these offences are also punishable by fine and imprisonment, imposed at petty sessions. It is true that sometimes some of the worst offenders will be sitting on the bench. But, thanks to Mr. Acland, every bench of

* Perhaps I ought to add, for the benefit of the uninitiated, that a voter who wishes to vote elsewhere in the division than where his qualification is can get the revising barrister to star him. He then can vote at some other named and more convenient polling place in the division—a town with a railway station, for instance.

magistrates in the country has at least one ex-officio justice upon it, and thanks to the hard and unremitting work of Lord Loreburn, some thousands of first-rate men of all classes have been added to our rural benches since 1906. The cases, therefore, will have a fair hearing, and even if the bench, by a majority, acts unfairly, the local Press may be trusted fully to report the case, and the genuine love of fair play and the instincts of good sport (which are to be found in all the rural districts of England that I have ever been in) will act as a just and beneficent Court of Appeal.—Yours, &c.,

AN OLD HAND.

London, February 9th, 1910.

THE ELECTIONS AND THE SMALL HOLDINGS ACT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I read with much interest "A Country Liberal's" letter in your last issue, and I should like to supplement it with a few remarks. The writer seems not sufficiently to emphasise the one element of the position which has, perhaps, struck me most of all. I mean the personal misfortunes which have overtaken the applicants for small holdings, and indirectly their wives and children.

For example, among my own friends, one man having lost his cottage, and having been asked to pay for tenant's compensation a quite prohibitive sum, is now living as a lodger, with his wife and children, in an already overcrowded cottage. Another man, who was willing to pay double the farmer's rent, but refused to pay more, is still more crowded into an unsatisfactory and insanitary cottage; and a third, who was definitely promised a particular piece of land, is now being obliged to sell off at a loss all his young stock.

A fourth applicant, unable to get land, is still living in a cottage where the water is so bad that his children have been seriously ill. Practically all applicants here have suffered in some way.

The same is true elsewhere, and we have reports from our land clubs of one man evicted, another sacked from his work for applying for land, another, thinking he was going to get land, giving up his present job and hanging about for long out of work—and so on.

"A Country Liberal" refers to the attitude of the Women's Liberal Federation towards the Small Holdings Act. At the Council meetings last May, I moved a resolution, on behalf of this W.L.A., urging the Government to enforce the Act. The resolution was carried, and a copy of it sent to Lord Carrington. I followed this up by writing a circular, which the Women's Liberal Federation issued to all its secretaries, urging them to organise lectures on "The Land Question in Our Villages."

Undoubtedly, if the Board of Agriculture had stepped in and used its powers where the County Councils were blocking the Act, the results at the General Election would have been very different. Surely now, at once, the Government will take steps to enforce the Act and colonise the countryside with free and independent people.—Yours, &c.,

MARJORY PEASE,

Hon. Sec., Oxted and Limpsfield W.L.A.

February 17th, 1910.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In reply to your suggestion of 22nd inst., I see that several correspondents have given instances of questionable practices. A common one in Scotland has been the sending to each elector of a polling card bearing his roll number, with the request that after voting he should hand it to the election agent.

But, rightly or wrongly, it appears to me that the main cause of the loss of so many county seats must have been the gigantic bribes offered by the Conservative Party under the popular guise of the creation of small holdings. Whether this policy is the invention, as is said, of Herr Eltzbacher—"Mr. Ellis Barker"—or of Sir Gilbert Parker, or, as seems much more likely, of the subtle brain of Mr. Balfour himself, I think the move the most astute one of the whole contest. First, the great landlords see the prospect of being bought out at ransom prices; and, second, the would-be small holders see themselves installed in absolute possession on State credit. The carrying of such a policy would certainly mean the creation of hundreds of thousands of Tariff Reformers, only too anxious to see protective duties imposed on agricultural produce.

In my opinion, the Government's land proposals for Scotland, as embodied in the Scottish Bill passed by the House of Commons, but thrown out by the House of Lords, are far more equitable than the Conservative scheme; but the latter will again carry away the counties, unless between now and the next General Election steps are taken to convince the rural electors that such is the case.—Yours, &c.,

D. M. STEVENSON.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—"Country Liberal" admirably expresses the disappointment felt in many parts of rural England. With the exception of the Old Age Pensions Act, no Act of Parliament since 1885 has roused so much interest and hope as the Small Holdings Act. "Hope deferred maketh the heart sick," and where no land has in two years been obtained, or only unsuitable land offered at extortionate rents, there is a bitter resentment against a Government which could put so fair a promise on the Statute-book, and give so little effect to its fulfilment where County Councils have blocked the Act.

"Country Liberal" asks for a return of small holdings supplied in county constituencies. I can give two which may be of interest.

In West Cambridgeshire the County Council has bought 1,277 acres, and leased 117 acres, in seventeen villages. 217 small holders were in possession of 1,172 acres at Michaelmas, 1909. Can any other constituency give a better result?

This constituency, which has previously only returned a Liberal in 1892 and 1906, and adjoins five constituencies which at this election reverted to the Unionist Party, returned Mr. Montagu by a practically undiminished majority, and the largest vote ever given to its member, in spite of a most vigorous attack, and all the well-known electioneering tactics used by the Unionists.

In East Cambs. the County Council has provided 1,353 acres in eight villages. Fifty-nine persons were in possession of 1,038 acres at Michaelmas last. Elections are rarely won or lost on a single issue, and the loss of this seat was not due to any defection of the Liberal vote in the villages, where Sir Charles Rose's splendid work for small holdings at Burwell was fully appreciated, and the administration of the Act by the Council not a serious cause of grievance, although less effective than in West Cambs.

The seat was lost to a popular resident member of the racing world, who secured the Newmarket vote, while at Ely the action of the War Office in disbanding the Cambridgeshire Militia and closing the barracks is resented, and was used against the Liberal Party.

It is freely admitted that the Conservatives on the County Small Holdings Committee have worked equally hard with Liberals in administering the Act, without any party bias, and some measure of success, for which the new M.P. was entitled to claim some credit. The Small Holdings Act was not the burning question which lost a Liberal seat in this case, as it undoubtedly has been in many others.—Yours, &c.,

"VILLAGER."

February 14th, 1910.

THE MEANING OF THE SCOTTISH ELECTIONS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I feel sure your correspondent, "English Liberal," will welcome another version of the foundations of Scottish Liberalism, and the consequent meaning of the recent election, by one who has taken an active part in every General Election, save one, from 1866 to 1910 inclusive; as also in several by-elections.

At the Reformation a national system of education was instituted whereby a school was erected and maintained, by a draft on the land rents, in every parish in Scotland. This was the means of a wide diffusion of knowledge among the humbler classes and a stimulant to incursion into higher spheres of learning. As an indication of the character of those schools, I may state that the curriculum of the one I attended embraced—besides the ordinary English course—Greek, Latin, the higher mathematics—theoretical and practical—and, for sea-faring youths, navigation. The teacher was a gold medallist of Edinburgh University, who, from impaired health, took to country life and never charged a higher fee than 5s. a quarter. Many of his pupils entered the Universities direct and graduated with honors. The more erudite Scotsmen read and studied Adam Smith's "Wealth of Nations," and the heaven soon spread to the humbler ranks. The Press was then largely democratic, and the textile weavers, the shoemakers, and others engaged in the more sedentary vocations, by sharing the cost of a newspaper, soon acquired a grip on the elements of political economy.

The democratic constitution of all Presbyterian Churches taught them to reverence the authority vested in the Church Courts by the congregations, rather than that wielded by Pope or Bishop, and the lesson was all the readier learned because their politics generally synchronised.

But there were other stimulants of an eminently practical character. Previous to 1747, owing to the continuous feuds of the clans and the misery and destitution, of which they were the governing cause, Scotland was one of the most barbarous and backward countries in Europe. But upon the abolition of military service and the turning to settled forms of industry it made phenomenal progress. The opening up of a free trade with foreign countries was then, and still is, approved as a potent factor in national prosperity. It is not difficult, then, to discover good reasons for the conservatism of all the Scottish people deem good, and a corresponding aversion to everything they consider prejudicial to the commonwealth.

The evictions in the Highlands to make way for sheep—deer forests being a later innovation—gave inception to an agrarian movement, culminating in the Crofters Act; but not until a series of Irish Land Acts had intervened. In the Lowlands every phase of land tenure was subjected to lengthened discussion, and it was largely due to a Scottish lawyer that the Agricultural Holdings Acts for England and Scotland are now on the Statute-book. The taxation of land values as an organised propaganda had its origin in Glasgow. Henry George assured me that nowhere had he been so intelligently understood as in Scotland; nowhere had his views been so solidly endorsed as in Glasgow. The deer forests are now viewed as incidents of the far larger question, whether or not the land belongs to the nation. Those who answer this in the affirmative may be either Radicals or Socialists, but not, with a ray of consistency, Tories.

In the last election the issues presented to the country by Mr. Asquith took precedence of all others. The restriction of the power of the House of Lords, the aversion of the landed gentry to the taxation of their lands, their willingness to tax the bread of the poor and their opposition to old age pensions as well as to the Small Landholders Bill were the main topics. The so-called Tariff Reform served to divert the less thoughtful and scored many Tory votes. Unemployment in the cities—hardly known in country districts—furnished a similar quota; whereas temperance became a respectable side issue, and disestablishment a forgotten weapon.

Is it, then, remarkable that with the bulk of the Press, the State Church, the landed gentry, and the liquor trade all arrayed on the Tory side, Scotland is overwhelmingly Radical? Only once since 1832 has Scotland bowed the knee, and it was with the patriotic but mistaken idea that peace would be soon achieved in South Africa by supporting the Tories. That there are any Tories returned is only less surprising. The University cult is everywhere conservative. One Tory seat in Glasgow is due to the plural vote, another to a three-cornered contest. Ayr Burghs vacillate because villadom and distilleries enter into the calculations. The villadom of the South Side of Glasgow accounts for South Renfrew. Bute is owned by two Peers, Wigtownshire by twenty families, and Kirkcudbright has always chosen a landlord of some party as its representative. Extensive reclamations and improvements on which the full market-rate rent has rarely been charged account for agrarian servility, and the lack of other industries than agriculture lessens the Radical counterpoise. But if the franchise were extended to adults and the plural vote abolished, the Universities would be left alone in their glory.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN McCULLOCH.

Portpatrick, February 14th, 1910.

THE NEXT STEP IN WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I offer some brief comments on the article bearing this title in your issue of February 12th? The writer of it says that the Women's Suffrage Movement "includes large masses of the manual workers of the country," and "speaks for the great body of professional and intellectual women." These words, I think, very fairly represent the opinion, or, rather, the general impression, of the greater part of the educated public of to-day. Without having specially investigated the matter, they would be quite ready to say that a considerable part of the adult female population, perhaps even the majority of them, desired the vote.

But this last General Election seems to have, for the moment, shaken us dreamy English people out of our usual acquiescence in vague, general ideas, mental haziness, and conclusions drawn from undefined impressions. Even the average newspaper reader has learnt something of the value of statistics; and the political struggle has been so sharp that the most indifferent supporters of either party find something more is expected of them than mere acquiescence. If they claim to hold certain opinions, they must pay for them, or work for them. Let us see how the Women's Suffrage Party stands under these heightened conditions.

At first glance it appears to meet the situation admirably. There is no manner of doubt that a great many women desire this extension of the suffrage, and have worked most actively towards this end for a considerable time. Also, there is no doubt that some women want the vote so ardently that they have almost performed miracles to prove the earnestness and singleness of their aim. But what proportion do these two groups of women bear to the present adult female population? Does anything like a majority of the women of Great Britain wish to be enfranchised? Even at the risk of repeating the obvious, we must go back to the fact that people are nowadays expected to support their political opinions with money or with service; and really, such support is made extremely easy for them! There are leagues, unions, and societies of all kinds to suit every shade of feeling. Within the Women's Suffrage Party there are three main societies; we are told that these are non-party and that they include all degrees of enthusiasm, and the subscription of a shilling a year, or even less, entitles any woman to become a member of the suffrage movement. Under these circumstances we should expect an overwhelming majority of the women of the brain-working and leisured classes, together with a good number of handworkers, to belong to these three societies. If they do not belong to them, we can only conclude that they are still indifferent to the benefits of enfranchisement.

Now, the number of male adults in the United Kingdom in 1909 is generally taken to be about 12 millions, and so, allowing for the excess of women, the adult female population would be about 12½ millions. The membership of the Women's Suffrage Societies was discussed last autumn in the "Times," and, so far as one of the ordinary reading public can make out, the figures then given have not been contradicted or modified. In October, 1909, the N.U.W.S.S. numbered something over 16,000 annual members in England and Scotland, and the W.F.L. appears to have had about 5,000 members. There was some difficulty about ascertaining the membership of the W.S.P.U., but since it was publicly stated by an opposition society that the union numbered under 9,000, and this statement does not appear to have been contradicted, I suppose it must be accepted. Miss Clementina Black in the "Englishwoman" states that the London Society for Women's Suffrage enrolls new members at the steady rate of a hundred a month, so that we should in fairness add 500 to the numbers of each of the three societies, for the natural increase in membership since October last. This brings us to about 31,500, representing the approximate membership of the Women's Suffrage Societies in the United Kingdom. True, Ireland does not seem to be represented in the returns of the N.U.W.S.S., and there may be a certain number of small local societies for women's suffrage not affiliated to the main ones. Allowing for all this, it seems hardly possible to reckon the number of the recognised women supporters of the Women's Suffrage Movement as greater than 35,000.

35,000 out of 12½ millions! These figures, of course, only stand for such an estimate as can be made by the average newspaper reader, who has neither time nor ability to collect statistics. To a friend of the movement they are rather astonishing, and I can only hope that they may be shown to be far less than the real facts will warrant. However, it must be remembered that a large number of the 12½ million women in question would not be enfranchised under the "Limited Bill," to which the three Women Suffrage Societies have given their support; and therefore those whom the Limited Bill would not reach are more likely to join the Adult Suffrage Union than any of the women's organisations. But the number of women who would obtain votes through the passing of the Limited Bill is about two millions, or, according to some authorities, only 1½ million. Taking this lower number, and comparing it with the figures for the total membership of the Women's Suffrage Societies, so far as they can be ascertained, we find that just 2¼ per cent. of the beneficiaries of the proposed extension of the franchise have clearly expressed their desire to be enfranchised.

But if the majority of the present electorate have made it clear to their representatives that they wish the franchise to be extended to these yet unrepresented citizens, the thing must be done, even though 97¾ per cent. of the latter appear to be indifferent to their proposed blessings. It is certainly not the first time in the history of civilisation that a class has been enfranchised through the efforts of an active minority, while the majority have been apathetic, or dimly hostile, to effort and change. But if these figures and proportions are anything like correct, surely the next step in women's suffrage ought to be a campaign, not against the peace-loving electorate or the over-burdened Government, but against the serried ranks of dreary, idle, indifferent women. Cannot those brilliant and dauntless ladies, the militant suffragists, work a few constructive, instead of destructive, miracles this time? Let them descend upon a certain proposed new "Ladies' Club," upon the Vanity Fairs of Bond Street, upon the readers of fashion papers, and upon what journalists call "the faithful votaries of amusement," in general! If they can only bring some of their startling energy and devotion to the cause to bear upon those whom they are fighting for, instead of upon outside opposition, the numbers of the Women's Suffrage Party would very soon show a more reasonable proportion to the bulk of the female population.—Yours, &c.,

ROSALIND TRAVERS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your friendly article on Women's Suffrage last week you state, "It has unfortunately happened that these women (the great mass of suffragists who work in constitutional ways) have been practically unheard during the tumults of the last two years." May I point out that, though it has been difficult to read about them, on account of the preoccupation of the Press with sensational methods, they have not been unheard? The National Union has trebled its branches all over the country, and held thousands of orderly meetings; the Women's Liberal Federation has successfully put pressure on Liberal politicians; the Conservative and Unionist Women's Franchise Association is doing excellent work within its party. Those who, like you, approve of the measure and do not like the methods of rebellion, might do much to obviate the necessity of rebellion by paying attention to the constitutional agitators.

A meeting has only to be rowdy to deserve honorable mention in the papers. They ignore our steady propaganda. Will you not set your face against the silence and neglect which has driven so many noble women to despair of peaceful ways?—Yours, &c.,

H. M. SWANWICK

(Member of Executive, National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies).

[We do not think we can be accused of neglecting this question.—ED., NATION.]

GLADSTONE'S SINGING VOICE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—A good many years ago I conversed at Newark with an old man who remembered Mr. Gladstone's first election to Parliament. It was for that borough in 1832, when Mr. Gladstone was twenty-three. I think the old man was sexton of the church, but am not sure. He told me that he was present at a dinner which took place at the close of the election, and that Mr. Gladstone sang a song at it, and his singing was much admired.—Yours, &c.,

EDWARD RUSSELL.

Victoria Street, Liverpool,
February 16th, 1910.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—"The Contemplation of Music" strikes me as an odd phrase; but that Mr. Gladstone loved music, and that in earlier life his singing voice (a baritone) was much admired, are facts which will not "come as a revelation" to any who read my monograph of him in the series of "The Queen's Prime Ministers." As, however, they interest "R. W. J.," I must make him a present of a felicitous quotation in return for his about the National Anthem. In 1859, Lord Malmesbury wrote in his diary—"Gladstone, who was always fond of music, is now quite enthusiastic about negro melodies, singing them with the greatest spirit and enjoyment, never leaving out a verse, and evidently preferring such as 'Camp-town Races'." I have always felt that to hear Mr. Gladstone singing, "Oh, doo! dah! dey!" must have been like listening to the music of the spheres.—Yours, &c.,

GEORGE W. E. RUSSELL.

THE LIBERAL PRESS IN SCOTLAND.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent, "Anti-monopolist," has given voice to widespread and deep-seated feeling. To think that Scotland does not possess a Liberal daily worthy of the traditions of the party, with the exception of the "Dundee Advertiser," and yet supports in the East a paper of the rankest Toryism, and in the West another, which, since its secession from the ranks of Liberalism in the 'eighties, has glided down the slippery slope, with greatly increased momentum in these latter days, to the same unplumbed depths! It is almost incredible.

What is wanted is a strong daily, edited and printed in Glasgow, which will sweep the West from Solway to Skye. It may be argued Scotland is progressive enough without a Liberal paper. It is so; but what is held must be retained, and there are a few Tories left who need enlightening. It can only come through a Liberal daily of high commercial and literary standing. The "Daily News" should be mentioned as ably supplying a long-felt want, but its lack of local news constitutes its most serious hindrance.

The opportunity is presented to remedy this intolerable disgrace. One hopes that the proposal mooted will lead to more than thought in the minds of our leaders.—Yours, &c.,

D. M. WILSON.

Glasgow, February 15th, 1910.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The need for a Liberal daily for Scotland is great, and it is particularly so in Glasgow and the West of Scotland. The "Dundee Advertiser" is an admirable Liberal paper, but its circulation in Glasgow and the surrounding district cannot be compared with that of either the "Scotsman" or the "Glasgow Herald," both of which are extremely anti-Liberal. In view of the success of Liberalism in Scotland at the General Election, one is apt to wonder if, after all, the influence of the Press is so great as it is usually supposed to be. The Scottish Press, generally, is Conservative, yet the electors as a whole are undoubtedly Liberal. In Glasgow there are five daily papers, but only one of them is Liberal, yet at the Election five of the seven Glasgow seats were retained by Liberals. The explanation, I believe, is twofold. First, there is the influence of the spoken word. It is indisputable that, as regards speech and debate, the Liberals are easily first. Second, there is the fact that many Liberals are taking in a London daily. Two of these journals, I know, have large and growing circulations in Scotland, and it might be a good move if one of these would put out a special Scottish edition. The need for a Liberal paper has been keenly felt during the last month or two, and I am sure there are many advertisers and very many readers who would willingly co-operate in the establishment of a daily paper that would deal seriously with public questions from the Progressive point of view.—Yours, &c.,

WILLIAM HARVIE.

Caledonian Railway Company,
Central Station Hotel, Glasgow,
February 17th, 1910.

HOW VOTES WERE WON.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—If not too late, perhaps the following true story from the North may be worth adding to your list.

A Liberal amateur canvasser called on a Cheshire farmer who was well known to be a Liberal, and was more than surprised to be met with a firm refusal to vote with him "this time," as he was going for Tariff Reform. Enquiries and explanations followed, and it came out that the farmer did a large business in strawberries for the Manchester market; that he was much disturbed by the competition from Kent keeping prices very low; and that a gentleman had called a few days before and got the promise of his vote on his assurance that, if Tariff Reform were carried, heavy duties should be put on all Kent strawberries coming into the Manchester market.—Yours, &c.,

M.

Hale, Cheshire,
February 16th, 1910.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent "E" is a bold man. He faces without flinching the most tremendous "if" in the world. "If," he writes, "we love God with all our heart, and mind and strength, and also our neighbor; if we visit the widow and orphan in their affliction, and keep ourselves unspotted from the world; and if we keep the 'golden rule' of doing to others as we would wish that they should do unto us in similar circumstances, what more 'religion' can any person want?" But there are some people, who, after years of painful effort, find that they do not love God with all their heart, nor their neighbor either, and that they have by no means kept themselves unspotted from the world. Has religion no more to say to them? Or if it has, and speaks of sin, repentance, faith, forgiveness, atonement, incarnation, are these things to be pronounced not part of the one religion?—Yours, &c.,

A. I. TILLYARD.

Fordfield, Cambridge,
February 13th, 1910.

THE SECRECY OF THE BALLOT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Referring to your correspondents "Liberal" and J. R. Tomlinson—"Liberal" is quite correct in his surmise "that, under the present system of verifying the ballot boxes, it is an easy matter to tell in what proportion the Liberal or Conservative vote is cast in each polling station."

I have had experience in the counting of votes ever since the Ballot Act came into operation, and have often wondered why the candidates' agents should be permitted to overlook the ballot papers during the time the boxes are being verified, as the verification of each box only concerns the Presiding Officer and the Returning Officer or his deputy, who takes over each box from the various Presiding Officers.

Your correspondent's suggestion that the ballot papers should be face downwards would, I think, be an infringement of the Ballot Act, and the numbering of the boxes would be no help, as each one could be identified by the Presiding Officer, who does not surrender his box until after the verification. The only effective way that presents itself to my mind is, not to allow the candidates' agents to overlook the ballot papers until the contents of the boxes have been mixed.—Yours, &c.,

J. SOWERBUTTS.

Stockport, February 8th, 1910.

THE REPERTORY THEATRE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—All lovers of the drama will welcome Mr. Frohman's new venture and wish it prosperity. At last the repertory system seems likely to assume its proper form! But, as Mr. Archer very properly points out, the success of the movement must, to a great extent, depend upon whether the public will take the trouble to remember that, after Monday next, there will be, at the Duke of York's Theatre, a change of bill during the week for the next three weeks; and that this plan of changing the bill every other day, or thereabouts, which is done to ensure our having good plays and good acting, cannot long continue unless playgoers, on their part, make some special effort to keep in mind the new scheme that is being tried at this particular theatre. But much, too, will depend on the interest the public take in the programme, a contingency to which Mr. Archer also refers; and on this point I would venture some criticism. I am sorry not to see on the list for revival a play by St. John Hankin. He was one of our able dramatists, and a pioneer who fought loyally for those better conditions that Mr. Frohman now promises to give us. Surely the recognition of talent, so recently lost to us, would not have been out of place! Then, again, is it wise to announce for representation twenty-six plays, all of which are the work of modern authors? Have the plays of past masters no claim upon a Repertory Theatre? And is there no public impatient to see occasionally a comedy by Sheridan, Goldsmith, Holcroft, or others? Besides, modern dramatists need to have their art judged by comparison with a past master of his craft, and actors gain in distinction by re-creating some old-world characters, while playgoers, who see good models of different periods, acquire a standard of taste and excellence by which they can discern merit, with some certainty that their judgment will be endorsed by posterity.—Yours, &c.,

WILLIAM POEL.

February 16th, 1910.

THE NEED FOR LIBERAL PROPAGANDA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I, through your kindness, ask the writer of a letter in to-day's NATION, signing himself "A West Country Liberal," for a list of books and pamphlets which he would recommend for the study of social questions to which he alludes in his letter?

He would thereby help the carrying out of his suggestion, which I, for one, intend to follow.—Yours, &c.,

A. DE NATORP.

The White Cottage, Berkhamsted, Herts,
January 29th, 1910.

Poetry.

THE COMBATANTS.

Just in the shade of the arena's gate,
They trooped and paused; and to the ranks of eyes
That questioned ere they drove them on to fate,
Steel-swift, steel-steady, did their answers rise—
"I fight to break the tyranny I hate!"
"I come to tear the veil from ancient lies!"
"I seize the odds! Let others share the prize!"
"I fail, that some may conquer, soon or late!"

But one who bore, within that radiant line,
A look as cool as joy, as firm as pain,
And touched his sword, as some rapt village swain
Touches the cup that holds his wedding-wine,
Spoke not, until they urged: "What aim is thine?"
"I fight, that none may ever fight again!"

G. M. HORT.

February 15th, 1910.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE following is our weekly selection of books which we commend to the notice of our readers:—

"The Gates of India: Being an Historical Narrative." By Sir Thomas Holdich. (Macmillan. 10s. net.)

"Confessions of a Clergyman." (Bell. 2s. 6d. net.)

"Samuel Foote: A Biography." By Percy Fitzgerald. (Chatto & Windus. 12s. 6d. net.)

"The Life and Times of Hildebrand (Pope Gregory VII.)."

By the Right Rev. Arnold Harris Mathew, D.D. (Griffiths. 12s. 6d. net.)

"Faith and Fact: A Study of Ritschlianism." By Ernest A. Edgehill. (Macmillan. 5s. net.)

"The Life of W. J. Fox, Public Teacher and Social Reformer (1786-1864)." By the late Richard Garnett, concluded by Edward Garnett. (Lane. 16s. net.)

"The Thief of Virtue." By Eden Phillpotts. (Murray. 6s.)

"When No Man Pursueth." By Mrs. Belloc Lowndes. (Heinemann. 6s.)

"Le Vicomte d'Arincourt, Prince des Romantiques." Par Alfred Marquiset. (Paris: Hachette. 3 fr. 50.)

"Les Dames du Palais." Roman. Par Colette Yver. (Paris: Calmann-Lévy. 3 fr. 50.)

* * *

MR. G. K. CHESTERTON'S "What's Wrong with the World"—to be published by Messrs. Cassell—is a vigorous criticism of several of the main tendencies in contemporary thought. Mr. Chesterton argues that many old ideals have been abandoned, not because they have been tried and found failures, but because they have never been realised in any adequate degree. The subjects discussed are Imperialism, Feminism, Education, Science, Socialism, Individualism, and Art, which Mr. Chesterton expounds as being, respectively, the mistakes about man, woman, the child, the universe, the state, the individual, and beauty.

* * *

MANY readers will be glad to hear that a new biography of Samuel Rogers, by Mr. R. Ellis Roberts, is in preparation. More than fifty years have passed since Rogers was a representative man in London life. His breakfasts were almost as famous for wit-combats as the greatest of the French salons, and his house was the meeting-place for almost everybody of distinction in his time. It was in his dining-room, as Abraham Hayward put it in an "Edinburgh Review" article, "that Erskine told the story of his first brief, and Grattan that of his last duel; that the 'Iron Duke' described Waterloo as a 'battle of giants'; that Byron's intimacy with Moore commenced over the famous mess of potatoes and vinegar; that Madame de Staël, after a triumphant argument with Mackintosh, was (as recorded by Byron) 'well ironed' by Sheridan; that Sydney Smith, at dinner with Walter Scott, Campbell, Moore, Wordsworth, and Washington Irving, declared that he and Irving, if the only prose writers, were not the only prosers in the company." And these names give only a partial idea of the crowd of celebrities with whom Rogers was acquainted. Hayward goes on to tell how Rogers had been proposed for membership of Johnson's club by Fox, seconded by Windham, and blackballed by Malone, how he had met Condorcet at Lafayette's table in 1789, and in one day had heard Robertson preach in the forenoon, Blair in the afternoon, drunk tea with the Piozzis, and supped with Adam Smith.

* * *

"THE BIOGRAPHY OF JOHN BRIGHT," by Mr. R. Barry O'Brien, is announced by Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. Mr. Barry O'Brien's thorough knowledge of English politics and democratic sympathies, together with his previous work as a political biographer, are guarantees that he will do full justice to his subject. He can hardly expect to produce so great a book as his life of Parnell, but he has an eye which may well take in the bold, clear outlines of Bright's personality.

* * *

THE same publishers will shortly issue the second volume of Mr. C. B. Roylance Kent's "History of the Tories." The first volume, which was well received, left off at the death of William III. The coming instalment covers the period between that date and the death of Queen Anne.

* * *

THE French Foreign Legion is a famous background for romance, and has been exploited by a crowd of novelists.

Its realities are less known, though one or two books, written by men who served in the Legion, have been published in this country. The best of these are Mr. J. P. Le Poer's "A Modern Legionary," and Mr. G. Manington's "A Soldier of the Legion." A third, bearing the title, "In the Foreign Legion," is now promised by Messrs. Duckworth. Its author, Mr. Erwin Rosen, after studying at a German University, enlisted in a mood of disappointment and hopelessness, and his book is a criticism of the system which, with its severe discipline and hard conditions, he pronounces to be unworthy of a great nation.

* * *

"RUSKIN AND HIS CIRCLE," by Miss Ada Earland, which Messrs. Hutchinson have in the press, is a study of the facts of Ruskin's life, and of the direct relationship between the influences surrounding his early years and the limitations and contradictions noticeable in his works. The author is of opinion that Ruskin's memory has suffered by the reticence his biographers have observed in regard to his married life. The "circle" includes Carlyle, the Brownings, Turner, Millais, Holman Hunt, Burne-Jones, Rossetti, Kate Greenaway, Coventry Patmore, Arnold Toynbee, Sir Henry Wentworth Acland, Lady Trevelyan, Charles Eliot Norton, and Mary Russell Mitford.

* * *

A VOLUME of literary essays by Mr. Hugh Farrie will be published within the next few weeks by Messrs. Williams & Norgate. Its title is "Highways and Byways in Literature," and the section "On the Highways" treats of the Bible, Seneca, Socrates, Cicero, Virgil, Petronius Arbiter, and Rabelais. "In the Byways" is mainly given up to books that once had a vogue but are now almost forgotten. Among them are Young's "Night Thoughts," Sturm's "Reflections," "The Evangelical Rambler," "The Whole Duty of Man," "The Female Quixote," "The Centaur not Fabulous," and the "Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum."

* * *

A SELECTION from the speeches delivered by President Taft since his nomination will be published next week by Mr. Heinemann, in a volume bearing the title "Political Issues and Outlooks."

* * *

THE series of volumes issued by Messrs. Duckworth under the title of "Studies in Theology" deserve high praise, and are meeting with the success they merit. The books already issued, in particular Dr. Rashdall's "Philosophy and Religion," and Professor Inge's "Faith and Its Psychology," are marked by courage and independence, as well as scholarship, and the volumes now in preparation promise to maintain the same level. These include "Revelation and Inspiration," by Professor James Orr, "The History of Christian Thought since Kant," by Professor E. C. Moore of Harvard, and "A Critical Introduction to the Old Testament," by Dr. Buchanan Gray of Mansfield College.

* * *

A BIOGRAPHY of Edgar Allan Poe, by Mr. Arthur Ransome, is announced for the coming autumn. Several American books on Poe were called forth by his centenary last year, but few writers have avoided the extremes of harsh criticism or indiscriminating apology. One of the best examinations of what may be called the problem of Poe is to be found in Mr. J. M. Robertson's "New Essays Towards a Critical Method."

* * *

MR. EDWARD ARNOLD has several promising travel books in preparation. Mr. Hanns Vischer's "Across the Sahara from Tripoli to Bornu" is the narrative of a journey through a district unexplored by any white man since the days of Barth. Another African book is "With a Prehistoric People: The A-ki-kú of British East Africa," by W. Scoresby Routledge and Katherine Routledge. The authors have made a long stay amongst the interesting people they describe, their object being to give an accurate account of primitive life as it really exists. "A Summer on the Canadian Prairie," by Miss G. B. Clark, and "An English Student's Wander-Year in America," by Miss Bowden-Smith, deal with less out-of-the-way topics. The former is a breezy account of an unsuccessful attempt to settle upon a grant of land in North-West Canada, while the latter treats of a number of educational centres in the United States.

Reviews.

A POET'S SPRING.*

CONFRONTED with such a book as this, criticism must take care to remember the cardinal doctrine that we are not to let associations or circumstances weigh in our judgments of poetry. George Meredith during his life suppressed a great many of his early poems; and here, in accordance with one of our doubtful modern literary customs, they are exhumed. In regard to such a book, the question for criticism is simply this: Is the world of poetry the richer for the revival of these suppressed poems of Meredith's? And to that question the greatness which Meredith afterwards achieved is no more pertinent than Blake's insanity and Chatterton's youth are to criticism of their works. Poets do not always suppress wisely; and when they are unwise in suppression, there is not the smallest reason why their whims should deprive mankind of beautiful words. But, as the present volume shows, Meredith was eminently wise in his suppression, as far, at least, as his poetry was concerned. There is no harm, and there is a good deal of interest, in a temporary revival of the poems he consigned to oblivion; but if all the things here resurrected, these "Poems Written in Early Youth," and the poems excised from the first edition of the "Modern Love" volume, are to be included in the authoritative complete edition of his poetical works, the matter is more serious. The "Poems of George Meredith," as they now stand, along with those fruits of his latest years, are, beside their wonderful intrinsic qualities, so notable among the complete works of modern poets for the entire absence of all but poetic metal of the highest temper, that to dull such collected purity of excellence by inserting work of softer substance, of cruder forging, would be deplorable. Those admirers of Meredith who are more vehement than discriminating will no doubt combat the view that all his published writing should not be preserved; whatever a master of such greatness has given to the world, the world, they say, should reverently retain, as, if not in itself notable, then at least of interest to scholarship or criticism. The notion is but a fetish of our day. Meredith did for himself what somebody should have done for Wordsworth, and there is no reason for undoing it. Songs in which a poet's imagination is either immature or flagging may be interesting to the curious bookman; the poet's business, however, is not with him; but with the man to whom poetry is a vital and adventurous matter; and he requires either good poetry or nothing. It may please some of us to possess the offspring which Meredith had exposed and fondly hoped had perished. But if the whole of these revived poems are included in future complete editions, posterity a few years hence is pretty certain to regard them as troublesome encumbrances. No doubt the copyright editions are safe enough from the intrusion; but the worst of issuing such a volume as this is that it gives an opportunity to some enterprising publisher of the future for bringing out a "complete" edition of Meredith's poems, bearing on the title-page the proud legend, "Including all the suppressed poems."

Let us not, however, be thought wholly ungrateful for the publication of these early, suppressed, and scattered poems. Having pointed out the danger, we may enjoy the advantages. Though no bad poem, whoever was its author, deserves preservation, yet the preservation of a few good poems is worth the risk of encumbering future editions with mediocrity. And though the bulk of this book's contents does not in the least illustrate Meredith's name—much of it, indeed, hardly exhibiting the promise of what was to come after—there are in it several poems which might be bound up with "Modern Love," and the "Ballads of Tragic Life." For the rescue of these it would ill become any true lover of poetry to be anything but deeply grateful. There is, for instance, spacious poetry in the "Ode to the Spirit of Earth in Autumn," which is, of course, fairly well known. The admirable opening lines

"Fair Mother Earth lay on her back last night,
To gaze her fill on Autumn's sunset skies"—

* "Poems Written in Early Youth; Poems from 'Modern Love' (First Edition); and Scattered Poems." By George Meredith. Constable. 6s. net promise a large music, which is sustained right to the last stanza, with its superb simile of the dying redskin chieftain. "The Head of Bran the Blest," which Henley included in his "Lyra Heroica," is a vigorous piece of work, not unworthy of the man who made the song of "Aneurin's Harp," as a poem based on Celtic story. There is an heroic dogmatism in the first verse:—

"When the Head of Bran
Was firm on British shoulders,
God made a man!
Cried all beholders";

And the rest of it goes to the same warlike tune. The wild whirling imagery of "Phantasy," an absurdly successful rendering in neat verses of an outrageous mad dream—the very spirit of sleeping indigestion—is, for sheer cleverness, a remarkable piece of work, certainly not unworthy of permanence. "The Beggar's Soliloquy" might find a place next to "Juggling Jerry," though it is pale beside that noble poem. "South-West Wind in the Woodland" has the importance of being the first recognisable note of Meredith's magnificent nature-song, and, though far from mature, there is writing in it that may earn it a place in any collection of his works. Especially notable is the way the poetry conveys the gradual growth of noise, from the time when the aspens had first felt the approaching breeze, the prelude to the gale, and

"Had caught his earliest windward thought
And told it trembling";

to the time when the full force of hurricane leaps on the wood,

"And ash and oak and oakling rave
And shriek, and shout, and whirl, and toss,
And stretch their arms and split and crack,
And bend their stems and bow their heads.
And grind, and groan, and lion-like
Roar to the echo-peopled hills."

There is sound workmanship and observation in the "Pastorals," but hardly enough distinction to make them worth preserving; and there are one or two lyrics that might be kept in the light. The few "Scattered Poems," though not extraordinarily remarkable, would not be altogether out of place in a complete edition. But, with the exception of the poems we have named, if oblivion overtakes the rest of those which Meredith disowned, it will not be "the iniquity of oblivion." Charles Kingsley perceived great promise in the early poems, and it is much to his credit that he should have done so, and especially that he should have proclaimed it. For, now that we possess Meredith's full achievement, we cannot but wonder at the slender evidence Kingsley had to work on. Save for the fact that not much influence is traceable, these early poems are not even, as we who look back on them from "The Sage Enamored" and the rest might expect, particularly individual. For the most part, they hardly get beyond pretty fancies and pretty phrases. There might certainly be possibilities latent in a young poet who could invent a conceit like this:—

"O Winter! I'd live that life of thine,
With a frosty brow and an icicle tongue,
And never a song my whole life long—
Were such delicious burial mine!
To die and be buried and so remain
A wandering brook in April's train."

And such a thought as this is memorable:—

"Night like a dying mother, Eyes her young offspring, Day."

But these are only brief moments. Young men have done such things before, and never come to great maturity. The juvenile love-poems, curiously shy and awkward, the experiments in classic legend, the attempt at an epic manner (with a hint of Tennyson) in "Idomeneus," at a ballad manner (with a hint of Rossetti) in "Margaret's Bridal Eve,"—these, if narrowly searched, may betray promise of the Meredith whom all the world knows. But we know what to look for; and it was a bold, and as it turned out, an excellent feat in criticism, to prophesy the coming greatness from these beginnings. Look, for instance, at the weak early version of "Love in the Valley"; we, with the later version, one of the most beautiful poems in the language, in our ears, read it with the full knowledge of what the embryo came to. But anyone who saw it for the first time in a newly published book might very excusably reckon it simply as a good enough poem for a young man. On the whole, the main feeling caused by this book is wondering gratitude that out of this not very considerable spring should have grown that superb mastery of storm and splendor which we call the poetic genius of George Meredith.

LORD KELVIN.*

Is it possible to write a life of Lord Kelvin which would appeal to the interest and understanding of ordinary readers? His life may be regarded as one ceaseless effort of science to reveal itself to mankind; his language was an almost unbroken scientific discourse, and his thought was for ever exercising itself either with the solution of problems the principles of which were known, or with speculations concerning the deepest mysteries of the universe where no foundation of principles has yet been laid. The difficulty of presenting an intelligible account of such a man and his work is obvious enough, but we think that Professor Silvanus Thompson has in the two volumes before us attained all the success that was possible. The whole of Lord Kelvin's work was so profound, all-embracing, and mathematically technical, that the difficulty of writing a popular biography is enormous. Lord Kelvin himself depreciated mathematical technicalities, regarding them as entirely subordinate to the physical principles and facts of which they are the mere expression; and this view formed the new departure which broke the chain that tied physics to the "mathematical problems" of the Cambridge Tripos, and started applied mathematical science on a new career. Professor Thompson has steered clear of all the mathematical symbols and equations, while presenting results and principles in simple language, and he may be warmly congratulated on his achievement.

William Thomson (the future Lord Kelvin) had from his earliest years the great advantage of being taught by his father, James Thomson, an extraordinarily skilful teacher, and the author of many school-books of remarkable excellence. James Thomson was, however, more than this: he was a man full of worldly wisdom, as is shown by various pieces of advice tendered to his son towards the close of the undergraduate career of the latter at Cambridge. The object on which, above all others, James Thomson had set his heart was the appointment of his son to the professorship of Natural Philosophy in the University of Glasgow, which might at any moment become vacant by the death of its holder, a man in feeble health. Great was the manœuvring on the part of the zealous father to effect this; many were the maxims of worldly wisdom transmitted from Glasgow to the young undergraduate at Cambridge: "In your walk of life also, you must take care not only to do what is right, but to take equal care always to appear to do so." Whether this is the highest morality or not, the whole record shows that James Thomson was the best of fathers, and that never for one moment did he relax his efforts for his son's success. Indeed, the fact that he paid nearly £800 for his son's three undergraduate years at Cambridge, with only occasional advice to avoid all unnecessary expense, proves that he was a man of really generous character. The above expense for the early 'forties is enough to give us pause. It is about the same as the ordinary expenditure of an Oxford or Cambridge undergraduate to-day—and yet it is a preposterous figure, which can scarcely fail to make our newer Universities more attractive and desirable than their elders.

The scientific career of William Thomson may be said to have begun with the study, when he was only sixteen years old, of Fourier's "Théorie Analytique de la Chaleur," and the mathematical method of this work inspired him throughout the whole of his life. Thermodynamics, the science of heat, occupied him at great length in his early years, and even to the last it had strong fascination for him. The story of his struggles with this subject is well told by Professor Silvanus Thompson. It may sound strange, but the truth is that for several years Thomson not only held erroneous views of the nature of heat, but combated the true view, which was put forth by Joule of Manchester, and vainly dinned into the ears of hostile listeners at various British Association meetings. In those days heat was universally believed to be a substance, called caloric, which could neither be created nor destroyed, but which could be, as it were, squeezed out of bodies, and could be "let down" from a body at high temperature to one of low temperature. The doing of work, the driving of an engine, was supposed to be done by this "letting down" of caloric—just as we let down a heavy block from the top of a wall to the ground. Joule maintained, and proved by experiment, that heat is not a substance, that it can be created and put out of existence; and that, in fact, it consists of the energy of rapid vibrations of the molecules of bodies. Thomson and all other men of science refused to accept this view; but the old belief nevertheless had its difficulties for him. What finally converted him to Joule's view? To understand this matter, we may mention a common question now found in scientific school-books: "What is the cause of the severity of a scald from steam?" To make the question more accurate, we should say that the steam is just on the point of becoming water, and will do so if a cold surface (like that of the hand) is brought into contact with it. The reason, of course, is that the steam, in condensing on the hand, instantly gives out its latent heat, which it possesses in very considerable amount. But if the steam is at such a high temperature that it will not instantly condense on the hand, this latent heat is not given out, and the hand receives only a comparatively small amount of heat. Now in the year 1849 Thomson's attention was called to the fact that steam, issuing with great velocity through an orifice, does not scald as steam would in ordinary circumstances. Having pondered on this, he wrote to Joule: "This conclusion can, I think, be reconciled with known facts only by means of your discovery that heat is evolved by the friction of fluids in motion"; in other words, he concluded that the violent rubbing of the steam particles among themselves and against the sides of the orifice generated heat in the steam, and raised its temperature so much that it would not instantly condense on a hand put in its path. What strikes an ordinary reader about this is that it seems strange that Thomson's conversion to the non-materiality of heat should have waited for such a recondite result, when there must have been many common instances of the generation of heat by friction.

His opposition to Joule's principle of the actual generation of heat by work was not the only instance in which he showed a kind of conservative reluctance to adopt new ideas. He was by no means a willing convert to Clerk Maxwell's Electromagnetic Theory of Light; but the ætheric (or wireless) telegraphy of Hertz rendered a continued opposition impossible. Again, for Hamilton's Quaternions he had no toleration, on the ground that whatever could be proved or deduced by Quaternions could always be proved by the ordinary mathematical analysis. His opposition here was unjustifiable, for, unquestionably, many results can be obtained by the newer calculus much more easily than by the old; and he should have assuredly recognised the maxim "baith's best"; but to this view he could never be converted by his colleague Tait.

To notice with the smallest approach to adequacy the varied work of Lord Kelvin is quite impossible, because there was scarcely a nook or cranny of science into which his genius did not penetrate. The geologists did not like his intrusion into their domain, because (in common with the biologists) they require hundreds of millions of years for the existence of this earth, while he was prepared to grant only something between 25 and 100 millions. Even when radium as a practically endless source of heat was discovered, and altered profoundly all mathematical calculations of the age of the earth, Lord Kelvin denied the adequacy of radium. But his marvellous activity of mind, displayed up to almost the month of his death, is shown by his incessant attempts to account for the nature of radium and the breaking up of atoms.

Professor Thompson has a long chapter on the "Views and Opinions," religious and other, of Lord Kelvin. The religious views of a great man of science are not always of a kind to produce profound impressions, or even to command great respect, for the simple reason that the subject matter of religion is not always an object on which a scientific worker spends much time. Lord Kelvin, it is interesting to know, "was a sincere Christian (meaning by Christianity the religion taught by Christ rather than the religion taught by the Churches)." He held the broad-minded view (so different from that of Wallace) that living beings are by no means confined to this planet, but exist in the worlds of other suns—indeed, he had a theory that life from such worlds has been occasionally conveyed to us in the interior of meteorites.

* "The Life of William Thomson, Baron Kelvin of Largs." By Silvanus P. Thompson. Macmillan. Two vols. 30s.

To find the intellectual equal of Lord Kelvin in scientific intuition, we have to think of Archimedes, Galileo, and Newton. Owing to the difference of surrounding circumstances, a comparison is impossible; but assuredly Lord Kelvin had no superior. The list of his contributions to science at the end of Professor Thompson's work is of enormous length; and even such a scientific giant as Helmholtz was obliged to say after meeting him, "he far exceeds all the great men of science with whom I have made personal acquaintance, in intelligence, and lucidity, and mobility of thought, so that I felt quite wooden beside him sometimes."

We take leave of Professor Thompson's volumes with a consciousness, not only of the difficulty of his task, but of the inadequacy of our own powers of epitomising such a theme.

SAN THOMÉ SLAVERY.*

MR. WILLIAM CADBURY'S carefully written report is the latest link in the evidence upon the atrocious system of slavery still existing in the Portuguese Colonies of Angola and the San Thomé islands, and one can only wish it may be the last required. Though Mr. Cadbury does not allude to the reports of any previous travellers, except Mr. Joseph Burt and Mr. Charles Swan, with whom he was himself personally connected, there have been many such, extending over a period of nearly sixty years, since the time of Livingstone. Certainly, the system has changed, and the cruelties of the slave routes are perhaps not so terrible as they were ten years ago, before the rising of a native tribe against its oppressors. The process has also been put under legal forms, since the nominal abolition of slavery in 1874. But the accounts given by Lord Mayo and Mr. Arnot in the 'eighties, and at the beginning of this century by Col. Colin Harding, would serve in most details as a description of what I saw myself in my journey through the country and the islands five years ago, and, in spite of all the promises of the Portuguese Government, it is evident from Mr. Cadbury's report and from private letters received by me that there has been little real improvement since.

New regulations have been passed, and for the first time some attempt has been made to repatriate a few of the slaves from the islands. If properly carried out, the repatriation would be a great advance; but it is worse than useless to dump natives down on the coast, in all probability several hundred miles from their homes, and with every chance of being sold over again, either by Europeans or their relatives. And as to regulations, there were plenty of them before, and though the new code ordains reforms, the worst part of the old regulations was that no one observed them. For more than thirty years the rules about repatriation were definite and admirable, but not a soul was ever repatriated.

The whole colony of Angola is, in fact, so rotten with slavery that reform must be difficult. For centuries it has been the main Portuguese depôt for the export slave traffic, and it is so still, except that the slaves now go to the Portuguese cocoa islands instead of to the Brazils or the Southern States of America. Slavery has never ceased there, and at the present time all the plantations on the mainland, I believe without one exception, are cultivated by slave labor. As Mr. Cadbury says, the system, especially on the islands, is not unlike the old system on the cotton plantations of the Southern States. As far as I know, it comes nearer to that than any other system of labor still maintained. In method it differs from the oppression of natives in the Congo State. I do not say it is worse, but it is more direct. It follows old-fashioned lines; the men and women are captured or bartered in the interior, driven to the coast in gangs, sold by agents to planters, and transhipped to the plantations where, until quite lately, they invariably worked for the rest of their lives, which, as a rule, were short. When I was there, the annual average of men and women exported was about 4,000; but the latest obtainable figures show an annual rate of some 6,000. I found the cost of slaves to the planters to be about £30 per head. Mr. Cadbury gives the same figure, but I believe the price is rising.

I was myself surprised to find this old-fashioned slavery defended by the old-fashioned cant and hypocrisy about the advantages the slave obtained from religious conversion and settled occupation. I should not have thought it worth while for business slavers to plead such excuses. But Mr. Cadbury evidently heard the same during his visit a year ago; indeed, the religious argument seems to have been impressed on him with special fervor:—

"The statement," he writes, "was often made by the supporters of the Angola servical system, that by ransoming the man from his condition of spiritual darkness in Africa, and placing him within the reach of the priest on the estate in S. Thomé, you confer upon him the incomparable blessing of religion in this life and salvation for the life to come. I told my friends that to offer a man religion is no sufficient compensation for slavery."

With equal firmness Mr. Cadbury repudiated the piece of cant which I also frequently heard put forward in justification—that the agents on the coast who buy the slaves and sell them again to the islands are only "redeeming" them from cruel slavery:—

"I deny the right of any individual," says Mr. Cadbury definitely, "under a civilised government thus to trade in human flesh; nor is a contract made or confirmed on the coast with a man who has been driven across hundreds of miles of unknown country in a slave gang, and shackled at night to prevent his escape, the act of a freeman. Slavery in the interior of Angola among uncivilised tribes cannot be seriously brought forward as a justification for slavery under the flag of a European country."

I have never supposed that on the island plantations themselves the valuable slaves were treated with great cruelty, except in the recapture of fugitives; and Mr. Cadbury, who enjoyed the rather dubious advantage of official recognition during his visit, considered their condition even better than I did. But he admits the terrible effects of the monotonous toil, the long hours, and the hopelessness of the existence:—

"One is compelled to believe," he writes, "that the high death-rate is largely due to the circumstances under which the labor is obtained, and the mental and physical condition of the contracted laborer. The statement is made over and over again that the first few months on the roça are the most deadly, and that some new arrivals never recover from their low state of body and mind."

As to the possible lines of reform in this abominable system, Mr. Cadbury puts forward many excellent recommendations—a genuine regulation of recruiting, under disinterested Government officials (rather rare birds in Angola, by the way!); a genuine freedom of contract; a reduction of the length of contracts and of hours of labor; a provision making the return of a man and his family the recognised and easily available right; and a scheme for ensuring a laborer's safe return to his home in the interior. A further provision, I believe never mentioned in any decree or regulation, is thus insisted upon by that gallant little Portuguese paper, the "Voz de Angola," published in Loanda:—

"Not only are the workers enslaved to unending toil, under the most repugnant methods of exploitation, but also the children they now have, and those that will be born to them. . . . There are no children, no parents, no law of succession, no social or human rights; there is nothing; what exists there is an animal, under the control of the master—and as this animal becomes absolutely necessary, it is, materially speaking, treated as well as can be, so that it does not fail to give the largest amount of production and reproduction."

It is as I saw myself, and mentioned in my account of the subject: children born on the estate become the undisputed property of the owner, and they are sold with the estate when it changes hands. Here is room for reform enough; the difficulty is to carry reforms out. You have a colony rotten with slavery, as I said; a population habituated to it; a feeble Government, represented by a few officials, frequently corrupt or connected with the trade; helpless and unwarlike tribes in the interior; and a small clique of wealthy plantation owners, chiefly living in Portugal. Under such conditions, mere regulations are useless without a clear and powerful administration to enforce them. Many Portuguese are as anxious for reform as anyone could be, and a few indecisive steps have, indeed, been taken. But to myself the most hopeful signs are, first, the recent revolt by which the laborers lately brought as an experiment from Mozambique compelled the planters to fulfil their contract of repatriation; and, secondly, the exposure of the system by such reports as Mr. Cadbury's and Mr. Burt's (included in this volume) and the consequent boycott of the San Thomé cocoa by the British firms—an example which Mr. Burt is at the present time persuading the great American firms to follow. Now that the facts of the abomination are finally established, I cannot believe that the peoples of Europe and America will allow it to continue, even for gain.

* "Labour in Portuguese West Africa." By William A. Cadbury. Routledge. 2s. 6d.

HENRY W. NEVINSON.

A NEW LIFE OF THACKERAY.*

TENNYSON once described biography as being cut open after death, and anticipated the process in his own case. He resented the intrusion of "the many-headed beast" into his private life. So far, he has been curiously exempt. We have had a portentous biography, fully authorised, many letters, and much gossip, but no real portrait of Tennyson, with his various idiosyncrasies, most of them lovable. Every letter that might have revealed the real man has been carefully eliminated. Possibly this has something to do with the reaction against Tennyson's writings that is so marked in the criticisms of the younger generation. It is impossible to separate personality from authorship, at least after a writer is once dead. Thackeray went much further than Tennyson, for he actually forbade a biography of himself. At least, a casual remark to his daughter was understood by her as a prohibition, which she has in a sense respected. To fight against this kind of fame is, however, hopeless, if fame has been acquired in another way. Not all the restrictions in the world can prevent the telling of the life-story of any man who really interests the public. Everything must come out sooner or later, and the dead hand can have no more weight when it attempts to crush the enthusiasm of after years than when it attempts to tie up money upon eccentric lines. Thackeray's death has been followed by many biographical efforts. Perhaps the most precious of these is the "Collection of Letters" written to Mrs. Brookfield, which originally appeared in the "Century Magazine." They were published in 1887 by Messrs. Smith & Elder, in a limited edition, we suppose with the sole object of securing the copyright in this country. Then came a little biography of Thackeray by his friend, Anthony Trollope, a poor book in many respects, when you consider that it came from so gifted a penman, but offering some further light on a singularly fine personality. Lady Ritchie, Thackeray's daughter, was not far behind, with the publication in "St. Nicholas's Magazine" of a lengthy article on "The Boyhood of Thackeray." Here Lady Ritchie gave away the whole case, so far as attempts at biography were concerned. She gave it away still more by her biographical introductions to her father's novels. In this there was nothing that called for censure. Indeed, Lady Ritchie probably arrived at the "golden mean" in her attempt to respect Thackeray's wishes, however deeply we may deplore the loss of what would probably have been one of the half-dozen best biographies in our language.

From those days to our own, books upon Thackeray have come out with regular persistency. We recall Merivale and Marzials's little biography published in 1891. "Thackeray in the United States," and "Letters to an American Family," are books that were both published in 1904, and we might cultivate the long list indefinitely. The most pertinacious student of Thackeray's career has been Mr. Lewis Melville, whose substantial biography of Thackeray in two large volumes lies before us. Mr. Melville published a Life in 1899, and amplified it in an American edition the same year. Here is a widely different book, however, from the work issued eleven years ago. Mr. Melville has now brought together his material with far more literary art than heretofore. He has really acquired an astonishing quantity of documents from many quarters, a task that must have been rendered the more difficult through the exigencies of copyright. One source of information, however, we note with a certain satisfaction, Mr. Melville has not drawn upon, and that is the admirable account printed in 1891 by the late Mr. Castle, of "Thackeray as a Parliamentary Candidate." Mr. Castle was a member of Thackeray's committee at Oxford, and he has told the whole story as it has never been told elsewhere. Charles Neate had fought Edward Cardwell, and Neate had been successful, but had been unseated on petition. A new candidate was wanted. The Whig wire-pullers decided they must send down to Oxford "a distinguished man," and Thackeray, eager for Parliamentary honors, threw himself into the breach. "His advisor," said Mr. Castle, "had forgotten Hazlitt's description of Oxford, which concludes with the warning, 'Do not speak to one of its citizens, or the beauty of the place will disappear.'" They had forgotten, also, that only a short time previously, "Punch" had described Thackeray "as personally requesting permission of the Vice-Chancellor of the University to lecture in Oxford." To the amazement of the author, that dignity was represented as not knowing him. When told that he was the author of "Vanity Fair," he enquired whether he was a Dissenter, and any connection of John Bunyan. Thackeray went to Oxford, and he met many people quite as ignorant as the Vice-Chancellor. In no case was the authorship of "Vanity Fair" of much use to him. One man said that, as a Methodist, he would neither have a novel nor the writer of a novel in his house; he was satisfied with Bunyan. Speaking generally, the city had never heard of one of his books. He wrote to Charles Dickens, indeed, to the effect that only six people in the place knew him, while all knew Dickens, and he begged Dickens to come down and speak at a public meeting. Dickens declined, and Thackeray was at the bottom of the poll, a circumstance that no one can regret to-day, for his defeat has added at least three or four masterpieces to our literature.

Here we are tempted to demur to the attitude of deference towards all Thackeray's work, that Mr. Melville, in common with so many of Thackeray's admirers, is disposed to adopt. Thackeray did, indeed, give to the English literature of his day a style which it is a joy to study. His work from this point of view might well be recommended to the young student of literature with something of the same enthusiasm that was once given to the writings of Addison. But when this has been said, it is well to look facts in the face, and to preserve some balance of judgment. When John Sterling said that the "Hoggarty Diamond" was better than Fielding or Goldsmith, and added that "there was more truth to nature in one of its pages than in all Dickens's novels," he wrote uncritically and even absurdly. Mr. Melville, as becomes an enthusiastic biographer, endorses John Sterling's statement. Thackeray has an undying reputation. But those who unearth his minor writings, and even praise them, do him small service. Even to-day there is a certain reaction against his really great works. One critic of talent recently admitted to not having read "The Virginians." A gifted living novelist has declared in print his preference over Thackeray for a living author whose work is largely reminiscent. This, we are convinced, is a passing phase. Thackeray's "Vanity Fair," "Pendennis," "The Newcomes," "The Virginians," and "Esmond," are all quite as safe as "Tom Jones" and "Amelia." But when this is said, Mr. Melville's attempt at a comparison with Dickens is not good enough for publication in a serious book. The old criticism of Dickens's novels as not being true to life is now exploded, although it was propounded freely enough by the literary class in the days when Dickens and Thackeray were both writing. Even George Eliot declared that Dickens's works could not live after the life that he had described had passed away, whereas Dickens lives as much to-day as he ever did. His contemporaries could not realise any such future for Dickens. They saw a man of exuberant gaiety, of flashy waistcoats, whose intellectual grip was not of the finest. "How was it possible that this man could be one of the 'immortals'?" they asked, as they compared him with the gentlemanly, scholarly, and self-restrained Thackeray. Contemporaries of Shakspeare and Ben Jonson must have thought much the same about those two men. But time has demonstrated the high quality of Dickens's achievement. His work, next to that of Shakspeare and Bunyan, has most entered into the heart and soul of the English-speaking race.

* "William Makepeace Thackeray." By Lewis Melville. Lane. 2 vols. 25s. net.

This, however, is by the way. There is plenty of room for "Thackeray worship," and Mr. Melville gives it to us. He has taken infinite pains, he has collected from a multitude of quarters nearly every piece of material pertinent to the subject, and the result is a book that deserves to be read. Not the most exigent of critics inclined to deplore the unnecessary unveiling of private life, will find anything here to which to take exception. Thackeray stands before us as an heroic, kindly man. The story of his career is thoroughly stimulating. It will come as an astonishment to many that death came to him at fifty-two years of age. Some of the portraits represent a man of eighty. Every man of fifty-two feels young to-day. Thackeray felt an old man when he died. Was there something in the life that was led in those days that is quite different from anything that obtains in ours? In any case, Thackeray had done his life work, and we may all be grateful to Mr. Melville for his judicious presentation of it. He has written a book that will hold its place as the standard "Life of Thackeray" for many a year to come.

A BANTU NATION.*

THE story of the conglomeration of Bantu tribes which, after much wandering and many bloody fights, settled down in the little oval-shaped country that lies tucked away in the folds of the Drakensberg, is full of interest and political instruction. Seldom do we find so much "history" made in so short a time as in the story of Basutoland, and in Sir Godfrey Lagden, who has himself played so excellent a part in helping to make this history, we have a narrator of unusual skill. His task is no easy one; for, though the country has now reached a period of settlement and peace, its early years were filled with unceasing turmoil and conflict. Indeed, it is difficult to believe that the Basutos would have had much chance of holding together against the harassing tactics of the Free Staters and their own intestine disturbances had it not been for the fortune which furnished them with a great statesman. Few peoples owe so much to any single chief as the Basutos to Moshesh, who for fifty years strove to secure for them conditions of peace and independence, together with such of the fruits of civilisation as they were able gradually to assimilate. By no means an ideal character, as measured by the accepted moral standard, capable of duplicity and occasional acts of treachery, Moshesh nevertheless grasped with a true instinct for statecraft the conditions under which Basuto unity and prosperity were possible. His people must be trained to peace and industry in order to earn a satisfactory livelihood from agricultural and pastoral life in a mountainous land, and they must therefore take such education as white missionaries had to give in the industrial arts, absorbing along with it some not too impracticable Christianity. The liquor which bad white men pressed upon them must be expelled, the excesses of witchcraft which defeated justice and fomented feuds must be put down, and, above all things, white prospectors and traders must be prevented from acquiring land. The most urgent and incessant trouble was with the Boers of the Free State, who, in the unsettled state of frontiers, constantly indulged in land-grabbing, and afterwards sought to get their encroachments recognised by treaties. From quite early times Moshesh perceived that his best policy lay in appealing to the Imperial Government for their protection and for the presence of an agent who should secure for them the safety of British rule while reducing the detailed interference with native government to the smallest dimensions. Could this appeal have been favorably received when it was first made, in 1862, the subsequent wars and wastes which the shilly-shally policy of the Imperial and the Cape Governments involved might have been spared, and the civilisation of Basutoland have been advanced a whole generation. It is quite clear that Lord Carnarvon's refusal to assume Imperial control in 1866 was responsible for infinite mischief. Basutoland could not stand entirely alone, and the experiment of annexation by the Cape was, no doubt, inevitable. Had Cape statesmen had the wisdom to recognise that a people like the Basutos could not be treated like "common Kafirs," all might have yet gone well. But the demand for disarmament was bound to arouse the spirit of a free people with military traditions. The Dis-Annexation Act of 1883 was a necessary consequence of the somewhat ignominious failure of the Cape to restore order, and next year the Imperial Government definitely set its hand to what must be regarded as perhaps the most successful instance of its rule over a lower race.

Though the subsequent history of Basutoland has been far from uneventful, chiefly owing to the vagaries of wild chieftains like Masapha, a solid basis of peace and industrial development has been maintained. This success has certainly been due in a large degree to the wise choice of British administrators. Sir Marshall Clarke was a man of fine sympathy and great tact, and he laid down the lines of a policy which gave the maximum of play to the free traditions of the Basutos. Sir Godfrey Lagden, who succeeded him in the eventful period of South African history, 1893 to 1901, conducted the country with great capacity through the strain of the great war, when the whole situation was at times extremely perilous. But Sir Godfrey himself sets down much of the credit of the policy to the character and aspirations of the Basutos, who want security and are willing to be controlled by white men whom they recognise as friendly to them and interested in their welfare.

Sir Godfrey does not conceal the cloud that has recently come up on the political horizon. The Basutos are unanimous in expressing their fear lest, as a result of the new South African Union, the safeguard of Imperial protection should be withdrawn, and they should be handed over to a Government which may be less careful of their liberties. To their powerful appeal last summer we cannot regard Lord Crewe's reply as satisfactory; for, while expressing a desire that no change should occur at present, he does not conceal the likelihood that Basutoland will be handed over later on; and, although he dwells upon the provisions which the Imperial Government will make in such an event to maintain the integrity of the land, the exclusion of liquor, and the retention of their National Council, close study of the powers which the South African Government will possess over absorbed territories makes these safeguards very dubious.

FROM THE RIGHT WING.*

CONSERVATIVE introductions to the New Testament have the knack of running to some length. Both Holtzmann and Jülicher have said their say in single volumes of moderate compass, but the majority of their opponents on the right wing, as Dr. Chalmers would have said, "expatiate." Jacquier's French work occupies no less than four volumes. Godet's would have taken several, had it ever been finished. The English version of B. Weiss's manual filled a couple of volumes, and now we have Zahn's introduction in no less than three stout volumes, which do not even include any account of the canon or the text. They represent the third and revised edition of the German original. Apart from an introduction, which is mainly devoted to the problems of the language, and a supplementary chapter on the chronology, the contents are confined to a thorough-going discussion of the literary and historical problems connected with the books of the New Testament canon. The unwieldy paragraphs of the original have been occasionally broken up, much to the benefit of the English reader, and an excellent general index is provided. Otherwise, the translation justifies the claim of being "in every detail a reproduction of the last German edition."

The specific features of Zahn's invaluable work are familiar to all critical students of the New Testament. He makes no attempt to provide exhaustive bibliographical

* "The Basutos: The Mountaineers and Their Country." By Sir Godfrey Lagden. Hutchinson. 2 vols. 24s. net.

* "Introduction to the New Testament." By Theodor Zahn, Professor of New Testament Exegesis, Erlangen University. Translated from the Third German Edition. T. & T. Clark. 3 vols. 36s.

information; references to other critics occur now and then, but they are eclectic. The strength of the treatise lies in the notes appended to each chapter, in which Zahn often provides textual material of unrivalled excellence out of his stores of scholarship. Good examples of this occur in vol. ii. pp. 565f, on the text of Matt. i. 16, and in vol. i. pp. 394f, on Rom. i. 7. Whatever may be thought of Zahn's conclusions—and they are distinguished by almost as much ingenuity as slavish adherence to tradition—his statement of the data seldom fails to do justice to the particular case under review, and this is particularly true of the data from early Christian tradition.

The arguments for the early date of James, as a pre-Pauline writing, add nothing to what English readers may find in Mayor's commentary. Galatians is put first among Paul's epistles, though Zahn wisely refuses to accept Professor Ramsay's interpretation of Γαλατικὴ χώρα in Acts as an allusion to the province of that name. The author's ingenuity reaches its climax, perhaps, in the discussion of the Petrine epistles; the second is actually put earlier than the first and regarded as more Petrine! If literary criticism had ever a plain verdict, it would be to reverse such an extraordinary opinion. The very fact that a scholar of Zahn's rank should seriously propound it, is a tribute to the increasing conviction that no date for 2 Peter, after 1 Peter, can be maintained, apart from an admission that the later writing is pseudonymous. In the section on Hebrews, Zahn incidentally makes an admission which, had he acted fully on it, would have saved him from several fanciful attempts to connect the New Testament writings with subsequent traditions of the second and third centuries, by reading the latter at all hazards into the former. "We must remember," he observes (vol. ii., p. 294), "that most of the ecclesiastical tradition regarding the writings of the New Testament is only the echo of the testimony of the documents regarding themselves; and this tradition is good or bad according as this self-testimony was correctly understood or not. Nevertheless the history of an epistle like Ephesians shows us that even such traditions as had no support from the document itself became dominant in the Church at a very early time." The bearing of this second principle is not fully seen till the reader passes on to Zahn's investigation of the gospels, where he finds the author practically defending such inferential and inferior traditions at all costs. The sections on the Apocalypse, in particular, are vitiated by a disregard of this cause, and much the same may be said of the paragraphs upon the Fourth Gospel. Nothing more ingenious, nothing less persuasive, could well be written by an expert on such problems.

Zahn has a bald style; no literary crispness relieves the pages of his writing. Over thirty years ago, Renan playfully criticised one of his early books in these words: "Quiconque aura le courage de lire ces 650 pages, écrites d'un style obscur et embarrassé, possédera réellement les éléments pour résoudre la question; mais tout le travail du raisonnement et de la critique restera bien à sa charge." The same verdict applies to this elaborate introduction. Zahn refers to Renan's grumble with a good-humored protest that scientific investigation cannot always robe itself in elegant robes, but, while this is true within limits, it does not meet the full brunt of the objection, and, unluckily, the natural baldness of the German is intensified in the English version. We cannot speak with much enthusiasm of the way in which Professor Jacobus and his American coadjutors have translated this work. The pages contain not only more inaccuracies and misprints than should be reasonably allowed for in an undertaking of this size, but passages in which the sense of the original has been either obscured or missed through sheer carelessness. Once or twice, for example, "von" is rendered as if it were "vor," with disastrous results (e.g., in vol. i., p. 202, note 2), and twice at least mispunctuation has distorted the real meaning of the original (e.g., vol. i., p. 514, note 2, second line; vol. iii., page 171, note 2, line 4); "exactly," on page 228 (vol. iii., note 13) should be "inexactly"; "not" on page 257 of vol. iii. (line 15 from top) makes havoc of the sense and should be omitted; the last sentence, in large type, on page 115 of vol. i. is nonsense, and so forth. These are errors noted at random. All over there are far too many instances also, not only of incorrectness, but of a literalism which is uncomely and even misleading. Upon the whole, the English reader will be able to make out Zahn's meaning, but the translators' work is not a special credit to themselves or to the distinguished scholar whom they have introduced to the English-speaking public.

A CLEVER AMERICAN NOVEL.*

WHEN the history of style comes to be written, an instructive chapter might be devoted to showing how the infection of a writer's manner may spread and give rise to a school, if the soil of culture be favorable to the particular kind of seed. A modern illustration is Mr. Henry James's literary method, which is now fashioning the manner of perhaps the cleverest women novelists in America. Mr. James invented an original mode of analysing social relations, a literary tapestry in which the finest shades of feminine subtlety can find infinite scope for pattern weaving. So dexterous is this school of fiction that one might boldly affirm that in its results the master is proved worthy of his pupils. Special characteristics of his handling reappear with such fresh and spontaneous effects added, as we see in "Other People's Houses," to prove that Mr. James's cosmopolitan graft can flourish and bear abundantly in the soil of American culture.

The heroine of the story, Miss Emily Stedman, a frail New England literary lady, "the only daughter of Hornmouth's most cherished professor," is the last of a line of scholars whose "learned blood is running thin." We are offered glimpses of her fragile youth when, as a pale little girl, all athirst for knowledge, she sits in the Hornmouth Library, puzzling as to why the classic Venue is always represented as a smooth-limbed woman with a calm and passive air. For her it is "only the things she thought about which mattered," and the centre of her thoughts is her superbly healthy and handsome boy cousin, Ralph Parrish, with whom she plays, robs orchards, goes night poaching, and condoles after he has been licked in a fight. Ralph represents to her eager spirit the tangible, normal joys of life which she, with her invalid's body, thirsts for but never can attain. Years pass, and when we meet Miss Stedman again she is a celebrity. Her novel, "The Cuckoo," is the sensational book of the year, and with the fame and money it brings her, she, a spinster of thirty, bids good-bye to cramped and dull Hornmouth for good, and establishes herself in a smart little gilded flat in New York. The subtlety of her relations with Ralph Parrish, now a prosperous New Yorker, with cosmopolitan business interests, is finely indicated. The woman acts "as an interpreter of himself to himself; she seemed to cast a brilliant light by which he found it possible to see." Ralph, who feels all the old ties of habit, does not want anybody else to marry his cousin; he is always wondering whether, if he proposes to her, she will refuse him, but then he has the chilling suspicion at back that, after all, marriage with him may be her aim. She holds him only by the fine-spun threads of affection, and one of the cleverest chapters in the book is the analysis of Miss Stedman's reflections when those threads have snapped in a crisis and Ralph, in a letter of clumsy masculine prevarication, which is designed to hoodwink her, betrays to her sharpened sense that she has definitely lost him. She sees her world in pieces, and herself as a solitary old maid. "She had never before realised how much her possession of him had been a part of herself . . . even her faith in the future tottered. It wasn't so all before her as she had supposed. What guarantee had she that that 'remainder which was allowed her' would be any less wasted than what had gone before?"

From the critic's point of view, the novel of subtle feminine shades of emotional values is more difficult to do justice to than is any other class. It is less the character of the people that the drawing fixes for us than the light of personal relations, mental, moral, and emotional, which is constantly shifting round them, like changing weather. Character, once it has been cleverly sketched in, is taken for granted, and the writer is left free to chase that most elusive quarry, mood and temperamental feeling. To Mr. Henry James and his clever school a conversational duel between three ladies on a lawn is far more thrilling than any field of battle, for everything in the people's lives may be indicated or disclosed at such a moment, by the revealing clash of personality. Miss E. B. Dewing has, we think, escaped the pitfall into which Mr. James has occasionally stumbled, by making her literary spinster heroine the real pivot of the tale. Miss Emily Stedman, in her ironic self-consciousness, her fine nervous intelligence, her physical insignificance, and her thirst for happiness, is a type of modern womanhood that most men have known, and the author is to be congratulated on this fact, that her piece of portraiture looks down upon us as naturally from English as from New England walls. In admirable contrast to this lady, whom nature has infallibly marked out for the backwaters of spinsterhood, is the presentation of the superbly smooth and large and magnificently unruffled woman of cosmopolitan experience, Mrs. Dench. The reviewer, at this juncture, may avow without shame that the triumph of Mrs. Dench's personality is only to be appreciated between the leaves of "Other People's Houses." The methods of this impressionist school in fiction aim at conveying the ceaseless complexity of life. There is perpetual movement and regrouping, personal atmosphere and cosmopolitan interchange. Veils are donned and cast off carelessly by all the characters in turn, when the spin of the wheel brings them to the appropriate crisis. Mrs. Dench, and her daughter Jane, the Venue Anadyomene of the tale, are magnificently drawn. We first meet these ladies while they are yachting in the Mediterranean as the guests of the Duke and Duchess de Clopin, at which point the millionaire, Mr. Barlow, of Barlow's Barley Buns fame, and his son David, enter the story.

* "Other People's Houses." By E. B. Dewing. Macmillan. 6s.

The author's touch in these European scenes, though clever, is lacking in certainty, and she does not really conquer the reader till she and fate have reassembled all the characters at Ocean City, a health resort on the other side of the Atlantic. Here, on the wind-swept esplanade, and in the long piazza and the "sun parlor" of the great "Tide-water Hotel," the tragi-comedy is played out between the three women, Miss Stedman, and Mrs. Dench and her daughter Jane, which ends in Ralph falling to the bow and spear of Jane, in all the beauty, and strong freshness, and "wonderful goodness" of her youth. It only gradually looms upon us that while Mrs. Dench is in love with Ralph, she has aimed at passing on her lover, David, to her imperturbable daughter. The analysis of the depths within depths of feminine craft and meaning is all incredibly brilliant to the simple masculine mind. Mrs. Dench, we may hint, is possessed of a vastness of experience, suggesting the ocean's basking surface, secrets of the sea goddess which glimmer beneath the polished unruffled expanse of her wonderful talk. The critic, watching the evolution of the author's intricate gambit, can only criticise, here and there, an individual move in her game. We cannot believe that Mrs. Dench, for example, could so lose her sense of the convenances as to unmask her last batteries, in the anguish of realising that her daughter is winning the great prize for which she, herself, is struggling. It is almost a relief to our simple old-world intelligence to discover that when Miss Dewing's astounding feats of pilotage in the dangerous channels and reefs of her subject fail, she strands us abruptly on very hard, bare, crude rocks. The figure of David Barlow is not a success, and the closing chapter in which Miss Stedman rejects his hand and fortunes, and defines their mutual relations, discloses a situation which is highly artificial. The immense cleverness of many chapters, however, compensates for any doubtful pages.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

MR. C. F. ABDY WILLIAMS'S book on "The Rhythm of Modern Music" (Macmillan, 5s. net) will hardly appeal to the man in the gallery, or even the man in the stalls; but the student of an analytical turn of mind will find it very interesting. "Practical" people will tell us that studies of this kind, and the dissections of masterpieces that accompany them, are of no real use, inasmuch as the great composers never consciously worked upon the principles here revealed. That is quite true, just as it is true that Shakespeare was not thinking of feet and quantities, and arsis and thesis, when he wrote his blank verse; but it is none the less fascinating to discover the general laws that underlie all poetic and musical rhythm, and the special laws under which each poet or composer may be said to prefer to live and work. The rhythm of modern music is a particularly fruitful field of research, for our rhythmic sense is expanding at almost a quicker rate than our harmonic sense. Phrase articulations and groupings that would have seemed disjointed and aimless in the eighteenth century are ordinary food to the average musician of to-day, though audiences as a whole may not always be able to follow them. Mr. Abdy Williams brings out very clearly this evolution in our perception of rhythm. Some of Beethoven's periods would, no doubt, have horrified Haydn; while Beethoven's own feeling, now and then, that he was giving the intelligence of his audience and of his conductors a bit of a poser is shown by his care in telling them that this or that phrase is a "rhythm of three beats" or a "rhythm of four beats." In our own day the rhythm of these passages seems as self-evident even to the man in the street as that of "God Save the King." Mr. Abdy Williams rightly lays stress on the fertility of resource shown in Brahms's rhythms; it is in Brahms, indeed, that we can study almost at its best that evolution of rhythm from the simple to the complex that every art, and every device of art, has to go through. Mr. Abdy Williams concludes his analysis of the nature of rhythm with some chapters of detailed examination of typical modern works, such as the second symphony of Brahms, Tchaikowski's "Pathetic" symphony, and Elgar's symphony, and a short account of Dr. Hugo Riemann's theory of the agogic accent in musical performance. The book is thoughtful and sound throughout. Almost the only remark with which one can disagree is the curious one that "to Bach, music was an innocent recreation," which seems a rather wild thing to say of the composer of the B minor Mass and the "St. Matthew" Passion, and the intensely thoughtful organ chorale-preludes. Mr. Williams's brief reference to programme music on pp. 5-6 is also unnecessarily superficial.

* * *
 "SUSAN WARNER" ("Elizabeth Wetherell") (Putnam, 10s. 6d. net), is the title of a biography by her sister, Miss Anna B. Warner, of the author of "Queechy," "The Wide Wide World," and other tales that formerly enjoyed a great vogue. Miss Warner quotes largely from her sister's letters and journals, and, though the book is not of great literary interest, it gives a pleasant picture of a nineteenth century New England household of rather strict views. The Warners were of Puritan descent, and Puritan traits abound in Susan Warner's character and rule. Thus she writes of Robertson's sermons: "They trouble me; they are false. They are bad, though not written by a bad man, but one who shaves down Scripture." The father, Henry W. Warner, seems to have been a bad man of business. He bought an island, on which he proposed building a house and laying out grounds; but some difficulties about a mortgage involved him in a series of lawsuits, and it was only his daughters' self-sacrifice that saved the place from being sold. The island was, in fact, a white elephant, and swallowed up a great deal of Susan Warner's savings without giving much pleasure in compensation. Susan Warner led a quiet life, and does not seem to have met many of the famous people of her country and generation. Once, on a visit to Boston, Emerson was introduced to her. "Mr. Emerson," is her comment, "I didn't fancy." "The Wide Wide World," like many other successful books, was declined by several publishers, one of them sending back the manuscript with the word "Fudge" scratched across it. "Dull" would have been a better epithet. But it is redeemed by some charming sketches of old-fashioned farm life and character in New England.

* * *
 MISS MARY F. SANDARS claims that her book on "Louis XVIII." (Hutchinson, 16s. net) is "the first attempt in the French or English language to link the different periods of Louis XVIII.'s life together," and to present the man as a whole. To make such an attempt was well worth while for, although Miss Sandars seems to us to rate Louis XVIII. too highly, he lived in a period of the greatest interest, and in his person and career the passage from the Ancient Regime to constitutional government may be profitably studied. He was almost the sole Bourbon who learned by experience. While Comte de Provence, he was a strong partisan of military authority and resisted the reforms

1910 NOVELS.

THE QUESTION. By Parry Truscott, Author of "Catharine." 6s.

THE WICKED WORLD. By Alice Maud Meadows, Author of "The Dukedom of Portsea." 6s.

JOHN MARVEL. By Thomas Nelson Page, Author of "Red Rock." 6s.

THE UNCOUNTED COST. By Mary Gaunt, part Author of "The Silent Ones." 6s.

New Novel by Halliwell Sutcliffe.

A WINTER'S COMEDY. By Halliwell Sutcliffe. 6s.

New Novel by Victoria Cross.

THE ETERNAL FIRES. By Victoria Cross. With a Coloured Portrait of the Author. 6s.

MASTER JOHN. By Shan F. Bullock, Author of "Robert Thorne." 6s.

BLACK SHEEP. By Stanley Portal Hyatt, Author of "The Marriage of Hilary Carden." 6s.

A Fascinating Popular Scientific Work.

SPIRIT AND MATTER BEFORE THE BAR OF MODERN SCIENCE. By Isaac W. Heysinger, M.A., M.D. 15s. net.

THIS book, written at the end of a lifetime of scientific research, proves conclusively the existence of the spiritual world and that spiritualism is the basis of all true religion. As evidence the author brings forward the testimony of all the great scientists and leaders of modern thought, every one of whom, differ as they may on other points, is forced to the conclusion that in the spiritual world only the key to the mystery of the universe is to be found. Instances of extraordinary psychic phenomena have their place in the work, and the intense vigour and lucidity of its style help to make it one of absorbing interest.

THE CATHEDRALS AND CHURCHES OF BELGIUM. By T. Francis Bumpus. With many Illustrations. 6s. net.

EGYPT. By Pierre Loti. Translated by W. P. Baines. With Eight Plates in Colour by A. O. Lamplough. 15s. net.

THE NIGHTSIDE OF PARIS. By E. B. d'Auvergne, Author of "Lola Montez." With 24 Full-page Drawings by Harry Morley. 10s. 6d. net.

MY FRIENDS THE FRENCH. By Robert Harborough Sherard. Brilliant Parisian Reminiscences. 12. 6d. net.

THE QUINTESENCE OF NIETZSCHE. By J. M. Kennedy. An account of his life and works.

* * Please write for New Illustrated List.

WERNER LAURIE, CLIFFORD'S INN, LONDON.

DUCKWORTH'S NEW BOOKS.

The Diary of an English Girl

"The Diary of an English Girl" is free from any literary artifice. It is an actual Diary, slightly abridged, which was kept by a girl of seventeen amid the circle and surroundings described.

In the delicate self portrayal of a young girl who falls in love with a man who fails to reciprocate, in the spontaneity and frankness of the charming picture of an English family's life in London and the country, "The Diary of an English Girl" holds a place quite by itself in modern literature.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

In the Foreign Legion

By ERWIN ROSEN.

This is a genuine document. The author, after studying at a German University, found his way "out west" by force of circumstances. His career there led him towards adventure, and later on, in a mood of disappointment and hopelessness he enlisted, having returned to Germany, in the French Foreign Legion, to live its wild, hard life, without aim, without thought, and without hope.

Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. Ready Feb. 24.

Justice: a Tragedy in Four Acts

By JOHN GALSWORTHY.

Cloth 2s. net, paper 1s. 6d. net.

[Feb. 22.]

Rest and Unrest

Essays by EDWARD THOMAS. Author of "Horæ Solitaræ."

Full of a knowledge of the countryside and of the love of nature, these essays reveal the author as a poet, and as a master of the music of words.

F'scap, 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

Six Greek Sculptors

By ERNEST A. GARDNER.

"Practically the whole range of Greek Sculpture is embraced by the scheme of Professor Gardner's Six Greek Sculptors. The author sketches briefly the conditions of the art before Myron, and rounds off his work with a review of Hellenistic sculpture after Lysippus."—Westminster Gazette.

Illustrated with 81 plates, pott 4to, 7s. 6d. net.

The Reader's Library

A series of copyright volumes of individual merit; the work of authors of repute. It will include only such books as have permanent value. The first two volumes are:

English Literature and Society in the 18th Century

By SIR LESLIE STEPHEN.

Studies in Poetry

By STOPFORD A. BROOKE.

Cloth gilt, Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

THE LATEST FICTION

WRACK. A Tale of the Sea. MAURICE DRAKE

THE TRADER. A venture in New Guinea.

CECIL ROSS JOHNSON

VILLA RUBEIN AND OTHER STORIES.

JOHN GALSWORTHY

MARGARET HEVER.

ELIZABETH MARTINDALE

THE BOUNTY OF THE GODS.

LADY HELEN FORBES [Feb. 24.]

Crown 8vo, 6s. each.

DUCKWORTH & CO., COVENT GARDEN, LONDON, W.C.

Spring List of Announcements now ready.

attempted by Turgot and Necker. When he became King of France, he recognised the absurdity of trying to rule according to the ideas of the ultra-royalists, and got rid of them in 1816 by dissolving the Chamber. In this, as in his dislike of priestly dominance, he was the opposite of his brother, the Comte d'Artois, and, had Louis XVIII lived longer, it is probable that the Revolution of 1830 would not have happened. But, though cautious and sensible, he was a thorough believer in divine right, and Miss Sandars' claim that the French people owe him a deep debt of gratitude for introducing them to the benefits of constitutional government does not find support from the facts. His liberalism was forced upon him and he only accepted it because he saw the folly of resistance. Personally he was unattractive. His corpulence, his gout, his apparent self-satisfaction, and his theatrical airs were the most obvious features in an unsympathetic character. On the other hand, he showed tact and forbearance, and had his will been as strong as his intellect, he might almost have proved a great sovereign. Miss Sandars writes with clearness and ease. We should have liked a fuller treatment of the politics of the years succeeding the Restoration, but the book is not intended to be more than a biography of Louis XVIII.

* * *

THE title, "The Danes in Lancashire," hardly covers the scope of Mr. S. W. Partington's book (Sherratt & Hughes, 5s. net), which really deals with the Danish colonisation of the whole of the ancient kingdom of Northumbria. Beginning with a short historical summary of the Danish invasions and settlements, the writer proceeds to discuss the place-names, patronymics, and physical types that indicate the preponderating Danish influence in this part of the country; reviews their political and social institutions, and discloses some interesting facts concerning stone crosses, runic inscriptions, and other memorials of their art and literature; and ends with what he styles a comparison of progress in agriculture between Danish and British, but which resolves itself into an account of Lord Rayleigh's co-partnership farming estate in Essex. One of Mr. Partington's most illuminating facts is that the population returns in Domesday Book prove that no "servi" existed in the counties where Danish influence was greatest; and with this goes the reminder that political freedom has been the watchword of the people of the northern counties ever since the Danes established themselves there. The antiquarian matter in the book is set forth rather drily; we miss altogether the charm with which, say, Canon Atkinson invested his writings on the Danish monuments in the Cleveland division of Yorkshire. However, Mr. Partington gives us some useful facts and figures regarding antiquities, and the discussion of the wheat-growing question which is introduced into the concluding chapter is, while quite irrelevant to the rest of the book, conducted on impartial lines.

* * *

A PLEASANT excursion into the realm of Italian poetry is provided by Mr. G. Grinnell-Milne in "Tales from Tasso, and other Poems and Translations" (Nutt, 10s. 6d. net). Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered," one of the world's great epics, lends itself readily to the method of treatment employed by its latest translator, who has selected those sections of the poem which narrate its principal incidents, and connecting them with a running prose commentary, has preserved the continuity of the whole with remarkable success. The Italian original is printed on the opposite page to the English translation, so that the reader may compare them at a glance. Biographical and expository chapters concerning the poet and the epic will be found in the forefront of the volume, and the English reader who has no time for the larger literature of the subject, or who is handicapped by want of knowledge of Italian, will find them very useful. Short historical studies of the actual Tancred and Godfrey are also included. The chivalry and fanaticism of the Crusades reach their highest expression in this great Italian poem, whose author was himself one of the most impressive figures in literature—impressive alike in the triumphs and the tragic sorrows of his life. "Ginevra: A Tale of Florence, A.D. 1396," is an original poem which, without being either a translation or an imitation, is based on one of the many anonymous Italian pieces that have been handed down. The narrative, which is put into the mouth of an Italian priest, relates the adventures of an English knight who is journeying to Florence. Lastly, there are selections from the sonnets and madrigals of Michael Angelo, and an extract from Canto V. of the Inferno, rendered into English verse side by side with the Italian. The beginner in the study of Renaissance literature might do much worse than take these examples of its poetry, with their careful explanatory notes, as the foundation of further studies.

* * *

PROFESSOR NAVILLE is known in the learned world as one of the most accomplished of contemporary Egyptologists, and he has found an admirable and sympathetic translator in the minister of the parish church of Dundee. Dr. Campbell tells us that a reperusal of Professor Naville's "The Old Egyptian Faith" (Williams and Norgate, 5s.), when he was in Egypt last year, convinced him that even after the appearance of the excellent works of Wiedemann Erman, Budge, and others in English, there was still room for another exposition of the old Egyptian faith, and that Dr. Naville's lectures occupied a place by themselves. It is this fact which has led him to present them to the English public in the present translation. Professor Naville's book covers very much the same ground as the lectures on the religion of the ancient Egyptians which were delivered in the United States a few years ago by Professor Steindorff of Leipzig, and which have appeared in Putnam's excellent series of "American Lectures on the History of Religions." But there is ample room for both books, as the points of view are not always the same. It is an exceedingly difficult task to explain and illuminate the origin and development of the Egyptian religion during thousands of years. The materials are often defective, and even when we do have them, it is easy to form different estimates as to their value. It is also difficult to enter into the religious ideas and to breathe the religious atmosphere of a people whose whole conception of the world and life are so very different from our own. Dr. Campbell is right in saying that the Egyptian faith is perhaps the most wonderful body of religious beliefs that the human mind has ever conceived. If we want a lucid and interesting introduction to these beliefs, we cannot do better than place ourselves in the hands of Dr. Naville. He differs on some points from other inquirers in the same field. But he always differs with good reasons behind him, and he may safely be commended as a trustworthy guide to the beginner. A word of praise must be awarded to Dr. Campbell for the excellent photographs with which the text is illustrated. These photographs add much to the value of an excellent book.

* * *

IN "The Life and Times of Martin Blake, B.D.," by the Rev. J. F. Chanter (Lane, 10s. 6d. net.), we have an interesting account of a moderate Churchman whose attempt to steer a middle course during troubled times brought him into many difficulties, but enabled him to end his career in undisturbed possession of the vicarage of Barnstaple and a prebend's stall at Exeter Cathedral. Blake's sufferings during the great rebellion are recorded in Walker's "The Sufferings of the Clergy," but Mr. Chanter thinks the book does an injustice to Blake's memory. This view is supported by the documents on which the present work is based. Both from his temperament and training, Blake seems to have been what would to-day be called "a moderate Churchman with evangelical leanings." Nevertheless, he opposed Puritanism, and as rural dean of Barnstaple, he prosecuted some of the lecturers who were carrying on a vigorous propaganda. Under Charles I. he refused to pay ship-money, but declined to join the Roundheads, and was twice deprived of his living. He returned to it on the eve of the Restoration, and died there in 1673. The book is well written, and should prove of interest to students of English ecclesiastical history.

* * *

"AN INTRODUCTION TO THE STUDY OF PHILOSOPHY" (Dublin: Hodges, Figgis & Co., 5s. net) consists of a series of lectures given by the late Miss Alice Oldham at Alexandra College, Dublin. Miss Oldham took an active part in promoting higher education for women in Ireland, as well as in other movements likely to further the good of her country. The lectures gathered together in the present volume fall under three divisions. The first series deals with the history

THE TRUE WAY OF LIFE:

A Reply to Mr. J. ST. LOE STRACHEY,
By EDWARD GRUBB, M.A.

From THE SPECTATOR:—

"The essays in this volume, which appeared originally in the British Friend, are written from the Quaker point of view in reply to a series of articles reprinted from these columns and published under the title 'A New Way of Life.' We do not desire to enter into a discussion upon the merits of the book, for which a preface has been written by the Bishop of Hereford. . . . Our present object is merely to draw attention to the book, and recommend it to those of our readers who desire to see the other side put with ability and sincerity."

From the Foreword, by the BISHOP OF HEREFORD:—

"We welcome the arguments set forth in this volume. We feel that the writer is doing the best national and international service, that he is in the direct line of those great preachers of national righteousness, the Hebrew Prophets; and we believe that his preaching of the true way of national and international relationships, as herein set forth, is destined to prevail."

From PRINCIPAL SELBIE, Mansfield College, Oxford:—

"Thank you very much for sending me your little book. I am very glad you have written it, and quite agree with the position you take. I shall be very pleased to recommend it in any way I can."

From THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN (article by Prof. W. F. Adeney):—

"A little book written with a great purpose. . . . In calm firm language Mr. Grubb points out that the alternative brought before us is nothing less than that of paganism or Christianity. Practically the 'new way of life' ignores the application of Christian principles to international relations, and treats them quite frankly on the plane of paganism."

Price 1s. net.

Headley Brothers, Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE

Have the I B L E S Illustrated, Wide Margin, Interleaved, Teachers', Interlinear Revised, and other Editions. Telephone Central 329.

Largest Selection of Oxford and Other Bibles and Prayer Books from 6d. to £10.

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

GLAISHER'S REMAINDER BOOK CATALOGUE

For FEBRUARY (No. 369),

NOW READY, and will be forwarded on application. It comprises a Specially Attractive Selection of Publisher's Reminders, including many Good Bargains.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., Booksellers, 265, High Holborn, London.

8vo, 2s., post free

HEAVEN AND ITS WONDERS, AND HELL.

From Things Heard and Seen

By EMMANUEL SWEDENBORG.

ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING said: "To my mind the only light that has been cast on the other life is found in Swedenborg's philosophy."

London: SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, BLOOMSBURY STREET.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

1d.
2

The Daily News

LONDON & MANCHESTER.

ALL OVER ENGLAND FIRST THING IN THE MORNING.

1d.
2

Macmillan's New Books.

LORD KELVIN.

The Life of William Thomson. Baron Kelvin of Largs. By SILVANUS P. THOMPSON. With numerous Photogravure Portraits and other Illustrations, 2 vols. 8vo, 30s. net.

The Gates of India. Being an Historical Narrative. By Colonel Sir THOMAS HOLDICH, K.C.M.G., K.C.I.E., C.B., D.Sc. With Maps, 8vo, 10s. net.

PUTNAM WEALE'S NEW NOVEL.

The Human Cobweb. By B. L. PUTNAM WEALE, Author of "The Forbidden Boundary," &c. Extra Cr. 8vo, 6s. A romance of Peking after the seizure of Port Arthur by the Russians and Kalocho by Germany.

The Common Sense of Political Economy. Including a Study of The Human Basis of Economic Law. By PHILIP H. WICKSTEED, M.A. With Diagrams, 8vo, 14s. net.

A Project of Empire. A Critical Study of the Economics of Imperialism, with special reference to the Ideas of ADAM SMITH. By J. SHIELD NICHOLSON, M.A., D.Sc., F.B.A. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

The Working Faith of the Social Reformer, and other Essays. By HENRY JONES, LL.D., D.Litt. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Notes from a Knapsack. With numerous Illustrations. By GEORGE WHERRY, M.A., F.R.C.S. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.—"Readers of this most instructive little volume will discover that Mr. Wherry is a naturalist, a raconteur, and a famous walker 'on the flat,' which many Alpinists are not."

LANCET.—"Pleasant gossip, describing walks in England and Switzerland."

From Old to New. Being Some Personal Experiences at Constantinople in April, 1909. By ALBINIA WHERRY. With Illustrations by BEATRIX WHERRY, 12mo, 1s. net.

LITERARY WORLD.—"A brisk and breezy account of the personal experiences of two ladies at Constantinople during a crisis of great interest and some danger."

MACMILLAN and CO., Ltd., London.

of philosophy from Thales to Hegel; then comes a short history of ethical theory; and the book ends with a course of ten lectures on psychology. The book makes a good introductory manual to the study of philosophy. It succeeds to a large extent in overcoming the difficulty that besets every writer of such a book, and while always clear and simple does not misrepresent the views of the great thinkers under discussion. Moreover, as the writer of the preface claims, we cannot fail in it to discern the pervading spirit of the teacher—"her ardent enthusiasm and passion for spiritual progress." We hope the book will have a wide circulation both among students beginning philosophy and also among such general readers as wish to have an elementary notion of its general principles.

* * *

THE balance between biography and criticism is about equally preserved in the "Stories of the French Artists" (Chatto & Windus, 7s. 6d. net), from Clouet to Delacroix, which have been collected and arranged by Messrs. P. M. Turner and C. H. Collins Baker. The latter, who is responsible for the second portion of the book, is the more critical of the two, his judgments on Greuze, Madame Vigée Le Brun, Louis David, and even Ingres, being especially severe; but he is nowhere unmindful of the human interest, and, on the whole, the lay reader, no less than the art student, will find that the narrative slips along pleasantly from start to finish. In generalising on the character of French painting, Mr. Turner establishes with sufficient clearness the truth (1) that it has been intensely national in so far as its periods have always reflected the national life of the time to an extent unparalleled in any other nation, and (2) that it has always been concerned with line rather than with color. The second fact is useful to remember nowadays in view of a too general idea that the modern Impressionist School is essentially a French growth, representative of French genius. This volume, whatever one may think of its opinions, has distinct value as a biographical dictionary of French artists from the Primitives to the Romantics, including as it does several names of admirable painters whose works, if represented in the Louvre, are still unfamiliar to many an English art lover. Its character studies, too, of various personalities are not without vividness and penetrative power, and the selection of illustrations, both plain and colored, leaves little to be desired in point of representativeness.

* * *

"LAY SERMONS FROM THE 'SPECTATOR'" (Pitman, 5s. net) is a collection of essays by "M. C. E." on the religious thought of to-day, which have already appeared in the columns of our contemporary. A few of them are expository and critical, but the general tone is free from doctrinal bias. They are, therefore, likely to appeal to a wide circle of readers who, while requiring some mental stimulus and encouragement to their personal convictions and half-convictions on the subject, would shrink from any religious book that was impregnated by religiosity or narrow-mindedness. In literary and historical interest the essays on "The Latitude-Men," "The Christ of English Poetry," and "A Dual People," are those that commend themselves especially; and the more intimate of these addresses are well represented by "Facing Life," "The Instinct of Prayer," "What is Religion?" and "The First True Gentleman." Altogether there are thirty-seven subjects, and the treatment of nearly every one of them will be found sympathetic by the general reader who gives any thought to these matters.

The Week in the City.

	Price Friday morning, Feb. 11.	Price Friday morning, Feb. 18.
Consols	82 $\frac{1}{2}$	82
Midland Def.	58 $\frac{1}{2}$	59
Union Pacific	187 $\frac{1}{2}$	190 $\frac{1}{2}$
Buenos Ayres Pacific	88 $\frac{1}{2}$	87 $\frac{1}{2}$
U.S. Steel	80 $\frac{1}{2}$	82 $\frac{1}{2}$

THE past week has not been marked by any outburst of speculation on the Stock Exchange, though the rubber market remains very active. New York is still in an uneasy condition, as if awaiting more failures of the Fisk and Robinson class. The foreign market has been a little bit disturbed by the civil war between the Greek Army and Navy, as well as by the Turkish programme of "Dreadnoughts." From what one knows of Greece and Turkey and of the navies at the Piræus and Golden Horn, I should hazard an opinion that the people of both Greece and Turkey would be extremely lucky if the Army in each case would destroy the Navy. The one successful Rothschild plan for restoring the finances of South America rested, it will be remembered, upon the principle that the rival powers should sell off their battleships. This reminds me that there are persistent rumors in the City of a naval loan, and a fresh issue of Irish Land Stock will soon be due. These causes of apprehension, together with the financial confusion, amply account for the low price of Consols and the dulness of all gilt-edged securities.

REVENUE AND DEFICIT

The failure to pass the Budget has been disastrous to the public pocket. So far the House of Lords has distinctly gained, for its members have not paid super-tax or licence duties or any of the things they objected to, while the poor, of course, have made their contributions to "Dreadnoughts" and other things. From the Treasury point of view the outlook is very bad, and a deficit of from 20 to 30 millions may be expected unless the Budget is put through with lightning rapidity. Here are the returns to the end of last week:—

REVENUE.	Total receipts into the Exchequer from
	April 1st, 1909, to Feb. 12th, '10.	April 1st, 1908, to Feb. 13th, '09.
	£26,352,000	£25,211,000
Customs	27,728,000	29,105,000
Excise	18,665,000	15,529,000
Estate, &c., duties	6,998,000	6,686,000
Stamps	550,000	1,680,000
Land tax	10,875,000	20,760,000
House duty	19,170,000	18,540,000
Property and Income Tax	400,000	430,000
Post Office	1,136,672	1,151,443
Crown lands	1,334,730	1,769,744
Receipts from Suez Canal shares and sundry loans
Miscellaneous
Total revenue	£113,209,402	£120,862,187

THE WOOLLEN TRADE.

The idea propagated by Tariff Reformers that Free Trade, which guarantees cheap production, is no use for competition owing to protective tariffs, has never been accepted in Yorkshire or Lancashire. Trade in the West Riding is now exceptionally good, and the home demand is very heavy. But Yorkshire woollen manufacturers find time to send things abroad. Despite the depression of trade in Japan during the past year or two, and a rather high tariff, the importation of woollen cloths has shown a marked increase. The total value of the cloth imported last year amounted to 2,761,564 yen (about £276,156), showing an increase of about 1,000,000 yen on the value for the preceding year, as will be seen from the following figures:—

Place of Shipment.	1909. Yen.	1908. Yen.
Great Britain	1,957,747	1,374,852
Germany	539,997	333,155
Belgium	82,971	32,269
Austria-Hungary	32,263	24,195
Other countries	148,586	24,505
Total	2,761,564	1,788,976

British woollen manufacturers, it will be seen, sell nearly four times as much as Germany to Japan, and more than two-thirds as much as the whole world.

LUCCELLUM.

CHAIRMAN : To those qualities of fine flavour and aroma that one requires for real enjoyment in smoking it adds the unusual attribute of coolness.

Whether smoked much or little it is always cool, always pleasing and burns evenly to the last shred.

BOARDMAN'S is the same tobacco milder, and

RECORDER the same, but fuller flavoured.

6d. per oz. from
all tobacconists.

R. J. LEA, MANCHESTER.

WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE. GREAT DEMONSTRATION, Queen's Hall, Tuesday, Feb. 22,

At 8 o'clock.

Speakers—The Earl of Lytton, Mr. Hugh Law, M.P., Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., Mr. A. M. L. Langdon, K.C., Mr. Aneurin Williams, M.P., Mr. Laurence Housman, and Mr. George Elliott, K.C. Mr. Hubert Jacobs in the Chair.

Tickets from 6d. to 5s.

Apply to the Hon. Sec. of the Men's League, 40, Museum Street, W.C.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

TOURS.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."

£26 5s. Palestine, Egypt, Constantinople, Greece. March 3rd.

Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. By Post, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2 COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED).

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it

WILL BE REPLACED.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER. Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Entrance Scholarships, March 10th.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.
BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.
(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

BOOTHAM SCHOOL.

HEAD MASTER:—ARTHUR ROWNTREE, B.A. (Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History and Practice of Education Cantab.)

Preparation for Universities.

Citizenship Course. Leisure Hour Work.

Sixty Boys passed University Entrance Examinations in the years 1905-9.

For prospectus, etc., apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

LEIGHTON PARK SCHOOL (Near Reading).

Under the Management of the Society of Friends.

Boys from this PUBLIC SCHOOL have done well at the Universities and in business careers.

The School stands in its own grounds of about 45 acres, high above the town and the Thames Valley.

For Honours List, Prospectus, particulars of Scholarships, and other information, apply to the Head Master, JOHN RIDGES, M.A., at the School.

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey. Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK.
K. M. ELLIS.

STRAMONGATE BOYS' SCHOOL, KENDAL.

A Boarding School for Boys.

Founded by the Society of Friends in Kendal.

A strong staff—leisure-time pursuits—school journeys—good games—gymnastics—a magnificent country district.

The school has doubled itself in the last five years.

Prospectus, School Magazine, etc., from WILFRED SESSIONS, B.Sc. Headmaster.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD, HASLEMERE, SURREY.

COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Sandy Soil. 600 feet above sea level.

Healthy out-door life, combined with thorough education on modern lines. Usual curriculum, including citizenship course, extension lectures, &c. Preparation when required for University and other careers. Handicrafts, gardening, riding, nature study, archaeology, &c.

Principal: Miss AMY KEMP.

EDUCATIONAL.

SESAME HOUSE

for Home-life Training and for Training of Children, Lady Nurses and Kindergartners.—For full particulars apply,

The Principal, Miss EMILY LAST, 43A, Acacia Road, London, N.W.

HIGHEST QUALITY
TURKISH TOWELS
AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY

BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;

And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED
WHITE
& BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

TANGYE'S

TYPE "AA" OIL ENGINE

For Farm or Estate Work,
Country-House Lighting, &c.

TANGYES LTD., BIRMINGHAM.

THE INDEX TO
VOLUME V. OF THE NATION

Is now ready, and can be obtained free on application to the Manager.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Bathrooms on every Floor,
Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading,
Billiard and Smoking Rooms.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) Single from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc.,
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN. Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) Hotel. Close Pier; 1st Class; moderate.SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week.BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.*BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.BRIGHTON.*THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.*THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara.DEAL.*BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.EASTBOURNE.*CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House. Sussex Gdns. 5/- day.HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.EDINBURGH.*ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel.GREAT YARMOUTH.*MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day.GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.*THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.ILFRACOMBE.*COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 rooms. Facing Sea.KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCs.*CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments.LANCASTER.*BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh.LEEDS.*HOTEL METROPOLE. 2 minutes' walk from either station.LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANDUDNO.The WHITE HORSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea.LLANELLY.*CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LYNTON (Devon).ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres.MALVERN.*HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson.MATLOCK.*SMEDLEY'S HYDRO. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand.ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes).NELSON.*RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station.OXFORD (near).*SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boar's Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c., Lecture.PENTRE.*PENTRE HOTEL, Rhendda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.SOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment.

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas. Tel. 647

ROCKLEY HYDRO. Electric and other baths; Excellent cuisine.
Lift. Near Golf Links. From 7s. per day. Tel. 422.

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclist's Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop.WHITBY.*WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

Your Week End Is Not Complete

WITHOUT

The Saturday Westminster

(The Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette.")

It is the only Weekly Magazine Review of the kind.

"F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week.
An Unique page of "Problems and Prizes,"
Book Reviews and Special Literary
Articles by the best known Writers.

ONE PENNY. Post 6/6 per annum (home), 8/8 (abroad).

Offices: Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for
copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION
Office, 14 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION
PUBLISHING CO. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-
sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—
Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions
are received.

WARD, LOCK & CO'S LIST

NEW SIX SHILLING NOVELS.

BERENICE

E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM.

"Mystery" has always been the keynote of Mr. Oppenheim's striking romances, and "Berenice" is full of it. One may safely assert this is the most puzzling and moving story its author has written.

WHITE WALLS

MAX PEMBERTON.

"There is plenty of incident of a kind that grips, and the whole tale is given with the verve and vividness which one expects from its author's pen. There are passages of really fine description, for which the scene of the story gives excellent scope."—Queen.

THE SPORTING CHANCE

ALICE AND CLAUDE ASKEW.

"The popular authors of this novel have imagined something new, even in annals of the turf. Mostyn is an honourable lad, brave also, and determined to go straight. Readers who follow his adventures on the turf in this exciting book will be keen to know what, after all, was the result of his final effort to win his race."—Globe.

FOES OF JUSTICE

HEADON HILL.

Mr. Headon Hill is a writer who has been called "the successor of Wilkie Collins." His work is always consistently good and interesting, and "Foes of Justice" is likely to be one of his most popular novels.

WHEN THE DEVIL DRIVES

FLORENCE WARDEN.

Not since her famous "House on the Marsh" was published has Miss Florence Warden written a story so far above the usual run of her work as "When the Devil Drives."

At all Libraries and Booksellers.

THE SUNDIAL

FRED M. WHITE.

"In the already extensive list of Mr. White's novels it would be difficult to find one superior to the present story in clever construction of plot, carefully concealed mystery, and a succession of most exciting and dramatic incidents, which quickly follow each other to hold the reader's attention from start to finish."—Northern Whig.

JOY

L. G. MOBERLY.

"Joy is all charm and sweetness, spreading happiness around her, and deserving her name in every way. A delightful story."—Freeman's Journal.

JOAN MAR, DETECTIVE

MARIE CONNOR LEIGHTON.

"Convict 99" seems never to wane in popularity, and any new story from the author's pen in which criminology plays a part is eagerly looked for by her admirers. And they will not have anticipated this romance without reward; it is one of its author's best.

THE HOME SECRETARY

WILMOT KAYE.

Mr. Wilmot Kaye is quite a new author, but he is one of considerable promise. "The Home Secretary" is confidently recommended.

A KING IN KHAKI

H. K. WEBSTER.

The author of "A King in Khaki" has a broad human understanding and sympathy, and he has here produced a story teeming with exciting adventure and incident. This is a breezy, healthy tale.

Nature Books. By CHARLES G. D. ROBERTS.

ILLUSTRATED. LARGE CROWN 8vo, CLOTH GILT, 6s. EACH.

"Under the guidance of Mr. Roberts we have often adventured among the wild beasts of the land and sea; and we hope to do so many times in the future. It is an education not to be missed by those who have the chance, and the chance is everyone's. Mr. Roberts loves his wild nature, and his readers, both old and young, should love it with him."—Athenaeum.

THE HOUSE IN THE WATER

"Rarely does a book on natural history subjects possess so singular a charm as that which distinguishes Charles G. D. Roberts's book. This will prove an ideal gift book."—Daily Mail.

THE BACKWOODSMEN

"There are few writers who could hold a reader's attention with a story of a squirrel, a weasel, and a hawk, but Mr. Roberts's methods are perfectly fascinating."—Bystander.

KINGS IN EXILE

